Richard M. Bissell, 84, Is Dead; Helped Plan Bay of Pigs Invasion

By DAVID BINDER

WASHINGTON, Feb. 7 - Richard M. with his memoirs for more than two Bissell Jr., the senior Government official who took responsibility for the capital from M.I.T. one April afternoon Central Intelligence Agency's failed at- in 1948 to work on the Marshall Plan; tempt to topple the Castro Government he packed, caught the next train and at the Bay of Pigs in Cuba in April 1961, died today at his home in Farmington,

Mr. Bissell had heart problems, said his aide, Frances T. Pudlo.

While his role as a principal architect of what became a disaster for the newly installed Kennedy Administration is widely remembered, Mr. Bissell had already made great, largely un-sung contributions in other fields of Government service during and after World War II.

As a special assistant and later the deputy director of plans for Allen Dulles, the C.I.A. chief, he guided the clandestine program for building the highflying U-2 reconnaissance aircraft, as well as its supersonic successor, the SR-71, and the first orbiting spy satellite, Corona. For this, he became known in aviation circles as a pioneer of aerial reconnaissance.

Formed Assassination Team

Recalling that Mr. Bissell "helped design and develop the specifications for the U-2," Richard Helms, a former Director of Central Intelligence, said today that he would "be remembered in the intelligence community as one of the fathers of high-altitude photographic reconnaissance, which, as it developed, did much to improve intelligence during the cold war."
As head of clandestine operations

Mr. Bissell was also responsible for the C.I.A.'s creation — at Kennedy's request after the Bay of Pigs — of a topsecret assassination project whose target was Fidel Castro, who was then Prime Minister of Cuba.

Mr. Bissell remained in charge of covert operations until Feb. 28, 1962, when his resignation was accepted; he had submitted it nearly 10 months ear-lier, shortly after the Bay of Pigs operation. On the first anniversary of that failed invasion, Kennedy awarded him the National Security Medal, calling his achievements on behalf of American intelligence "unique."

Oversaw Wartime Logistics

Little in his previous life appeared to point him toward intelligence work much less clandestine activity.

He had studied at Yale University and taught economics there in the 1930's. World War II drew him to Washington, where he became the executive director of maritime shipping, supervising the operation to supply American and allied forces around the world.
In 1946 he went to the Massachusetts

Institute of Technology to teach eco- tion, which has been a full-service comnomics, but with the onset of the cold mercial real-estate firm since its war, he was lured back to Washington founding, as John Reynolds, Inc., in two years later, this time to help run 1918.

spent the four years as a senior execu-tive of the Economic Cooperation Administration and its successor, the Mutual Security Agency. On his first day he signed authorizations for $35 million in economic aid to Western Europe. Richard Mervin Bissell Jr. was born to New England wealth and promi-nence. His father was president of Hartford Fire Insurance. He attended the Groton School, Yale and the London School of Economics.

Forever Linked to a Flasco

Though recalled by a friend as "desperately shy," the bespectacled Mr changed the invasion's landing site and eliminated the use of air or sea power and sought out challenging jobs.

His name will always be linked to the trained and armed by the C.I.A. were landed on the Cuban coast without air cover and left to be crushed by Mr. Castro's far superior forces.

Before the Bay of Pigs, Mr. Bissell had been slated to succeed Mr. Dulles as Director of Central Intelligence. Afterward, Kennedy told him that both he and Mr. Dulles would have to go.

A C.I.A. review directed by Lyman B. Kirkpatrick in his capacity as inspector general and completed several months after the Cuban operation put most of the blame for the invasion's was an illusion that the Administration failure on Mr. Bissell. "Because we were so involved in seeing it go ahead, we did not insist on as great freedom of action as we needed.

Mr. Bissell also noted that the Kennedy Administration had made a terrible miscalculation in expecting that the invasion plan could be kept secret. The fact that Cuban exiles were training in Guatemala to invade their homeland was disclosed in The New York Times three months before the actual landing. Mr. Bissell said that in retrospect it

Admirers called Mr. Abs a financial genius, and David Rockefeller once for his skills in each), and indefatiga-called him "the most important banker bility, as well as a deep interest in of our time." To critics, Mr. Abs embodied the vast power that the Deut-sche Bank, which he resurrected after World War II, and other German commercial banks, hold over the nation's industry to this day. For nearly three decades, he was the most powerful lished by Bonn. From that post, he private individual in Germany's eco-helped distribute $5 billion in Marshall Finance Minister Theo Waigel said today that Mr. Abs "successfully represented German interests in the interfaces between politics and economics.

The greatest achievement of Mr. Abs's career was heading the German delagation that negotiated the London Debt Accord of 1953. That watershed agreement settled West Germany's foreign debts, including reparation de-mands, paving the way for the "Wirt-schaftswunder," or economic miracle postwar reconstruction. Johannes Rau, the current minister-president of North Rhine-Westphalia, called it "a milestone on the path to sovereignty.'

A Friend of Adenauer's

Although he was a very successful executive at the Deutsche Bank before and during the war, Mr. Abs career took off after 1945.

A Rebuilder of Industry

Commenting on Mr. Abs's career, Hans Otto Eglau, a prominent German economic journalist and author of a book on the Deutsche Bank said, "He also played an unparalleled role in rebuilding West German industry and, in so doing, making Deutsche Bank the nation's biggest, most powerful commercial bank."

The Deutsche Bank was broken up by the Allied powers after World War II. When they allowed it to reform in 1957, Mr. Abs became its managing board spokesman, a position equivalent to chairman at an American bank. After 10 years in that post, he become chairman of the bank's supervisory board until retiring in 1976.

His power and influence extended far beyond the board room. In his heyoccupation he became friends with day, Mr. Abs was on the supervisory Konrad Adenauer, the former Mayor of board of 30 companies, usually as Cologne and West Germany's first chairman. The list included the cream Chancellor. Both men were from the of German industry: Daimler-Benz Rhineland — Mr. Abs was born in Bonn A.G., Germany's largest industrial con-

In 1965, the West German Parliament passed a law limiting to 10 the number of corporate chairmanships one person could hold simultaneously. It was immediately dubbed Lex Abs, the Abs law.

'I told them that of all measures that were taken to protect my health, this was the most decisive," Mr. Abs said.

A Collector of Art

After retirement he maintained an office at the the Deutsche Bank and until recently worked a five-day week at a stand-up desk, which he preferred. in 1990, he published his first book, "Ent-scheidungen," which translates as "Decisions." Much of his time was devoted to collecting art and acting as a patron for a number of Germany musuems.

His services were sought even in retirement. When the Vatican Bank got tangled in a scandal with Banco Ambrosiano of Milan in 1982, the Holy See called in Mr. Abs, a Roman Catholic, to help straighten out the mess.

He was no stranger to scandal. In the early 1970's Eberhard Czichon, a wellknown East German author, accused Mr. Abs of playing a leading role in the Deutsche Bank's strenuous efforts to 'Aryanize" Jewish-owned businesses under the Nazis by seizing them after a token payment. Mr. Abs filed suit, and a Stuttgart court ruled in 1972 that there were no grounds for the claim. He is survived by his son, Thomas,
