In and Out of the Banks

One day in November, 1931, a man by the name of A. H. Burton, president of the Chase National Bank of New York, took a trip to London. He had been engaged in negotiations with several European banks under the trading name of Continental Import & Export Co., and he needed to be present for the purpose of establishing business connections between American businessmen and foreign banks. On his way back to the United States, he found himself at the airport in Paris, where he had to wait for several hours before his flight was announced.

Burton was a well-known figure in the financial world, and he had considerable influence in the banking community. He was known for his shrewd business acumen and his ability to negotiate complex deals. His trip to London was not unusual for him, as he frequently traveled abroad to conduct business.

Burton was the leader of a group of American businessmen who were involved in the import and export of goods. The group included some of the most successful and influential bankers in the country, and they had established a network of contacts throughout Europe.

The trip to London was a routine one for Burton, but it was to be his last. He was killed in a plane crash on his return to New York, and his death was a great loss to the banking community. His sudden departure left a void that was hard to fill, and his legacy lived on through the work of his successors.

A few weeks later, another American banker, A. H. Burton's nephew, took over the trip to London. He was also a well-known figure in the banking world, and he continued the legacy of his uncle. He was known for his shrewd business acumen and his ability to negotiate complex deals. His trip to London was not unusual for him, as he frequently traveled abroad to conduct business.
