A detailed account of German atrocities committed in the Second World War, the so-called "Black Book," contains detailed evidence in the form of official papers, pictures, maps and eyewitness accounts, as well as material in the "Black Book of Poland," published in Poland. After war's end, the book was suppressed by the British government and never published. It is now available in the Polish Information Center in New York.

The volume, of 415 pages, published by G. Putnam's Sons, is a Polish translation of an original Polish work, and details the Nazi occupation of the country and the crimes committed by the invaders.

Commenting on the German atrocities committed in Poland, President Roosevelt said that the country was a "master race" and should be treated as such. The Allies, he added, had rescinded the poisonousURY against Poland, and would now focus on the "tremendous task of the coming generation to face up to the problem of justice to the full extent of our civilization."
