II.—ABBREVIATIONS OF TITLES.

- Acta SS. Acta Sanctorum (Bollandists).
- Dict. d'arch. chrét. Cabrol (ed.), Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie.
- Dict. de théol. cath. Vacant and Mangenot (ed.), Dictionnaire de théologie catholique.

- Vig., Dict. de la Bible. Vigouroux (ed.), Dictionnaire de la Bible.

Notes:

- Large Roman numerals standing alone indicate volumes. Small Roman numerals standing alone indicate chapters. Arabic numerals standing alone indicate pages. In other cases the divisions are explicitly stated. Thus “Rashdall, Universities of Europe, I, ix” refers the reader to the ninth chapter of the first volume of that work; “1, p. ix” would indicate the ninth page of the preface of the same volume.

- Where St. Thomas (Aquinas) is cited without the name of any particular work the reference is always to “Summa Theologica” (not to “Summa Philosophiae”). The divisions of the “Summa Theol.” are indicated by a system which may best be understood by the following example: “I-II, Q. vi, a. 7, ad 2 um” refers to the seventh article of the sixth question in the first part of the second part, in the response to the second objection.

- The abbreviations employed for the various books of the Bible are obvious. Ecclesiasticus is indicated by Eccles., to distinguish it from Ecclesiastes (Eccles.). It should also be noted that I and II Kings in D. V. correspond to I and II Samuel in A. V.; and I and II Par. to I and II Chronicles. Where, in the spelling of a proper name, there is a marked difference between the D. V. and the A. V., the form found in the latter is added, in parentheses.

New Mexico, a territory of the United States now (Jan., 1911) awaiting only the completion of its Constitution and the acceptance thereof by the Federal authorities to rank as a state. It lies between 31° 20' and 37° N. lat., and between 106° 2' and 108° 2' W. long.; it is bounded on the north by Colorado, on the east by Oklahoma and Texas, on the south by Texas and the Republic of Mexico, and on the west by Arizona. It is about 370 miles from east to west, 336 from north to south, and has an area of 122,580 sq. miles, with mountain, plateau, and valley on either side of the Rio Grande. The average rainfall is 12 inches, usually between July and September, so that spring and summer are dry, and agriculture and grazing suffer. The climate is uniform, the summers, as a rule, moderate, and, the atmosphere being dry, the heat is not oppressive. In the north-west and north-east the winters are long, but not severe, while in the central and southern portions the winters are usually short and mild. In the United States census of 1900 the population was 141,282, of which 33 per cent was illiterate; in the census of 1910 the population was 227,396. About one-half of the inhabitants are of Spanish descent.

The soil in the valleys is a rich and sandy loam, capable, with irrigation, of producing good crops. It is also rich in gold and silver, and important mines have been opened near Deming, Silver City, and Lordsburg, in the south-western part of the state. There are copper mines near Gokletia in the north, and near Santa Rita in the south; while coal is found in great abundance near Gallup, Cerillos, and in the north-west. The mineral production of New Mexico for 1907 was $7,517,843, that of coal alone amounting to $3,312,128. In 1909 the net product in coal shipped from the mines was 2,708,624 tons, or a total value of $3,881,508. A few forests exist in the extreme plains, and abundant timber is found in the north-western and central districts. Though mining and commerce as well as agriculture are now in process of rapid development, New Mexico is still a grazing country. Sheep-farming is the most important and lucrative industry; cattle-farming is also of importance. In 1908 and 1909 severe droughts caused the sheep industry to decline somewhat. In 1909 New Mexico shipped 700,800 head of sheep; in 1908, 635,800; in 1907, 975,800. The wool shorn in 1909, from over 4,000,000 sheep, was 18,000,000 lbs., which brought an average of 19 cents per lb., yielding a cash production of $3,420,000. The shipments of cattle in the same year amounted to 310,326, and 64,380 hides were handled in the same period. Farming is successfully carried on in the Rio Grande and other valleys, Indian corn, wheat, and garden products being the principal crops. For the year 1907 the territorial governor's report placed the value of the agricultural products at $21,000,000, but this was a gross overestimate. The important manufacturing interests are those connected with mining, railroads, etc. Lumbering is being developed by capital brought from the East, and large lumber mills are now in operation, notably at Albuquerque. There are 73 banks (41 national and 34 territorial) in the state, with an aggregate capital of $3,274,086. The bonded debt of the state is $1,002,000, of which $69,579.49 is covered by the sinking fund.

GENERAL HISTORY.—In April, 1536, there arrived at Culiacán, in the Mexican Province of Sinaloa, Alvar Núñez Cabeza de Vaca, Andrés Dorantes, Alonso del Castillo Maldonado, and the negro Estevanico, the only survivors of the ill-fated expedition of Narváez which had left Spain in 1528. Mendoza, the Viceroy of Mexico was told astonishing tales by Cabeza de Vaca concerning the wealth of the country to the north, and he forthwith commanded Coronado, governor of the Province of Nueva Galicia, to prepare an expedition. The preparations went slowly, and Mendoza ordered Friar Marcos de Niza to make a preliminary exploration of the northern country. The Franciscan left Culliacán in 1539, accompanied by Estevanico and a few Indians. After untold hardships he reached the famous pueblo of Zuñi, took possession of all the surrounding country, planted the cross, and named the territory "The New Kingdom of St. Francis". Marcos de Niza is, therefore, rightly called the discoverer of New Mexico and Arizona. He then returned to Mexico, and his narrative, especially what he said about the seven cities of Cibola, was an incentive to Coronado, who set out from Culliacán in 1540, accompanied by Marcos and a large body of Spaniards and Indians. Coronado crossed Sonora (now Arizona) and entered New Mexico in July, 1540. The expedition returned in 1542, but, although many regions were discovered, no conquests were made nor colonies established. In 1583 an expedition was led into New Mexico by Francisco de Ibarra; it is worth mentioning only for the reason that de Ibarra returned in 1565 with the boast that he had discovered "a new Mexico", which was, probably, the origin of the name. Espejo entered New Mexico in 1581, but accomplished nothing. In this same year Francie-can Friar, Augustín Rodríguez, entered with a few companions, and lost his life in the cause of Christianity. In 1581 Espejo called New Mexico Nueva Andalucía. By 1588 the name Nuevo México was evidently well known, since Villagrán's epic is called "Historia del Nuevo México".

The expeditions of Espejo and Father Agustín Rodríguez were followed by many more of an uninterrupted and enduring character, and by the middle of the seventeenth century gentle prosperity prevailed. In the year 1580, however, a terrible Indian rebellion broke out under the leadership of Pope, an Indian of the pueblo of San Juan. All the Spanish settlements were attacked, and many people massacred. The survivors fled to Santa Fe, but, after three days of fighting, were compelled to abandon the city and were driven out of the province.

Thus was destroyed the work of eighty years. The Spaniards did not lose courage: between 1619 and 1693 Antonio de Vargas reconquered New Mexico, and, with the aid of the old colonists and many more new ones, his entire colony consisting of 800 people, including seventy families and 200 soldiers. The villages were rebuilt, churches were built, and the missions re-established. A new period began, Santa Cruz de la Cañada, around which most of the families which had come with De Vargas under Padre Francisco de Peralta were settled. The colonists, no longer seriously threatened by the Indians, progressed slowly.

By the end of the eighteenth century the population of New Mexico was about 34,000, one-half Spaniards. The first half of the nineteenth century was a period of revolutions—rapidly growing foreign invasions, accepted by the Spanish inhabitants of New Mexico in an easy-going spirit of submission unparalleled in history.

In 1821 the news of Mexican independence was received, and, although the people of New Mexico were ignorant of the events which had preceded it, and knew absolutely nothing of the situation, they celebrated the event with great enthusiasm and swore allegiance to Iturbide. In 1824, just three years after independence, came the news of the fall of Iturbide and the inauguration of the Republic of Mexico: through gathering at Santa Fe, the people were harrassed, and the new regime was applauded as a blessing to New Mexico. When war was declared between the United States and Mexico—an event concerning which the New Mexicans were ignorant, General Stephen Watts Kearny was sent to conquer New Mexico. In 1846 he entered the territory, and General Armijo, the local military chief, fled to Mexico. Kearny took possession of the territory in the name of the United States, promising the people all the rights and liberties which other citizens of the United States enjoyed. The people joyfully accepted American rule, and swore obedience to the Stars and Stripes. At one stroke, no one knew whether he was a Spaniard or a Mexican, people living under Spanish rule, after existing under Spanish institutions for nearly three centuries, was brought under the rule of a foreign race and under new and unknown institutions. After the military occupation by Kearny in 1846, Charles Bent was civil governor. He was murdered at Taos, in 1847, by some Spaniards whom he had grossly offended. In 1847-48 Donaciano Vigil was civil governor.

In 1848, by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, New Mexico was formally ceded by Mexico to the United States, and in 1850 it was regularly organized as a territory (which included Arizona until 1863), and James Calhoun was the first territorial governor. The first territorial Legislature met in Santa Fe, on June 10, 1850, 1916. In 1851 most of the members were of Spanish descent, and this has been true of all the Assemblies until the end of the century. Up to 1910 the proceedings of the Legislature were in Spanish, and the law being always present. During the years 1861-62 the Texan Confederates entered New Mexico, to occupy Albuquerque and Santa Fe, but Federal troops arrived from Colorado and California and (futilely) put an end.

During the years from 1860 to 1890 New Mexico progressed very slowly. Education was in a deplorable state (no system was established until 1890), the surrounding Indians continually harassed the inhabitants, and no railroad was constructed until after 1880. In 1860 the population was 80,597; in 1870, 90,573; in 1880, 109,793. Nine-tenths of the population in 1880 was of Spanish descent; at present this element is only about one-half. This has been due to the constant immigration from the other states of the Union. Since 1890 New Mexico has progressed rapidly. Education is now enthusiastically supported and encouraged, the government has been reorganized, the state has been developed, and the larger towns and cities have all the marks of modern civilization and progress. Since 1890 many unsuccessful attempts have been made to secure statehood; in June, 1911, the New Mexico legislature passed an Enabling Act: New Mexico is to adopt a Constitution, subject to the approval of Congress.

MISSION OF NEW MEXICO. — The Franciscan Friar Marcos de Niza, as we have seen, was the first Spanish missionary under Marcos de Niza entered New Mexico. There is some confusion about their exact number and even about their names. It seems reasonably certain, however, that Marcos had to abandon the expedition after Zuñi, and to receive the instruction of two Franciscan priests, Juan de Padilla and Juan de la Cruz, and a lay brother, Luis de Escolano, continued with the expedition into New Mexico, remained as missionaries among the Indians when Chihuahua was abandoned in 1541, and were finally murdered by them. These were the first three Christian missionaries to receive the crown of martyrdom within the present limits of the United States. Forty years after the Niza and Coronado expeditions of 1539-42, it was again a Franciscan who made an attempt to gain the New Mexico Indians to the Faith. This was Father Agustín Rodríguez, who, in 1581, left San Bartolomé in Northern Mexico and, accompanied by two other friars, Juan de Santa María and Fr. Francisco López, and some seventeen more men, marched up the Rio Grande and visited many of the pueblos on both sides of the river. The friars decided to remain in the new missionary field when the rest of the expedition returned in 1582, but the Indians proved intractable and the two friars received the crown of martyrdom.

When news of the fate of Agustín Rodríguez reached San Bartolomé in Nueva Viscaya, Father Bernardino Beltrán was desirous of making another attempt to evangelize New Mexico, but, being alone, would not remain there. It was in 1598 that Don Juan de Oñate made the first permanent Spanish settlement in New Mexico, at San Juan de los Caballeros. Ten Franciscan friars under Father Alonso Martinez accompanied Oñate in his conquest, and established at San Juan the first Spanish Franciscan mission. Missionary work was begun in earnest, and in 1599 Oñate sent a party to Mexico for re-enforcements. With this party went Fathers Martínez, Salazar, and Vergara to obtain more friars. Salazar died on the way. Martínez did not return, but a new Franciscan comisario, Juan de Escalona, returned to New Mexico with Vergara and eight more Franciscans. New missions were being established in the near pueblos, and prosperity was at hand, but Oñate's ambitions proved fatal: in 1601 he desired to conquer the country to the north and west, and started on an expedition with a small force, taking with him two Franciscans. The people who remained at and near San Juan de los Caballeros were left unprotected. Civil discord followed, and the newly-settled province was abandoned, the settlers, with the friars, moving south. Father Escalona remained, at the risk of his life, to await the return of Oñate; but he had written to the viceroy, asking that Oñate should be recalled. Oñate, with a new comisario, Francisco Escobar, and Father San Buenaventura, set out on another counter-expedition, and Escalona and the other friars continued their missionary work among their neophytes. New re-enforcements arrived between 1605 and 1608, in spite of Oñate's misrule. In 1608 Father Alonso Peñado came as comisario and brought with him eight more friars. By this time 8000 Indians had been converted. By 1617 the Franciscans had built eleven churches and had converted 14,000 Indians.

In 1620 Father Gerónimo de Zárate Salmerón, a very serious missionary, came to New Mexico. There he worked for eight years, and wrote a work on Christian doctrine in the language of the Jémes. By 1626 the missions numbered 27; 34,000 Indians had been baptized, and 43 churches built. Of the friars only 10 were left. In 1630 Fr. Benavides desired to establish a bishopric in New Mexico, and went to Spain to lay his petition before the king. In his memorial he says that there were in New Mexico, in 1630, 25 missions, covering 90 pueblos, attended by 50 friars, and that the Christian natives numbered 60,000. The missions established in New Mexico in 1630, according to this memorial, were the following: among the Piro, or Pecos, 3 missions (Soconoro, Seneed, Sevilleta); among the Ligua, 2 (Sandia, Isleta); among the Quereos, 3; among the Tompios, 6; among the Tanos, 1; among the Pecos, 1; among the Toas, or Tehuas, 3; at Santa Fe, 1; among the Toas, 1; among the Zuñi, 2. The other two are not mentioned. However, the wrongs perpetrated by local governors exasperated the Indians, and the missionaries were thus labouring under difficulties. By 1690 the number of missions had increased to 33, but the Indian rebellion broke out. All the missions and settlements were destroyed, the churches burned, and the settlers massacred. The number of victims among the Spaniards was 400. Of the Franciscans, 11 were killed, while 21 were massacred.

With Don Diego de Vargas, and the reconquest of New Mexico in 1691–95, the Franciscans entered the province again. Father San Antonio was the guardian, but in 1694 he returned to El Paso, and, with Father Francisco Vargas as guardian, the missions were re-established. Not only were most of the old missions again in a prosperous condition, but new ones were established among the Apaches, Navajos, and other tribes. Towards the middle of the eighteenth century, petty disputes arose between the friars and the Bishop of Durango, and the results were unfavorable to the missions, which at this time numbered from 20 to 25. Father Juan Miranda being guardian. In 1760 Bishop Tamarón of Durango visited the province. From this time on the Franciscan missions in New Mexico changed, the friars in many cases acted as parish priests, and their work did not prove so fruitful.

During the last half of the eighteenth century, and during the last years of Spanish rule (1800–1821), the missions declined more and more. The Franciscans still remained, and received salaries from the Government, not as missionaries but as parish priests. They were under their guardian, but the Bishop of Durango controlled religious affairs, with a permanent vicar in New Mexico. The Mexican rule of 1821–1846 was worse than the Spanish rule, and the missions existed only in name.

The missionary work in what is now Arizona was in some respects that of the New Mexican friars, who from the beginning of their labours extended their missions among the Zuñi and the Moquis. A few of these missions, however, had no connexion whatever with the missionary work of New Mexico. After Niza's exploration in 1539, Father Kino wanted to establish missions in Arizona; in 1540, we know little of the missionary work in Arizona proper, until 1633, when Fray Francisco Parras, who was almost alone in his work, was killed at Aguatevi. In 1680 four Franciscans, attending three missions among the Moquis, were killed during the New Mexican rebellion of that year. In Northern Mexico, close to the Arizona line (or, as then known, Pimería Alta), the Jesuits were doing excellent mission work in 1660–1700. It was a Jesuit, also, Father Eusebio Francisco Kino, who explored what is now southern Arizona, in 1687. No missions were established, however, in Arizona before Father Kino's death in 1711, though churches were built, and many Indians converted. The work of Father Kino was abandoned after his death, until 1732, when Fathers Felipè Segesser and Juan B. Grashoffner established the first permanent missions of Arizona at San Xavier del Bac and San Miguel de Guayavi. In 1750 these two missions were attacked and plundered by the Pimas, but the missionaries escaped. In 1752 the missions were reoccupied. A rivalry between the Franciscans and the Jesuits hindered the success of the missions.

In 1767, however, the controversy between Jesuits and Franciscans was ended, and the Jesuits expelled. The Government, not content with their expulsion, confiscated the mission property, though the Franciscans were invited to the field. Four Franciscans arrived in 1768 to renew the missionary work and found the missions in a deplorable state, but they persuaded the Government to help in the restoration and to restore the confiscated property. It is to be observed that those missions of Arizona, as well as many of those of Sonora in Mexico, were, until 1873, under the control of the College of Santa Cruz (just across the Arizona line in Northern Mexico), separated from 1783 to 1791, and united in 1791. The two important Arizona Missions, San Xavier del Bac and San Miguel de Guevavi, became prosperous, the former under the famous Franciscan Father Francisco Garces from 1768 to 1774. Father Garces laboured continually among the Indians until his life, in 1781, in his missionary work near the Colorado River in California. The missions of Arizona declined after 1800, and in 1828 the Mexican Government ordered their abandonment. From this time until 1858, when Bishop Lamy of Santa Fe sent the Rt. Rev. J. P. Machebeuf to minister to the spiritual needs of Arizona, there were no signs of Christianity in Arizona other than abandoned missions and ruined churches.

Pendery Comombo (1910).—Pending the full admission of New Mexico to statehood, its government is still that of a territory of the United States, regulated by the provisions of the Federal Statutes. Accordingly, the governor and other executive officers are appointed by the executive authority of the United States and paid by the Federal Treasury; the Legislature (House of Representatives and Council) is elected by the people of the territory; the Territorial Judiciary (a chief justice and five associate justices) is appointed by the President of the United States for a term of four years, but justices of the peace are elected for two years.

Education.—The educational system of New Mexico dates from 1800 and is still in process of development. The public-school system is governed by a territorial Board of Education consisting of seven members, this board appropriating the school funds, prepares teachers' examinations, selects books, etc. There are also the usual county and district officers. At present there are approximately 1000 public schools in New Mexico, in which 50,000 children, of whom 20,000 are Spanish and 100 negroes. There are 70 denominational schools, with 5000 pupils, and 18 private schools, with 288 pupils. Furthermore, there were, in 1906, 25 Indian schools with 1933 pupils.

The Catholic schools of the territory number 23, with about 100 teachers and about 1500 pupils (estimated in 1910: 1212 in 1908). The most important Catholic institution in New Mexico is St. Michael's College at Santa Fe, founded in 1859 by Bishop J. B. Lamy. The sisters' charitable institutions (hospitals, etc.) are state-aided. In 1909 the appropriations for these purposes amounted to $12,000. The other denominational schools are distributed as follows: Presbyterians, 25; Congregational, 9; Methodist, 11; Baptist, 2. The territorial (or state) university was established in 1889 at Albuquerque. It is supported by territorial appropriations and land revenues. For the year 1909-10 the income was $40,000. Its teaching force consisted, in 1909-10, of 16 professors, associate professors, and instructors, and the number of students in attendance was 130. There are three normal schools, one at Las Vegas, one at El Rito, and one at Silver City, a military school at Roswell; a school of mines at Socorro; and a college of agriculture and mechanics at Mesilla Park — the best-equipped and most efficient school in New Mexico, receiving both federal and territorial aid aggregating $100,000 a year (1909-10), having a teaching force of 40 professors, assistant professors, and instructors, and an attendance of 2868 students (1909-10). The combined valuation of the territory's educational institutions is about $1,000,000, while the annual expenditures aggregate $275,000.

Religion.—In 1834, when New Mexico was organized as a territory of the United States, it (including, till 1843, Arizona and part of Colorado) was made a vicariate Apostolic, under the Rt. Rev. John B. Lamy.

In 1835 New Mexico (with exceptions noted below) was made the Diocese of Santa Fe, and the vicar Apostolic became its first bishop. In 1855 this diocese became the Archdiocese of Santa Fe, and Bishop Lamy became its first archbishop. The archdiocese includes all of New Mexico except Doña Ana, Eddy, and Grant Counties, which belong to the Diocese of Tucson. The present Archbishop of Santa Fe is the Rt. Rev. John B. Pitaval. The Catholic population of the territory in 1882 was 128,000; in 1906 it was 121,558 (U. S. Census Bulletin, no. 103, p. 36). But the figures for 1882 (given by Dr. H. B. Bancroft) must include the Catholic population of Arizona and probably also of Colorado. In 1906 the Catholics were more than 88 per cent of the churchmen who have figured on the territory, which was 137,000, distributed as follows:—

At present (1910) the total Catholic population of New Mexico may be estimated at not less than about 130,000, about 120,000 being of Spanish descent. No definite statistics are available on this last point. The large Catholic population of New Mexico is due to its having been colonized by the Spanish, whose thought on founding a colony was to build churches and establish missions. The recent Catholic immigration has been from the Middle West, and this is largely Irish.

Catholics distinguished in Public Life.—The fact that until about the year 1890 the population of the territory was mostly Spanish, and therefore Catholic, is the reason why most of the prominent Catholics of the territory have been of Spanish origin. Among the more prominent may be mentioned: Donaciano Vigil, Military Governor, 1847-48; Miguel A. Otero, territorial secretary, 1861; delegates to the Federal Congress, José M. Gallegos, 1853-54; Miguel A. Otero, 1855-60; Francisco Peres, 1853-63; José F. Chaves, 1855-70; José M. Gallegos, 1871-72; Trinitario, 1877-78; Mariano S. Otero, 1879-80; Tranquilino Luna, 1881-82; Francisco A. Manzanares, 1883-4. The treasurers and auditors from 1863 to 1886 were all, with but one exception, Catholic Spaniards.

Legislation affecting Religion.—(1) Absolute freedom of worship is guaranteed by the Organic Act constituting the territory, and by statute preference to any religious denomination by law is forbidden. (2) Horse-racing and cock-fighting on Sunday are forbidden; labour, except works of necessity, charity, or mercy, prohibited, and the offence is punishable by a fine of from $5 to $15. (3) No religious test shall be required as a qualification to any office or public trust in this territory. Oaths are administered in the usual fashion, but an affirmation may be used instead when the individual has conscientious scruples against taking an oath. (4) No statute or ordinance constituting the territory ever establishing a church or colony, or establishing, maintaining, or prohibiting worship, or requiring religious tests or the observance of religious ceremonies, or imposing penalties therefor. (5) It is customary to open the sessions of the Legislature with an invocation of the Supreme Being, but there is no statutory authority either for or against this ceremony. Until the present time (1910) this function has always been discharged by a Catholic priest. (6) Christmas is the only religious festival observed as a legal holiday in New Mexico. New Year's Day is also a legal holiday, but the one who first Friday, Ash Wednesday, All Souls' Day, etc., are not recognized. (7) There has been no decision in the courts of New Mexico regarding the seal of confession, but it is to be presumed that, in the absence of any statutory provision covering the point, the courts of the territory would follow the general rule: that confession to a priest is a confidential communication and therefore inviolable. (8) Churches are, in the contemplation of the laws of New Mexico, in the category of charitable institutions. (9) No religious or charitable institution is permitted to hold more than $50,000 worth of property; any property acquired or held contrary to the above prohibition shall be forfeited and escheat to the United States. The property of religious institutions is exempt from taxation when it is being used and devoted exclusively to its appropriate objects, and not used with a view to pecuniary profit. The clergy are exempt from jury and military service. (10) Marriage may be either by religious or by civil ceremony. The male must be eighteen years of age, and the female fifteen, for marriage with parents' consent; after the male is twenty-one and the female eighteen they may marry regardless of parents' consent. Marriages between first cousins, uncle and niece or aunt and nephew, half-brothers and sisters, grand-parent and grand-child, and declared incestuous and absolutely void. (11) Education in the public schools must be non-sectarian. (12) No charitable or religious bequests are recognized unless made in writing duly attested by the lawful number of witnesses. (13) There are no restrictions as to the denominations of schools that they must not be near to running streams. (14) Divorce may be obtained for cruelty, adultery, desertion, and for almost every ground recognized as sufficient in any state of the Union. The party seeking divorce must have been a bona fide resident of the territory for more than a year prior to the date of filing the action. Service on the defendant must be personal. The defendant is within the territory; but may be by publication, if the whereabouts of the defendant are unknown. Trials of divorce are without a jury.

NEW ORLEANS

A Benedictine abbey in Western Australia, founded on 1 March, 1846, by a Spanish Benedictine, Rudesindus Salvado, for the christianizing of the Australian aborigines. It is situated eighty-two miles from Perth, the state capital; its territory is bounded on the south and east by the Diocese of Perth, and on the north by the Diocese of Geraldton. This mission at first had no territory of its own, but was a part of the Diocese of Perth. Its infancy was marked by the misfortunes of old, lived in the wilderness, leading the same nomadic life as the savages whom he had come to lead out of darkness. His food was of the most variable character, consisting of wild roots dug out of the earth by the spears of his swarthy companions, with lizards, iguanas, even worms in times of distress, or, when fortunate in the chase, with the native kangaroo. After three years of unparalleled hardships amongst this cannibal race, Salvado came to the conclusion that they were capable of Christianity. Assisted by some friends, he started for Rome in 1849 to procure auxiliaries and money to assist him in pros-
Louis of New Orleans; raised to its present rank and title 19 July, 1850. Its original territory comprised the ancient Louisiana Purchase and East and West Florida, being bounded on the north by the Canadian line, on the west by the Rocky Mountains and the Rio Perdido, on the east by the Diocese of Baltimore, and on the south by the Diocese of Linares and the Archdiocese of Durango. It includes the State of Louisiana, between the twenty-ninth and thirty-first degree of north latitude, an area of 23,208 square miles. The entire territory of Louisiana has undergone a series of changes which divide its history into four distinct periods.

I. EARLY COLONIAL PERIOD. — The discoverers and pioneers, de Soto, Iberville, La Salle, Bienville, were accompanied by missionaries in their expeditions through the Louisiana Purchase, and in the toilsome beginnings of the first feeble settlements, which were simply military posts, the Cross blazed the way. From the beginning of its history, Louisiana had been placed under the jurisdiction of the Bishop of Quebec. In 1696 the priests of the Seminary of Quebec petitioned the second Bishop of Quebec for authority to establish missions in the West, investing the superior of the same with the powers of vicar-general. The field for which they obtained this authorization (1 May, 1698) was on both banks of the Mississippi and its tributaries. They proposed to plant their first mission among the Tamaroos, but when this became known, the Jesuits referred to the mission of the Tamaroos, and a mission among the Tamaroos, in the Mississippi Valley. In 1699, Iberville, who had sailed down the coast, called his brother-in-law, Bienville and Sauvole, and Father Du Ru, S.J., coming up the estuary of the Mississippi, found Father Montigny among the Tenas Indians. Iberville left Sauvole in command of the little fort at Biloxi, the first permanent settlement in Louisiana. Father Bordenave's first chaplain, thus beginning the long line of zealous parish priests in Louisiana.

In 1703 Bishop St-Vallier proposed to erect Mobile into a parish, and annex it in perpetuity to the seminary; the seminary agreed, and the Parish of Mobile was erected 20 July, 1703, and united to the Seminary of Mobile and Quebec. The permanent mission in the French colonies in 1711, by the discovery of a small group of priests of the Fronde, became known as the Institute of the Free Societies of the Province of Quebec. The missions were not always successful. In 1718, taking with him fifty men, he selected the settlement of New Orleans, about 110 miles from the mouth of the Mississippi River, where there was a deserted Indian village. Bienville directed his men to clear the ground and erect buildings. The city was laid out according to the plans of the Chevalier Le Blond de la Tour, chief engineer of the colony, the plans including a parish church, which was to be called the Church of the Virgin of the Assumption, to be erected in the form of a square, with a central tower, and surrounded by a court of honor. The church was dedicated on the anniversary of the Conversion of St. Louis. The old St. Louis cathedral stands on the site of this first parish church, and the presbytery in Cathedral Alley is the site of the first collegiate church. Bienville called the city New Orleans after the Duke d'Orléans, and the whole territory, Louisiana, New Orleans.

In August, 1717, the Duke d'Orléans, as Regent of France, issued letters patent establishing a joint-stock company to be called "The Company of the West," to which Louisiana was transferred. The company was obliged to build churches at its own expense wherever it should establish settlements; also to maintain the necessary number of duly approved priests to preach, perform Divine service, and administer the sacraments under the authority of the Bishop of Quebec. Bienville experienced much opposition from the Company of the West in his attempt to remove the colony from the north by the Canadian line, on the west by the Rocky Mountains and the Rio Perdido, on the east by the Diocese of Baltimore, and on the south by the Diocese of Linares and the Archdiocese of Durango. The present boundaries include the State of Louisiana, between the twenty-ninth and thirty-first degree of north latitude, an area of 23,208 square miles. The entire territory of Louisiana has undergone a series of changes which divide its history into four distinct periods.

when he landed in New Orleans he could hardly secure a room for himself and his brethren to occupy pending the rebuilding of the presbytery, much less one to convert into a chapel; for the population seemed indifferent to all that savoured of religion. There were less than thirty persons at Mass on Sundays; yet, under the mayor, the missionaries set to work and soon saw their zeal rewarded with a greater reverence for religion and more faithful attendance at church. In 1725 New Orleans had become an important settlement, the Capuchin fathers having left the province of the Gallican Mobile had declined to sixty families, the Apalachee Indians (Catholics) numbered sixty families, there were six at the Balize, two hundred at St. Charles or Lower French Town, and one hundred at Point Coupée, sixty at Natches, fifty at Natchitoches and the other missions which are not named in the “Bullarum Capucinorum” (Vol. VIII, p. 330).

The founder of the Jesuit Mission in New Orleans was Father Nicolas-Ignatius de Beaubois, who was appointed vicar-general for his district. He visited New Orleans and returned to France to obtain Fathers of the Society for his mission. Being also commissioned by Bienville to obtain sisters of some order to assume charge of a hospital and school, he applied to the Ursulines of Rouen, who accepted the call. The royal patent authorizing the Ursulines to found a convent in Louisiana was issued 15 Sept., 1720. Mother Mary Tranchepain of St. Augustin, with seven professed nuns from Rouen, Le Havre, Vannes, Ploermel, Hennebon, and Elbaruf, a novice, Madeleine Hauchard, and two lay-sisters, met at the infirmary at Hennebon on 21 January, 1727, and, accompanied by Fathers Tartarin and Doutrelle, set sail for Louisiana.

They reached New Orleans on 6 August to open the first convent for women within the presidio limits of the United States of America. As the convent was not ready for its reception, the governor gave up his own residence to them. The history of the Ursulines from their departure from Rouen through a period of thirty years in Louisiana, is told by Sister Madeleine Hauchard in a diary still preserved in the Ursuline Convent of New Orleans, and which forms, with Father Charlevoix’s history, the principal record of those early days. On 7 August, 1727, the Ursulines began in Louisiana the work which has since continued without interruption. They opened a hospital for the care of the sick and a school for poor children, also an academy which is now the institution for women in the United States. The convent in which the Ursulines then took up their abode still stands, the oldest conventual structure in the United States and the oldest building within the limits of the Louisiana Purchase. In 1824 the Ursulines removed to the upper portion of the city, and the old convent became first the episcopal residence and then the diocesan chancery.

Meanwhile Father Mathurin le Petit, S.J., established a mission among the Choctaws; Father Du Poisson, among the Arkansas; Father Doutrelle, on the Wabash; Fathers Tartarin and Le Boulenger, at Kaskaskia; Father Guyonneau among the Metchogames; Father Soul, among the Yassos; Father Baudouin, among the Chickasaws. The Natchez Indians, provoked by the tyranny and rapacity of Chopart, the French commandant, in 1729 nearly destroyed all these missions. Father Du Poisson and Father Soul were killed by the Indians. As an instance of the faith implanted in the Iroquois about this time there was received at the Ursuline Order at New Orleans, Mary Turpin, daughter of a Canadian father and an Illinois mother. She died a professed nun in 1761, at the age of fifty-two with the distinction of being the first American woman to enter this country. From the beginning of the colony at Biloxi the immigration of women had been small. Bienville made constant appeals to the mother country to send honest wives and mothers. From time to time ships freighted with girls would arrive; they came over in charge of the Grey Nuns of Canada and a priest, and were sent by the king to be married to the colonists. The Bishop of Quebec was also charged with the duty of sending out young men who were known to be good and virtuous. As a proof of her respectability, each girl was furnished by the bishop with a curiously wrought casket; they are known in Louisiana history as “casket girls”. Each band of girls, on arriving at New Orleans, was confined in the care of the Grey Nuns until they were married to colonists able to provide for their support. Many of the best families of the state are proud to trace their descent from “casket girls”.

The city was growing and developing; a better class of immigrant was pouring in, and Father Charlevoix, on his visit in 1728, wrote to the Duchesse de Lesdiguières: “My hopes, I think, are well founded that this wild and deserted place, which the reeds and trees still cover, will be one day, and that not far distant, a city of opulence and the metropolis of a rich colony.” His words were fast developing, and early chronicles say that it suggested the splendours of Paris. There was a governor with a military staff, bringing to the city the manners and splendour of the Court of Versailles, and the manners and usages of the mother country. Stamps on Louisiana life characteristics in marked contrast to the life of any other American colony. The Jesuit Fathers of New Orleans had no parochial residence, but directed the Ursulines, and had laid out in their private chapel and a plantation where, in 1751, they introduced into Louisiana the culture of the sugar-cane, the orange, and the fig. The Capuchin Fathers, they could have boasted that the Valleri had been succeeded by Bishop de Mornay, who never went to Quebec, but resigned the see, after five years. His successor, Henri-Marie Du Breuil de Pontbriand, appointed Father de Beaubois, S.J., his vicar-general in Louisiana. The Capuchin Fathers refused to recognize Father de Beaubois’ authority, claiming, under the agreement of the Company of the West with the coadjutor bishop, de Mornay, that the superior of the Capuchins was, in perpetuity, vicar-general of the province, and that the bishop could appoint no other. Succeeding bishops of Quebec declared, however, that they could not, as bishops, advance the foundation and vicegerent of a new see, but that they would enter into an agreement with a trading company who had forever deprived every bishop of Quebec of the right to act as freely in Louisiana as in any other part of his diocese. This incident gave rise to some friction between the two orders which has been spoken of derisively by Louisiana historians, notably by Gayarré, as “The War of the Capuchins and the Jesuits.” The archives of the diocese, as also the records of the Capuchins in Louisiana, show that it was simply a question of jurisdiction, which gave rise to a discussion so petty as to be unworthy of notice. Historians exaggerate this beyond all importance, while failing to chronicle the shameful spoliation of the Jesuits by the French Government which suddenly settled the question forever.

In 1761 the Parliament of several provinces of France had condemned the Jesuits, and measures were taken against them in the kingdom. They were expelled from Paris, and the Superior Council of Louisiana, following the example, on 9 June, 1763, just ten years before the order was suppressed by Clement XIV, passed an act suppressing the Jesuits throughout the province, declaring them dangerous to royal authority, to the rights of the bishops, and to the public safety. The Jesuits were charged with neglecting their mission, with havings developed the plague among the Indians, and with having usurped the office of vicar-general. To the first charge the record of their labours was sufficient refutation; to the second, it was assuredly to the credit of the Jesuits that they made their plantation so productive as to maintain their missionaries; to the third, the action of the bishops of Quebec in appointing the vicar-general and that of the Superior Council itself in sustaining him was the answer. Nevertheless, the unjust decree was carried out, the Jesuits' property was confiscated, and they were forbidden to use the names of their society to wear their habit. Their property was sold for $180,000. All their chapels were levelled to the ground, leaving exposed even the vaults where the dead were interred. The Jesuits were ordered to give up their missions, to return to New Orleans and to leave on the first vessel sailing for France. The Capuchins forgetting their difference interfered in behalf of the Jesuits; and finding their petitions unavailing went to the river bank to receive the returning Jesuits, offered them a home alongside of their own, and in every way showed their disapproval of the Council's action. The Jesuits deeply grateful left the Capuchins all the books they had been able to save from the spoliation.

Father Boudoin, S.J., the benefactor of the colony, who had introduced the culture of sugar-cane and oranges from San Domingo, and figs from Provence, a man to whom the people owed much and to whom Louisiana to-day owes so much of its prosperity, alone remained. He was now seventy-two years old and had spent thirty-five in the colony. He was broken in health and too ill to leave his room. They dragged him to the street where the prominent citizens intervened and one wealthy planter, Etienne de Boré, who had first succeeded in the granulation of sugar, defied the authorities, and took Father Boudoin to his house and sheltered him until his death on July 7th, 1760. The most monstrous part of the order of expulsion was that, not only were the chapels of the Jesuits in lower Louisiana—many of which were the only places where Catholics worshipped—closed, but the deists were allowed to go to church in the Illinois district, which had been given to the Crown of England and which was no longer subject to France or Louisiana. They ordered even the vestments and plate to be delivered to the king's attorney. Thus was a vast territory left destitute of priests and altars, and the growth of the Church retarded for many years. Of the Capuchins left to administer to this immense territory, five were retained in New Orleans; the remainder were scattered over the various missions. It is interesting to note that the only native Louisiana priest at this time and the first of the season was Rev. Bernard Viol, born in New Orleans 1 October, 1736, was among the Jesuits expelled from the colony. He died in France, 1821. The inhabitants of New Orleans then numbered four thousand.

II. Spanish Period.—In 1763 Louisiana was ceded to Spain, and Antonio Ulloa was sent over to take possession. The colonists were bitterly opposed to the cession and finally rose in arms against the governor, giving him three days in which to leave the town. (See Lousiana.) The Spanish Government resolved to punish the parties who had so insulted its representative, Don Ulloa, and sent Alexander O'Reilly to assume the office of governor. Lafrenière, President of the Council, who chiefly instigated the passing of the decree expelling the Jesuits from the colony, and the rebellion against the Government, was tried by court martial and with six of his partners in his scheme, was shot in the Place d'Armes. O'Reilly reorganized the province after the Spanish model. The oath taken by the officials shows that the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception was then officially recognized in the Spanish dominions. "I—appointed—swear before God . . . to maintain . . . the mystery of the Immaculate Conception of Our Lady, the Virgin Mary." The change of government affected ecclesiastical jurisdiction. The Province of Louisiana passed under the jurisdiction of the Bishop of Santiago de Cuba, the Right Rev. Jaime José de Ezpevello, and Spanish Capuchins began to fill the places of their French brethren. Contradictory reports reached the new bishop about conditions in Louisiana and he sent Father Cirilo de Barcelona with four Spanish Capuchins to New Orleans. These priests were Fathers Francisco, Angel de Revillagigedos, Louis de Quintanilla, and Alemán. They reached New Orleans, 19 July, 1773. The genial ways of the French brethren seemed scandalous to the stern Spanish disciplinarian, and he informed the Bishop of Cuba as to what he considered "lax methods of conduct and administration". Governor Unzaga, however, interfered in behalf of the French Capuchins, and wrote to the bishop concerning the Spanish friars. This offended the bishop and both referred the matter to the Spanish Court. The Government expressed no opinion, but advised the prelate and governor to compromise, and to preserve harmony between the civil and ecclesiastical authorities. Some Louisiana historians, Charles Gayarré among others, speak of the depravity of the clergy of that period. These charges are not borne out by contemporary testimony; the archives of the cathedral witness that the clergy performed their work faithfully. These charges as a rule sprang from monastic prejudices or secular antipathies. One of the first acts of Father Cirilo as pastor of the St. Louis Cathedral was to have the catechism printed in French and Spanish.

The Bishop of Santiago de Cuba resolved to remedy the deplorable conditions in Louisiana, where confirmation had never been administered. In visitation to visit this distant portion of his diocese, he asked for the appointment of an auxiliary bishop, who would take up his abode in New Orleans, and hence visit the missions on the Mississippi. On 24 August, 1778, he appointed Father Cirilo de Barcelona titular Bishop of Tricali and auxiliary of Santiago. He was consecrated in Cuba in 1781 and proceeded to New Orleans where for the first time the people enjoyed the presence of a bishop. A saintly man, he infused new life into the province. The whole of Louisiana and the Floridas were under his jurisdiction. According to the official records of the Church in Louisiana in 1785, the diocese of St. Louis, New Orleans, had a parish priest, four assistants; and there was a resident priest at each of the following points: Terre aux Boeufs, St. Charles, St. John the Baptist, St. James, Anse a l'Arbre, Gabriel's at Iberville, Point Coupee, Attakapas, Ope- lousas, Natchitoches, Natchez, St. Louis, St. Genevieve, and at Bernard or Mancha (now Galveston). On 25 November, 1785, Bishop Cirilo appointed as parish priest of New Orleans Rev. Antonio Ildefonso Morenory Arze de Sedella, one of the six Capuchins who had come to the colony in 1779. Father Antonio (popularly known as "Père Antoine") was destined to exert a remarkable influence in the colony. Few priests have been more assailed by historians, but a careful comparison of the ancient records of the cathedral with the traditions and recollections of his memory show that he did not deserve on the one hand the indignities which Gayarré and Shea heap upon him, nor yet the excessive honours with which tradition has crowned him. From the cathedral archives it has been proven that he was simply an earnest priest striving to do what he thought his duty amid many difficulties.

In 1787 a number of unfortunate Acadians came at the expense of the King of France and settled near Plaquemines, Terre aux Boeufs, Bayou Lafourche, Attakapas, and Opehouenang, adding to the already thrifty colony. They brought with them the precious Register of St. Charles aux Mines in Acadia extending from 1689 to 1749, only six years before their cruel deportation. These were deposited for safe keeping with the priest of St. Gabriel at Iberville and are now in the diocesan archives. St. Augustine being returned to Spain by the treaty of peace of 1783, the King of Spain made efforts to provide for the future of Catholicism in that ancient province. As many English people had settled there and in West Florida, notably at Baton Rouge and Natchez, Charles III applied to the Irish College for priests to attend the English-speaking population. Accordingly Rev. Michael O'Reilly and Rev. Thomas Hassett were sent to Florida. Catholic worship was restored, the city at once resuming its own old aspect. Rev. William Savage, a clergyman of great repute, Rev. Michael Lampert, Rev. Gregory White, Rev. Constantine Makenna, Father Joseph Denis, and a Franciscan with six fathers of his order, were sent to labour in Louisiana. They were distributed through the Natchez and Baton Rouge districts, and were the first Irish priests to come to Louisiana, the pioneers of a long and noble line to whom this archdiocese owes much. In 1787, the Holy See divided the Diocese of Santiago de Cuba, erected the Bishopric of St. Christopher of Havana, Louisiana, and the Floridas, with the Right Rev. Joseph de Trespalacios of Porto Rico as bishop, and the Right Rev. Cirilo de Barros as auxiliary, with the special direction of Louisiana and the two Floridas. Louisiana thus formed a part of the Diocese of Havana.

Near Fort Natchez the site for a church was purchased on April 11, 1788. The earliest incumbent of whom any record was kept was Rev. Francis Lennon. Most of the people of Natchez were English Protestants or Americans, who had sided with England. They enjoyed absolute religious freedom, no attempt to proselytize was ever made. On Good Friday, 21 March, 1788, New Orleans was swept by a conflagration in which nine hundred buildings, including the parish church, with the adjoining convent of the Capuchins, the house of Bishop Cirilo and the Spanish School, were reduced to ashes. From the ruins of the old irregularly built French City rose the stately Spanish City, designed to become the capital of New Orleans, practically unaltered as it exists to-day. Foremost among the public-spirited men of that time was Don Andreas Almonaster y Rojas, of a noble Andalusian family and royal Spanish blood preserved for the colony. He had made a great fortune in New Orleans, and at a cost of $50,000 he built and gave to the city the St. Louis Cathedral. He rebuilt the house for the use of the clergy and the Charity Hospital at a cost of $2,425. In 1788 he and his associates formed the Uraslins, a corporation, and the bill of the Eraslan was founded and the Lens Hospital.

Meanwhile rapid assimilation had gone on in Louisiana. Americans began to make their homes in New Orleans and in 1791 the insurrection of San Domingo drove there many hundreds of wealthy noble exiles. The archives of the New Orleans Diocese show that the King of Spain petitioned Pope Pius VI on 20 May, 1790, to erect Louisiana and the Floridas into a separate see, and on April 9, 1793, a decree for the diocesanization of the Diocese of Havana, Louisiana, and the Provinces of East and West Florida was issued. It provided for the erection of the See of St. Louis of New Orleans, which was to include all the Louisiana French Dioceses of East and West Florida. The Bishops of Mexico, Agapito, Michoacan, and Caracas were to contribute, pro rata, a fund for the support of the Bishop of New Orleans, until such time as the See would be self-sustaining. The decree left the choice of a bishop for the new see to the King of Spain, and on 25 April, 1793, wrote to Bishop Cirilo relieving him of his office of auxiliary, and directing him to return immediately to Cataonia with a salary of one thousand dollars a year, which the Bishop of Havana was to contribute. Bishop Cirilo returned to Havana and seems to have resided with the Hospital Friars, while endeavouring to obtain his salary, so that he might return to Europe. It is not known where Bishop Cirilo died in poverty and humiliation.

The Right Rev. Luis Peralver y Cárdenas was appointed first bishop of the new See of Saint Louis of New Orleans. He was a native of Havana, born 3 April, 1719, and had been educated by the Jesuits of his native city, receiving his degree in the university in 1771. He was a priest of irreproachable character, and a skillful director of souls. He was consecrated in the cathedral of Havana in 1783. The St. Louis parish church, now raised to the dignity of a cathedral, was dedicated 23 December, 1794. A letter from the king, 14 August, 1794, decreed that its donor, Don Almonaster, was authorized to occupy the most prominent seat in the church, second only to that of the viceregal patron, the intendant of the province, and to receive the kiss of peace during the Mass. Don Almonaster died in 1795 and was buried under the altar of the Sacred Heart.

Bishop Peralver arrived in New Orleans, 17 July, 1795. In a report to the king and the Holy See he betrayed the indifference he entertained as to the public religious duties. He condemned the laxity of morals among the men, and the universal custom of concubinage among the slaves. The invasion of many persons of good fortune to the faith, and the toleration in admitting all classes of adventurers for purposes of trade, had brought about disrespect for religion. He deplored the establishment of trading posts, and of a lodge of French Freemasons, which counted among its members city officials, officers of the garri son, merchants and foreigners. He believed the people clung to their French traditions. He said that the King of Spain possessed "their bodies but not their souls". He declared that "even the Ursuline Nuns, from whom good results were obtained in the education of girls, were so decidedly French in their inclinations that they refused to admit Spanish women, who wished to become members of their order, and many were in tears because they were obliged to read spiritual exercises in Spanish books". It was a gloomy picture he presented: but he set faithfully to work and on 21 December, 1795, called a synod, the first and only one held in the diocese of colonial New Orleans. He also issued a letter of instruction to the clergy deploring the fact that many of his flock were more than sixty years of age, and had no one to repair at one time to all. He enjoined the pastors to walk in the footsteps of Jesus Christ and in all things to fulfill their duties. This letter of instruction bearing his signature is preserved in the archives of the diocese, and, with the call for the synod, forms the only documents signed by the first Bishop of New Orleans.

Bishop Peralver everywhere showed himself active in the cause of educational progress and was a generous benefactor of the poor. He was promoted to the See of Guatemala, 20 July, 1801. Before his departure he appointed, as vicar-general, Rev. Thomas Cannon, a close friend of the Bishop. His successor, who became officially recognized as "Governors of the Diocese".

Territorially from this ancient see have been erected the Archdioceses of St. Louis, Cincinnati, St. Paul, Dubuque, and Chicago, the Dioceses of New Orleans, Biloxi, Mobile, Natchez, Galveston, San Antonio, Little Rock, St. Augustine, Kansas City, St. Joseph, Davenport, Cheyenne, Dallas, Winona, Duluth, Concordia, Omaha, St. Paul, Twin Falls, Oklahoma, St. Cloud, Bismarck, and Cleveland.

Right Rev. Francis Porro y Peinade, a Franciscan of the Convent of the Holy Apostles, Rome, was appointed to succeed Bishop Peralver. But he never took possession of the see. Some old chronicles in Louisiana say that he was never consecrated; others that he was, and died on the eve of leaving Rome. Bishop Porlier (Spalding's "Life of Bishop Pasquet"), says that he was translated to the See of Tarragona. The See of New Orleans remained vacant many years after the departure of Bishop Peteliver.
NEW ORLEANS

In 1798 and 1799, and 1801, and 1802, the French took New Orleans. They were received with honour, and with a gentlemanly courtesy. The French Governor, Government, and the Catholic Church in Louisiana, were never submitted to any interference of the civil power. The French Governor, Government, and the Catholic Church in Louisiana, were never submitted to any interference of the civil power. The French Governor, Government, and the Catholic Church in Louisiana, were never submitted to any interference of the civil power.

III. FRENCH AND AMERICAN PERIOD.—By the Treaty of San Ildefonso, the Spanish King on 1 Oct., 1800, engaged to retrocede Louisiana to the French Republic six months after certain conditions and stipulations had been executed on the part of France, and the Holy See deferred the appointment of a bishop.

On 30 April, 1803, without waiting for the actual transfer of the province, Napoleon Bonaparte by the Treaty of Paris sold Louisiana to the United States. De Laussat, the French Commissioner, had reached New Orleans on 26 March, 1803, to take possession of the province in the name of France. Spain was prepared to evacuate and general confusion prevailed. The Very Rev. Thomas Hassett, the administrator of the diocese, was directed to address each priest and ascertain whether they preferred to return with the Spanish forces or remain in Louisiana; also to obtain from each parish an inventory of the plate, vestments, and other articles in the Church which had been given by the Spanish Government. Then came the news of thecession of the province to the United States. On 30 April, 1803, De Laussat formally surrendered the colony to the United States commissioners. The people felt it keenly, and the cathedral archives show the difficulties to which the Bishop was subjected. Father Hassett, as administrator, issued a letter to the clergy on 10 June, 1803, announcing the new domination and notifying all of the permission to return to Spain if they desired. Several priests signified their desire to follow the Spanish standard. The question of withdrawal was also discussed by the Ursuline Nuns. Thirteen out of the twenty-one choir nuns were in favour of returning to Spain or going to Havana. De Laussat went to the convent and assured them that they could remain unmolested. Notwithstanding this Mother St. Monica and eleven others, with nearly all the lay sisters applied to the Marquis de Casa Calvo to convey them to Havana. Six choir nuns and two lay sisters remained to begin again the work in Louisiana. They elected Mother St. Xavier Farquhar superior, and resumed all the exercises of community life, maintaining their academy, day school, orphan asylum, hospital and instructions for coloured people in catechism. Father Hassett wrote to Bishop Carroll, 23 December, 1803, that the retrocession of the province to the United States of America involved him to present to his consideration the present ecclesiastical state of Louisiana, not doubting that it would soon fall under his jurisdiction. The ceded province consisted of twenty-one parishes some of which were vacant. "If the churches were", to use his own words, "all decent temples and comfortably supplied with ornaments and everything necessary for divine services. . . . Of twenty-six ecclesiastics in the province only four have agreed to continue their respective stations under the French Government; and whether any more would remain under that of the United States only God knew." Father Hassett said that for his own part he could not without propriety relinquish his post, and consequently awaited superior orders to take his departure. He said that the Rev. Patrick Walsh, vicar-general and auxiliary bishop of the diocese, had declared that he would not abandon his post providing he could hold it with propriety. Father Hassett died in April 1804. Father Antonio Sedella had returned to New Orleans in 1791, and resumed his duties as parish priest of the St. Louis Cathedral to which he had been appointed by Bishop Cirilo. After the cession a dispute arose between Father Walsh and the latter, 27 March, 1805, established the Ursuline Convent as the only place in the parish for the administration of the sacraments and the celebration of Mass. On 21 March, 1805, the Ursulines addressed a letter to Thomas Jefferson, President of the United States, in which they solicited the passage of an Act of Congress guaranteeing their property and rights. The president replied reassuring them that it would "be perceived that it will meet with all the protection the my office can give it."

Father Walsh, administrator of the diocese, died on 28 August, 1806, and was buried in the Ursuline chapel. The Archdiocesan See was then transferred to Santo Domingo, the archbishopric of the province, to which the See of Louisiana was transferred. Father Antoine had opened an intrigue against the Government; but beyond accusations made to Bishop Carroll there is nothing to substantiate them. He was much loved in New Orleans and some of his friends desired to obtain the influence of the French Government to have him appointed to the Bishopric of Louisiana. However, the Archbishop of New Orleans sent a letter to Father Antoine to the Bishop of Baltimore declaring that having heard that some members of the clergy and laity had applied to Rome to have him appointed to the Bishopric of Louisiana, he hereby declared to the Bishop of Baltimore that he could not consider the proposition, that he was unworthy of the honour and too old to do any good. He would be grateful to the bishop if he would cut short any further efforts in that direction.

Bishop Carroll wrote to James Madison, secretary of State (17 November, 1806) in regard to the Church in Louisiana, and the recommending of two or three clergymen one of whom might be appointed Bishop of New Orleans. Mr. Madison replied that the matter being purely ecclesiastical the Government could not interfere. He seemed, however, to share the opinions of Bishop Carroll in regard to the character and rights of Father Antoine. In 1806 a decree of the Propaganda confided Louisiana to the care of Bishop Carroll of Baltimore, and created him administrator Apostolic. He appointed Rev. John O'Leary (who had been ordained in Kilkenny until 1803), Vicar-General of Louisiana and chaplain of the Ursuline Nuns at New Orleans. Father Olivier presented his documents to the Governor of Louisiana, and also wrote to Father Antoine apprising him of the action of the Propaganda. Father Antoine called upon Father Olivier, but he was not satisfied as to Bishop Carroll's authorization. The vicar-general published the decree and the bishop’s letter to the convent chapel. The Rev. Thomas Flynn wrote from St. Louis, 8 Nov., 1806, that the trustees were about to install him. He describes the church as a good one with a tolerably good bell, a high altar, and commodious pews. The house for the priest was convenient, but in need of repair. Except Rev. Father Mathew there was scarcely a priest in Upper Louisiana in 1807.

As the original rescript issued by the Holy See to Bishop Carroll had not been so distinct and clear as to obviate objections, he applied to the Holy See asking that more ample and distinct authorization be sent. The Holy See placed the Province of Louisiana under Bishop Carroll who was requested to send to the New Orleans Diocese either Rev. Charles Nerinckx or some secular or regular priest, with the rank of administrator Apostolic and the rights of an ordinary to continue only at the good will of the Holy See according to instructions to be forwarded by the Propaganda. Bishop Carroll did not act immediately, but on 18 August, 1812, appointed the Rev. Louis G. V. Dubourg, administrator Apostolic of the Diocese of Louisiana and the two Floridas. Dr. Dubourg’s authority was at once recognized by Father Antoine and the remainder of the clergy. The war between the United States and Great Britain was in progress and as the year 1814 drew to a close, Dr. Dubourg issued a pastoral letter on the necessity of union of the people to pray for the success of the American arms. During the battle of New Orleans (8 January, 1815) Gen. Andrew Jackson sent a messenger to the Ursuline Convent to ask for prayers for his success. When victory came he sent a courier thanking the sisters for the prayers for his success and a solemn high Mass was celebrated in the St. Louis Cathedral, 23 January, 1815. The condition of religion in the diocese was not encouraging; seven out of fourteen parishes were vacant. Funds were also needed, and Dr. Dubourg went to Rome to ask for aid for his diocese. There the Propaganda appointed him bishop, 18 September, 1818, and on 24 Sept. he was consecrated by Cardinal Joseph Pampili (see Dubourg).

Bishop Dubourg proposed the division of the diocese and the erection of a see in Upper Louisiana, but the expenses of troubles caused the project to be abandoned, and the attempt of the trustees to obtain a charter depriving the bishop of his cathedral so alarmed him that he solicited the Propaganda to allow him to take up his residence in St. Louis and establish his seminary and other educational institutions there. He sailed from Bordeaux for New Orleans (28 June, 1817), accompanied by five priests, four subdeacons, eleven seminarians, and three Christian Brothers. He took possession of the church at St. Genevieve, a ruined wooden structure, and was installed by Bishop Flaget. He then established the Lazarist Seminary at Bois Brule ("The Barrens"), and brought from Bardstown, where they were temporarily sojourned, Father Andreis, Father Rosati, and the seminarians who had accompanied him from Europe. The Brothers of the Christian Doctrine opened a boys’ school at St. Genevieve. At his request the Religious of the Sacred Heart, comprising Mmes. Desmases Philippe Duchesme, Berthold, Andre, and two lay sisters reaching New Orleans, 30 May, 1818, proceeded to St. Louis and opened their convent at Florissant. In 1821 they established a convent at Grand Coteau, Louisiana. The Faith made great progress throughout the diocese. On 1 January, 1821, Bishop Dubourg held the first synod since the Purchase of Louisiana. When he had found ten superannuated priests there were now forty active, zealous men at work. Still appeals came from all parts of the immense diocese for priests; among others he received a letter from the Nuns of the Ursulines of Ghent, begging him to send a priest to minister to 1500 Catholics there who had never had any one to attend to them. The Ursuline Nuns, frequently annoyed by being summoned to court, appealed to the Legislature claiming the privileges they had enjoyed under the French and Spanish dominations. Their ancient rights were recognized and a law was passed, 28 January, 1818, enacting that where the testimony of a nun was required it should be taken at the convent by commission. It had a far-reaching effect in later days upon legislation in the United States in similar cases. Spain by treaty ceded Florida to the United States, 22 February, 1818, and Bishop Dubourg was then able to extend his episcopal care to that part of his diocese, the vast extent of which prompted him to form plans for the erection of a metropolitan see west of the Alleghanies. This did not meet with the approval of the bishops of the United States; he then proposed to divide the Diocese of Louisiana and the Floridas, establishing a see at New Orleans embracing Lower Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, and Florida. Finally, 13 August, 1822, the Vicariate Apostolic of Mississippi and Alabama was formed with the Rev. Joseph Rosati, elected Bishop of Tenagre, as vicar Apostolic. But Archbishop Marechal of Baltimore remonstrated because in establishing this vicariate, the Propaganda had inadvertently invaded the rights of the Archbishop of Baltimore as the whole of those States except a small portion south of the thirty-first degree between the Perdido and the Apalachicola River belonged to the Diocese of Baltimore. Bishop Rosati also wrote representing the poverty and paucity of the Catholics in Mississippi and Alabama, and the necessity of his remaining at the head of the seminary. Finally, his arguments and the protest of the Archbishop of Baltimore prevailed, and the Holy See suppressed the vicariate, appointing Dr. Rosati coadjutor to Bishop Dubourg to reside at St. Louis. Bishop Rosati was consecrated by Bishop Dubourg, at Donaldsonville, 25 March, 1824, and proceeded at once to St. Louis. In 1823 Bishop Dubourg took up the subject of the Indian Missions and laid before the Government the necessity of a plan for the establishment of the missions of the Indians west of the Mississippi. His plan met with the approval of the Government and an allowance of $200 a year was assigned to four or five missionaries, to be increased if the project proved successful.

On 29 August, 1825, Alabama and the Floridas were erected into a vicariate Apostolic, with the Rev. Michael Portier the first bishop. The Holy See divided the Diocese of Louisiana into two sees, 17 August, 1827, the one established the See of New Orleans with Louisiana as its diocese, and the Vicariate Apostolic of Mississippi to be administered by the Bishop of New Orleans. The country north of Louisiana was made the Diocese of St. Louis, Bishop Rosati being transferred to that see. Bishop Dubourg, though a man of vast projects and of great service to the Church, was little versed in business methods; discouraged at the difficulties that rose to thwart him he resigned his see and was transferred to Montauban. Bishop Rosati, appointed to the See of New Orleans, declined the appointment urging that his knowledge of English qualified him to labour better in Missouri and Arkansas, while he was not sufficiently versed in French to address the people of New Orleans with success. On 20 March, 1827, the papal Brief arrived permitting him to remain in St. Louis but charging him for a while with the administration of the See of New Orleans. He appointed the Rev. Leo Raymond de Neckere, C.M., vicar-general, and strongly recommended his appointment for the vacant see. Father de Neckere, then in Belgium, where he had found ten superannuated priests there were now forty active, zealous men at work. Still appeals came from all parts of the immense diocese for priests; among others he received a letter from the Nuns of the Ursulines of Ghent, begging him to send a priest to minister to 1500 Catholic by Bishop Dubourg. He joined the Lazarists and was ordained in St. Louis, Missouri, 13 October, 1822. On 23 February, 1832, he convoked a synod attended by twenty-one priests. Regulations were promulgated for better discipline and steps were taken to form an association for the rescue of the freed men. In 1834 Bishop Blanchard, V.G., founded the Sisters of the Holy Family, whose chief duty was the care of the coloured orphans and the aged coloured poor. It was the first coloured sisterhood founded in the United States, and one of the only two that exist.

Bishop Blanché planned the erection of new parishes in the City of New Orleans, and St. Joseph’s and the Annunciation were founded in 1844. The foundation of these parishes greatly diminished the power of the cathedral and the trustees seeing their influence waning entered upon a new war against religion. Upon the death of Father Aloysius Moni, Bishop Blanché appointed Father C. Maenhaut rector of the cathedral, but the wardens refused to recognize his appointment, claiming the right of patronage formerly enjoyed by the King of Spain. They brought an action against the bishop in the parish court, but the judge decided against the trustees, and the case was appealed to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court decided that the right to nominate a parish priest, or the jus patronatus of Spanish law, was abrogated in the state, and the decision of the Holy See was sustained and the wardens refused to recognize the decision and the bishop ordered the clergy to withdraw from the cathedral and parochial residence. One of the members of the board, who was a member of the city council, obtained the passage of a law punishing by fine any priest who should perform the burial service over a dead body except in the old mortuary chapel of the church. The parochial priest had to acquire a dispensation from the bishop and he was a member of the city council. The Jesuits protected the church and were able to carry on their work.

The old church had long outlived its purpose, and on 19 December, 1842, Judge Prevost decided the ordinance illegal, and the Supreme Court of the United States sustained his decision. The faithful of St. Patrick’s parish having publicly protested against the outrageous proceedings, the tide of public opinion set in strongly against the men who treated the church with such brutality.

In January, 1843, the latter submitted and received the parish priest appointed by the bishop. Soon after the faithful Catholics of the city petitioned the Legislature to amend the Act incorporating the cathedral, and bring it in a harmonious way with the new civil and ecclesiastical discipline. Even after the decision of the Legislature the bishop felt that he could not treat with the wardens as they defied his authority by authorizing the erection of a monument to Freemasons in the Catholic cemetery of St. Louis. To free the faithful, he therefore continued to plan for the organisation of parishes and the erection of new churches. Only one low Mass was said at the cathedral, and that on Sunday. Bishop Blanché convened the third synod of the diocese on 21 April, at which the clergy were warned against yielding to the illegal claims of trustees, and the erection of any church without a deed being first made to the bishop was forbidden. For the churches in which the trustees system still existed special regulations were made, governing the method of keeping accounts. At the close of 1844 the trustees were suspended in the courts and held in contempt by public opinion throughout the diocese, yielded completely to Bishop Blanché.

This controversy terminated a period of remarkable activity in the organization of parishes and the building of new churches set in. The cornerstone of St. Mary’s, intended to replace the old Ursuline chapel attached to the bishop’s house, was laid on 16 Feb., 1845; that of St. Joseph’s on 16 April, 1846; that of the Annunciation on 10 May, 1846. The Redemptorists founded the parish of the Assumption, and were installed in its church on 22 Oct., 1847. The parish of Mater Dolorosa at Carrollton (then a suburb) was founded on 8 Sept.; that of the Holy Name of Mary at Algiers on 18 Dec., 1848. In 1849 St. Stephen's parish in the then suburb of Boulliguy under the Lazaret Fathers and Sts. Peter and Paul came into existence. The cornerstone of the Redemptorist church of St. Alphonsus was laid by the famous Apostle of Temperance, Father Mathieu. Two years later it was found necessary to enlarge this church, and a school was added. In 1851 the foundation-stone of the church of the Immaculate Conception was laid, on the site of a humber edifice erected in 1849. It was said to make the finest church in the world dedicated to the Immaculate Conception. The parishes of St. John the Baptist in the upper town and of St. Anne in the French quarter were organized in 1852.

The French congregation of Notre-Dame de Bon Secours was organized on 16 Jan., 1858. In the midst of great progress yellow fever broke out and five priests and two Sisters of Charity swelled the roll of martyrs. The devoted services of the Sisters of Charity, especially during the ravages of the yellow fever, in attending the sick and caring for the orphans who were so highly appreciated by the Legislature that in 1856 the State made them a grant of land near Donaldsonville for the opening of a novitiate, and a general subscription was made throughout the diocese for this purpose. The sisters established themselves in Donaldsonville the same year. In 1843, anxious to provide for the wants of the increasing German and Irish emigration, Bishop Blanchet had summoned the Congregation of the Redemptorists to the diocese and the German parish of St. Mary's Assumption was founded by Rev. Czackert of that congregation. In 1847 the work of the Society of Jesus in the diocese, which had been temporarily suspended, was resumed under the direction of Father Blackey, and a college building was started on 10 June. In the following year Father Maisonnaihe and a brilliant young Irish associate, Father Blackey, fell victims to yellow fever. The population of New Orleans now numbered over fifty thousand, among whom were many German immigrants. Bishop Blanchet turned over the old Ursuline chapel to the Germans of the lower parish of the city, and when the German church was erected, which finally resulted in the foundation of the Holy Trinity parish on 28 October, 1847. In 1849 the College of St. Paul was opened at Baton Rouge. On 13 July, 1852, St. Charles College became a corporate institution with Rev. J. Jourdian, S.J., as president. In 1852 Bishop Blanchet attended the Seventh Council of Baltimore at which the bishops expressed their desire that the See of New Orleans be raised to metropolitain rank. On 10 July, 1850, Pius X established the Archdiocese of New Orleans, Bishop Blanchet being raised to the archiepiscopal dignity. The Province of New Orleans was to embrace New Orleans with Mobile, Natchez, Little Rock, and Galveston as suffragan sees. The spirit of Knwothothingism invaded New Orleans as other parts of the United States, and Archbishop Bianco found himself in the thick of the battle. Public debates were held, and committees were formed among those who disapproved the society in the Classics. In Louisiana the Rev. Joseph Semmes, a distinguished advocate, Rev. Francis Xavier Leray and Rev. N. J. Perche, both of Paris, were sent as missionaries in New Orleans. Father Perche founded (1844) a French diocesan journal "Le Propagateur Catholique", which vigorously assailed the Knownothing doctrines. On 8 June a mob attacked the office of the paper, and several days later the office was broken into and the presses, breaking doors and windows and hurling insults at the nuns.

In 1855 New Orleans was desolated by the worst epidemic of yellow fever in its history, seven priests and five sisters being among its victims. On 6 March, 1854, the School Sisters of Notre Dame arrived in New Orleans to take charge of St. Joseph's Orphan Asylum, founded to furnish homes for those orphaned by the epidemic. St. Vincent's Orphan Asylum was also opened as a home for foundlings and infant orphans, and entrusted to the Sisters of Charity. On 29 July, 1855, the Holy See divided the Diocese of New Orleans, which at that time made up of natives of French, Spanish, Irish, or American origin, French, Germans, Spaniards, and Italians. Distinctive Catholic schools were increasing. The Ursulines, Religious of the Sacred Heart, Sisters of Holy Charity, Marianites of the Holy Cross, Tertiary Carthusians, School of Notre Dame, and the Coloured Sisters of the Holy Family were doing excellent work. Many abuses had crept in especially with regard to marriage, but after the erection of new churches and parishes, religious laws had been steadily and the frequentation of the sacraments was increasing.

In 1855 the Fathers of the Congregation of the Holy Cross came to New Orleans at the request of the industrial school for the training of the orphan boys who had been rendered homeless by the terrible epidemic of 1853. They established themselves in the lower portion of New Orleans, and became inseparably identified with religious and educational progress. In 1853 they opened their college, which is now one of the leading institutions in the United States. On 20 January, 1856, the First Provincial Council of New Orleans was convened, and in January, 1858, Archbishop Blanchet held the fourth diocesan synod. In 1859 the Sisters of the Good Shepherd were called by Archbishop Bianco to New Orleans to open a reformatory for girls. Bishop Blanchet opened another diocesan seminary in 1856 and placed it in charge of the Lazaret Fathers. He convoked the second provincial council on 22 January, 1860. Just before the second session opened he was taken so seriously ill that he could no longer attend the meetings; he rallied and seemed to regain his usual health, but he died 20 June following.

Right Rev. John Mary Odin, Bishop of Galveston, was appointed successor to Archbishop Bianco, and arrived in New Orleans on the Feast of Pentecost, 1861. The Civil War had already begun and excitement was intense. All the prudence and charity of the archbishop were needed to work a miracle. An earnest maintainer of discipline, Archbishop Odin found it necessary on 1 January, 1863, to issue regulations regarding the recklessness and carelessness that had prevailed in the temporal management of the churches, the indebtedness of which he had been compelled to assume to save them from bankruptcy. The regulations were not favourably received, and the archbishop visited Rome returning in the spring of 1863, when he had obtained the permission of the Holy See for his course of action. It was not till some time later that through his charity and zeal he obtained the cordial support he desired. His appeals for priests while in Europe were not heeded and early in 1864 forty seminarians and five Ursulines arrived with Bishop Du-his desire to relieve Southern families, ruined by the war, he gave to all largely and royally, and thus plunged the diocese into a debt of over $600,000. He was growing very feeble and an application was made to Rome for a coadjutor.

Bishop Francis Xavier Leray of Natchitoches was transferred to New Orleans as coadjutor and Apostolic administrator of affairs on 23 October, 1879, and at once set to work to liquidate the immense deficit. It was during the administration of Archbishop Perche and the coadjutorship of Bishop Leray that the Board of Trustees of the cathedral which formerly had caused so much trouble passed the beginning of July, 1881, and transferred all the cathedral property to Archbishop Perche and Bishop Leray jointly, for the benefit and use of the Catholic population. Archbishop Leray was born at Château Giron, Brittany, France, 20 April, 1835. He responded to the appeal for priests for the Diocese of Louisiana in 1843, and completed his theological studies at the Sulpician seminary in Baltimore. He accompanied Bishop Chasche of Natchez and was ordained by him on 19 March, 1852. He was a most active missionary in the Mississippi district and in 1860 when pastor of Vicksburg he brought the Sisters of Mercy from Baltimore to establish a school there. Several times during the Civil War he served as a Union chaplain; and on several occasions he was taken prisoner by the Federal forces but released as soon as the sacred character of his office was established.

During the Civil War, he served as a Confederate chaplain; and on several occasions he was taken prisoner by the Federal forces but released as soon as the sacred character of his office was established.

On the death of Bishop Martin he was appointed to the See of Natchez, and consecrated by the Bishop of New Orleans on 22 April, 1877, at Rennes, France; on 23 October, 1879, he was appointed coadjutor to Archbishop Perche of New Orleans and Bishop of Janopoli. His most difficult task was the bringing of order out of chaos and reducing the enormous debt of the diocese. In this he met with great success. During his administration the debt was reduced by at least $300,000. His health, however, became impaired, and he went to France in the hope of recuperating, and died at Château Giron, on 23 September, 1887.

The see remained vacant for nearly a year, Very Rev. G. A. Rouzel administering the affairs of the diocese, until the Right Rev. Simon J. Natchez, was promoted to fill the vacancy on 7 August, 1888, and took possession on 16 September, 1888. Archbishop Janssens was born at Tillyburg, Holland, on 17 October, 1834. At thirteen he was sent by his parents to learn the classics at the Jacobins in Amsterdam, and went to the Jesuits at Bruges. He entered the clergy at Mechlin, and was appointed to the See of Natchez by the Holy See on 7 April, 1851, the See of Natchez became vacant by the appointment of Right Rev. Wm. Elder as Archbishop of Cincinnati and Father Janssens succeeded. While Bishop of Natchez he completed the cathedral commenced forty years before by Bishop Chasche, and at the least of the difficulties that awaited him as Archbishop of New Orleans was the heavy indebtedness resting upon the see and the constant drain thus made on the poor treasury. There was no hospital and the rapid growth of the population augmented the demand for priests. He at once called a meeting of the clergy and prominent citizens, and plans were formulated for the gradual liquidation of the debt of the diocese, which was found to be $324,759. Before his death he had reduced it to about $130,000. Notwithstanding this burden, the diocese, through the zeal of Archbishop Janssen, entered upon a period of unusual activity. One of his first acts, May 10, 1890, was to found a little seminary, which was opened at Pontchatoula, La., 3 September, 1891, and placed under the direction of the Benedictine Fathers. He went to Europe in 1889 to secure priests for the diocese and for the seminary and to work for the liquidation of the debt. In August 1892, after the lynching of the Italians who assassinated the chief of police, the Missionary Sisters of the Sacred Heart, founded in Italy by Mother Calasanz, took work among the Italian emigrants, arrived in New Orleans and opened a large mission, a free school, and an asylum for Italian orphans, and began also mission work among the Italian gardeners on the outskirts of the city and at Kenner, La. The same year a terrific cyclone and storm swept the Louisiana Gulf coast, and laid low the lands along the Caminada Cheneiere where there was a settlement of Italian and Spanish and Malay fishermen. Out of a population of 1500 over 800 were swept away. Rev. Father Grimaud performed the burial services over 400 bodies as they were washed ashore. Father Bedel at Buras burned over three hundred and lost everything. On the 21st of December, at 4:20 o'clock, the steamer H. Blenk was appointed Bishop of Porto Rico for and conecrated in the St. Louis Cathedral with Archbishop Barnada of Santiago de Cuba, 2 July, 1899. Archbishop Chapelle was absent from the diocese during the greater part of his administration, duties in the Antilles and the Philippines in connection with his position as Apostolic Delegate claiming his attention, nevertheless he accomplished much for New Orleans. The diocesan debt was extinguished, and the activity in church work which had begun under Archbishop Jansen continued; returning to New Orleans he introduced into the diocese the Dominican Fathers from the Philippines. In the summer of 1905, while the archbishop was administering confirmation in the country parishes, yellow fever broke out in New Orleans, and, deeming it his duty to be among his people, he returned immediately to the city. On the way he was struck by the train to his residence he was stricken, and died 9 August, 1905 (see CHAPELLE, PLACIDE LOUIS). Auxiliary Bishop Rouxel became the administrator of the diocese pending the appointment of a successor. The Right Rev. James Hurbert Blenk, S.M., D.D., Bishop of Porto Rico, was promoted to New Orleans, 26 April, 1906.

IV. CONTEMPORARY CONDITIONS.—Archbishop Blenk was born at Neustadt, Bavaria, 28 July, 1856, of Protestant parentage. While a child, his family came to New Orleans, and it was here that the light of the true Faith dawned upon him. He was educated at St. Alphonsus Church at the age of twelve. His primary education having been completed in New Orleans, he entered Jefferson College where he completed his classical and scientific studies under the Marist Fathers. He spent three years at the Marist house of studies in Belley, France, completed his probationary studies at the Marist novitiate at Lyons, and was sent to Dublin to follow a higher course of mathematics at the Catholic University. Thence he went to St. Mary’s College, Dundalk, County Louth, where he occupied the chair of mathematics. Later he returned to the Marist house of studies in Dublin where he completed his philosophical studies. In August, 1855, he was ordained priest, and returned that year to Louisiana to labour among his own people. He was stationed as a professor at Jefferson College of which he became president in 1891 and held the position for six years. In 1896, at the invitation of the general of the Marists, he visited all the houses of the congregation in Europe, and returning to New Orleans in February, 1897, he became the rector of the Church of the Holy Name of Mary, Algiers, which was in charge of the Marist Fathers. He erected the handsome presbytery and gave a great impetus to religion and education in the parish and city, being chairman of the Board of Studies of the newly organized Winter School. He was a member of the Board of Consultiors during the administration of Archbishop Janssen and of Archbishop Chapelle; the latter selected him as the auditor and secretary of the Apostolic Delegation to Cuba and Porto Rico. He was appointed the first bishop of the Island of Porto Rico under the American occupation 12 June, 1899. A hurricane overwet Porto Rico just before Bishop Blenk left to take possession of his see; through his personal efforts he raised over $30,000 in the United States to take with him to alleviate the sufferings of his new people. The successful work of Bishop Blenk is a part of the history of the reconstruction along American lines of the Antilles. He returned to New Orleans as archbishop, 1 July, 1906, and new life was infused into every department of religious and educational and charitable endeavour. Splendid new churches and schools were erected, especially in the country parishes. Among the new institutions were St. Joseph’s Seminary and College at St. Benedict, La.; St. Charles College, Grand Coteau, built on the ruins of the old college destroyed by fire; Lake Charles Sanitarium; Marquette University; and the Seaman’s Haven, where a chapel was opened for sailors. The new sisterhoods admitted to the diocese were the Religious of the Incarnate Word in charge of a sanitarium at Lake Charles; the Religious of Divine Providence in charge of the school in Broussardville; and the French Benedictine Sisters driven from France, who erected the new Convent of St. Gertrude at St. Benedict, La., destined as an industrial school for girls. A large industrial school and farm for coloured boys under the direction of the Sisters of the Holy Family was opened in Gentilly Road, and two new parishes outlined for the exclusive care of the coloured race. In 1907, the seminary conducted by the Lazarist Fathers was closed and Archbishop Blenk opened a preparatory seminary and placed it in charge of the Benedictine Fathers. The diocese assumed full charge of the Chinchuba Deaf-mute Institute, which was established under Archbishop Janssens and is the only Catholic institute for deaf-mutes in the South. It is in charge of the School of Nurses of New Orleans.

New Orleans’ priesthood, like the population of Louisiana, is cosmopolitan. The training of the priesthood has been conducted at home and abroad, the diocese owing much gratitude to France, Spain, Ireland, Germany, and Holland. Several efforts were made to establish a permanent seminary and recruit the ranks of the priesthood from the diocese itself. At various times there has been a diocesan school for students at St. Mary’s and St. Charles Seminary, Baltimore, the American College, Louvain, and has (1901) twelve theological students in different seminaries of Europe and America. Each parish is incorporated and there are the corporate institutions of the Jesuits and other religious communities. The houses of study for religious are the Jesuit scholasticate at Grand Coteau, and the Benedictine scholastics at St. Benedict at St. Benedict, La. The Poor Clares, discaled Carmelites, Benedictine Nuns, Congregation of Marianites of the Holy Cross, Ursuline Nuns, Religious of the Sacred Heart, Sisters of St. Joseph, Sisters of Perpetual Adoration, Sisters of the Immaculate Conception, Sisters of the Holy Family (coloured), Sisters of Mount Carmel, have mother-houses with novitiates in New Orleans. In early days there were distinct parishes in New Orleans for French, English, and German-speaking Catholics, but with the growing diffusion of the English language these parish lines have disappeared. In all the churches where necessary, there are French, English, and German sermons and instructions; there are churches and chapels for Italian emigrants and Hungarians, a German settlement at St. Leo near Rayne, domestic missions for negroes under the charge of the Holy Family Sisters and Josephite Fathers and Lazarists at New Orleans and Bayou Petite, Prairie.

The educational system is well organized. The principal institutions are the diocesan normal school; the Marquette University under the care of the Jesuits; 7 colleges and academies with high school courses for boys with 1893 students; 17 academies for young ladies, under the direction of religious communities, with 2201 students; 102 parishes with parochial schools, having an attendance of 20,000 pupils; 117 orphan asylums with 1341 orphans; 1 infant asylum with 164 infants; 1 industrial school for whites with 90 inmates; 1 industrial school for coloured orphan boys; 1 deaf-mute asylum with 40 inmates; 8 hospitals; 2 homes for the aged white, and 1 for the aged coloured poor; 1 house of the Good Shepherd for the reform of wayward girls; a Seaman’s Haven. The state asylums for the blind, e.g., hospital, St. Vincent de Paul, and St. Margaret’s Daughters. There is absolute freedom of worship. The first St. Vincent de Paul conference was organized in 1852.

The diocese has one Benedictine abbey (St. Joseph’s, of which Right Rev. Paul Schaab is abbot); 166 secular priests, 123 priests in religious communities, making a total of 279 clergy; 133 churches with resident priests and 90 missions with churches, making a total of 233 churches; 35 stations and 42 chapels where Mass is said. The total Catholic population is 550,000; yearly baptisms include 15,156 white children, 253 white adults, 3111 coloured children, and 354 coloured adults (total number of baptisms 18,573); the communicants average 7201;58; confirmations 11,215; converts, 817; marriages, 3533 (including 323 mixed). The large centres of church activity are the cities of New Orleans, Baton Rouge, Plaquemine, Donaldsonville, Houma, Jeanerette, New Iberia, Lafayette, Abbeville, Morgan City, St. Martin, Crowley, Lake Charles. The churches and schools are all insured; an association for assisting infirm priests, the Priests’ Aid Society, has been established and mutual aid and benevolent associations in almost every parish for the assistance of the laity. Assimilation is constantly going on among the different nationalities that come to New Orleans through the various points of entry. Italians, French, and Americans, and thus is created a healthy civic sentiment that conduces to earnest and harmonious progress along lines of religious, charitable, educational, and temporal work. The Catholic laity of the diocese is naturally largely represented in the life and government of the community, the population being so overwhelmingly Catholic; Catholics hold prominent civil positions, such as governor, mayor, and member of the Bar, State Legislature, and United States Congress. A Catholic from Louisiana, Edward D. White, has been recently (1910) appointed Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. Catholics are connected with the state normal schools and colleges, are on the board of the state universities and public libraries, and are represented in the corps of professors, patrons, and pupils of the Louisiana State and other universities. One fourth of the teachers of the public schools of Louisiana are Catholics.

The laity take a very active interest in the religious life of the diocese. Every church and convent has its altar society for the care of the tabernacle, sodalities of the Blessed Virgin for young girls and women. The Holy Name Society for men, young and old, is established throughout the diocese, while conferences of St. Vincent de Paul are established in thirty churches. St. Margaret’s Daughters, indulged like the Society of St. Vincent de Paul, has twenty-eight circles at church extension work, and the Total Abstinence Society is established in many churches. Besides the Third Order of St. Francis, the diocese has confraternities of the Happy Death, the Holy Face, the Holy Rosary, and the Holy Angy; the Apostleship of Prayer is established in nearly all the churches, while many parishes have confraternities adapted to their special needs. The Catholic Knights of America and Knights of Columbus are firmly established, while the Holy Spirit Society, devoted to the diffusion of Catholic truth, and the establishment of churches and schools in wayside places, is doing noble work along church extension lines. Other societies are the Marquette League, the Society for the Propa-
New Pomerania, Vicariatus Apostolic of—New Pomerania, the largest island of the Bismarck Archipelago, is separated from New Guinea by Dampier Strait, and extends from 148° to 152° E. long. and from 4° to 7° S. lat. It is about 346 miles long, from 12½ to 22½ miles broad, and has an area of 9650 sq. miles. Two geographical regions are distinguishable. Of the north-eastern section (known as the Gazelle Peninsula) a great portion is occupied by wooded mountain chains; otherwise (especially about Blanche Bay) the soil is very fertile and admirably watered by rivers (e. g. the Toriu and Kerawat), which yield an abundance of fish. The white population is practically confined to the northern part of this section, in which the capital, Herbertshohe, is situated. The western and larger section also has extensive mountain chains, which contain numerous active volcanoes. The warlike nature of the natives, who fiercely resent any intrusion into their lands, has led us almost entirely ignorant of the interior.

The natives are finely built, coffee brown in colour, have regular features, and, when well cared for, are among the finest and most intelligent people in the world. Their lips are somewhat thick and the mouth half or wide open. While resembling the southeastern Papuans, they use weapons unknown to the latter—e. g. the sling, in the use of which they possess a maddening dexterity, skilfully inserting the stone with the toes. They occupy few towns owing to the constant feuds raging among them. One of their strangest institutions is their money (devarru), composed of small cowrie shells threaded on a piece of cane. The difficulty of procuring these shells, which are found only in very deep water, accounts for the value set on them. The unit is usually a fathom (the length of both arms extended) of devarru. The tribe has no chiefs; an individual's importance varies according to the amount of devarru he possesses, but the final decision for peace or war rests with the tribe. This enforces a strict absence of authority and is an obstacle in the way of government. The natives are very superstitious: a demon resides in each volcano, and marks his displeasure by sending forth fire against the people. To propitiate the evil spirits, a piece of devarru is always placed in the grave with the corpse.

The celebrated institution of the Duk-Duk is simply a piece of imposture, by which the older natives play upon the superstitions of the younger to secure the food they can no longer earn. This "spirit" (a native adorned with a huge mask) arrives regularly in a boat at night with the new moon, and receives the offerings of the natives. The standard of morality among the natives of New Pomerania is high compared with that observed in New Mecklenburg (the other large island of the Bismarck Archipelago), where the laxity of morals, especially race suicide and the scant respect shown for mothers, caused the population to rapidly annihilate the population. In Nov., 1884, Germany proclaimed its protectorate over the New Britain Archipelago; New Britain and New Ireland were given the names of Neupommernen and Neukalmarien, and the whole group was renamed the Bismarck Archipelago. The great obstacle to the development of the islands is their poisonous climate, neither native nor European being immune from the fevers. The native population (1900) is put at about 190,000; the foreign population (1900) at 775

The vicariate Apostolic was erected on 1 Jan., 1889, and entrusted to the Missionaries of the Sacred Heart of Jesus. Until 1876, when the Marshall Islands were made a separate vicariate, its territory was confined to the Bismarck Archipelago. The first and present vicar Apostolic is Mgr. Louis Couppy, titular Bishop of Leros. The mission has already made remarkable progress, and numbers according to the latest statistics 15,223 Catholics; 28 missionaries; 40 brothers; 27 Sisters of Our Lady of the Sacred Heart; 55 native catechists; 77 churches and chapels; 90 stations (26 chief); 29 schools with over 4000 pupils; 15 orphanages.

Newport (England), Diocese of (Neuporten- stas)._This diocese takes its name from Newport, a town of about 70,000 inhabitants, situated at the mouth of the river Usk, in the county of Monmouth. Before the restoration of the Christendom in England by Pius IX in 1850, the old "Western Diocese" of England had, since 1840, been divided into two vicariates. The northern, comprising the twelve counties of Wales with Monmouthshire and Herefordshire, was called the Vicariate of Wales. When the country was divided by an Apostolic Brief dated 29 Sept., 1850, into dioceses, the six counties of South Wales, with Monmouthshire and Herefordshire, became the Diocese of Newport and Menevia. Menevia is the Latin name for St. David's, and the double title was intended to signify that at some future day there would be two distinct dioceses. The first bishop of the Diocese of Newport and Menevia was the Right Reverend Thomas Joseph Brown, O.S.B., who had already, as vicar Apostolic, ruled for ten years the Vicariate of Wales. A further re-adjustment of the diocese was made in March, 1885, when Leo XIII separated from it five of the counties of South Wales, and formed a new vicariate, which was to consist of all the twelve Welsh counties except Glamorganshire. Since that date the name of the diocese has been simply "Newport", and it has consisted of Glamorganshire, Monmouthshire, and Herefordshire. The Catholic population (1910) is about 45,000, the general population being about 1,050,000.

The diocesan chapter, in virtue of a Decree of the Congregation of Propaganda, 21 April, 1852, issued at the petition of Cardinal Wiseman and the rest of the hierarchy, was to consist of monks of the English Benedictine Congregation resident in the town of Newport. As the congregation, up to this date (1910), have not been able to establish a house in Newport, permission from the Holy See has been obtained for the members of the chapter to reside at St. Michael's pro-cathedral, Belmont, near Hereford. The chapter comprises a cathedral prior and nine canons, of whom four are allowed to be non-resident. Their choral habit is the cæcula or frock of the congregation with a special almsuce. In assisting the bishop they dispense with the cæcula, and wear the almsuce over the surplice. The present bishop, the Right Reverend John Cuthbert Hedley, O.S.B., was consecrated as auxiliary on 29 September, 1873, and succeeded in February, 1881, to Bishop Brown. He resides at Bishop's House, Llanlais, Cardiff. The pro-cathedral is the beautiful church of the Benedictine priory at Belmont. There are in the diocese about 40 secular diocesan priests, 21 Benedictines (of whom 13 work on the mission), and 14 Rosminian Fathers. There are five deaneries. The principal towns are Cardiff, Newport, Swansea, and Merthyr Tydval. The only religious house of men is the Cathedral Priory, Belmont, which is the residence of the cathedral and chapter, and is also a house of studies and novitiate for the English Benedictines. Of religious women there are houses of Poor Clares, Our Lady of Charity, the Good Shepherd, Sisters of Nazareth, Ursulines of Chavagnes, St. Joseph of Annecy, St. Vincent de Paul, and others. There are four certified Poor Law schools: one for boys, at Treforest, and three for girls—two, at Hereford and Bullingham respectively, conducted by the Sisters of Charity at Cardiff, conducted by the Sisters of Nazareth. There are 50 churches in the diocese, besides several school chapels and public oratories. There are about 11,000 children in the Catholic elementary schools. There are four secondary schools for girls, and one centre (in Cardiff) for female pupil teachers.

Newton, John, soldier and engineer, b. at Norfolk, Virginia, 24 August, 1823; d. in New York City, 1 May, 1885. He was the son of General Thomas Newton and Margaret Jordan. In 1838 he was appointed from Virginia a cadet in the U.S. Military Academy, and graduated in 1842, standing second in a class that included Rosencrans, Pope, and Longstreet. Commissioned second lieutenant of engineers, he was engaged as assistant professor of engineering at West Point, and later in the construction of fortifications and other engineering projects along the coasts of the Atlantic and the Gulf of Mexico. Commissioned first lieutenant in 1852 and promoted captain in 1856, he was appointed chief engineer of the Utah Expedition in 1858. At the opening of the Civil War he was chief engineer of the Department of Pennsylvania, and afterwards held a similar position in the Department of the Shenandoah. Commissioned major on 6 August, 1861, he worked on the construction of the defences of Washington until March, 1862. He was commissioned on 23 Sept., 1861, brigadier-general of volunteers, and received command of a brigade engaged in the defence of the city. He served in the army of the Potomac under McClellan during the Peninsula Campaign, and distinguished himself by his heroic conduct in the actions of West Point, Gaines Mills, and Glendale. He served in the army of the Potomac under McClellan during the Peninsula Campaign, and distinguished himself by his heroic conduct in the actions of West Point, Gaines Mills, and Glendale. He led his brigade in the Maryland campaign, taking part in the forcing of Crampton Gap and in the battle of Antietam, and was for his gallant services brevetted lieutenant-colonel of Regulars. He led a division at Frederickburg in the storming of Marye Heights, and was rewarded on 20 March, 1863, with the rank of major-general of volunteers. He commanded divisions at Chancellorsville and Sedgwick Heights, and, at the death of Reynolds on 2 July, 1863, was given command of the First Army Corps, which he led on the last two days of the battle of Gettysburg. On 3 July, 1863, for gallant service at Gettysburg, he was brevetted major of Regulars. He engaged in the pursuit of the Confederate forces to Warrenton, Virginia, and towards the end of 1863 was active in the Rapidan Campaign. In May, 1864, he was transferred to the Army of the Cumberland, and commanded under General Thomas the Second Division, Fourth Corps. He fought in all the actions during the invasion of Georgia up to the capture of Atlanta. For his gallantry in this campaign, especially in the battle of Peach Tree Creek, he was brevetted on 13 March, 1865, major-general of volunteers and brigadier-general and major-general of Regulars. He then took command of various districts in Florida until, in January, 1866, he was mustered out of the volunteer service.

Commissioned lieutenant-colonel of engineers in the regular service on 29 December, 1865, Newton was ordered in April, 1866, to New York City, where he thenceforth resided, engaged on the engineering labours that made his name famous. He was superintendent of the construction of the defences on the Long Island side of the Narrows, of the improvements of the Hudson River, and of the fortifications at Sandy Hook. He was also one of the board of engineers deputed to carry out the modifications of the defences around New York City. The proposed enlargement of the Harlem river, and the improvements of the Hudson from Troy to New York, of the channel between New Jersey and Staten Island, and of the harbours on Lake Champlain were put under his charge. On 30 June, 1876, he was named colonel, and on 6 March, 1884, chief of engineers in the regular service with the rank of brigadier-general. Among Newton's achievements, the most notable was the removal of the dangerous rocks in Hell Gate, the principal water-way between Long Island Sound and the East River. To accomplish this task successfully, required the solution of difficult engineering problems never before attempted, and in the invention, construction, and use of a steam drilling machine, which had been in general use. Newton carefully studied the problem, and the accuracy of his conclusions was shown by the exact correspondence of the results with the objects sought. Hale's Reef and Flood Rock, having been carefully mined under his directions, were destroyed by two great explosions (24 September, 1876; 10 October, 1885). This engineering feat excited the universal admiration of engineers, and many honours were conferred upon him. On Newton's voluntary retirement from the service in 1886, Mayor Grace of New York, recognizing his superior skill, appointed him commissioner of public works on 28 Aug. This post he voluntarily resigned on 24 Nov., 1888. On 2 April, 1888, he accepted the presidency of the Panama Railroad Company, which position he filled until his death. In 1886, General Newton married Anna M. Starr of New London, Connecticut. In his early manhood he became, and until his death remained, an earnest and devout member of the Catholic Church.

Important facts in New Year calculations. The New Year's Day for England, in early times and from the thirteenth century to 1 Jan., 1752, when the present custom was introduced there, was fixed on 25 March, and became New Year's Day for England, in early times and from the thirteenth century to 1 Jan., 1752, when the present custom was introduced there. The same was also the case in Germany. Thus began Christmas, thus being almost in harmony with the ancient Germans, who made the winter solstice their starting-point. Notwithstanding the movable character of Easter, France and the Low Countries took it as the first day of the year, while Russia, up to the eighteenth century, made September the first month. The western nations, however, since the sixteenth, or, at the latest, the eighteenth century, have adopted and retained the first of January. In Christian liturgy the Church does not refer to the first of the year, any more than she does to the fact that the first Sunday of Advent is the first day of the ecclesiastical year.

In the United States of America the great feast of the Epiphany has ceased to be a holyday of obligation, but New Year continues in force. Since the mysteries of the Epiphany are commemorated on Christmas—the Oriental and Gregorian, and the same in import—it was thought advisable to retain by preference, under the title "Circumcision of Our Lord Jesus Christ," New Year's Day, as one of the six feasts of obligation. The Fathers of the Third General Council of Baltimore petitioned Rome to this effect, and their petition was granted (Con. Plen. Bilt., III, pp. 105 sqq.). (See Circumcision, Feast of the; Chronology of Christmas.)

NEW YORK.

ARCHDIOCESE OF (Neo-Embarrasensis); see erected 8 April, 1808; made archiepiscopal 19 July, 1850; comprises the Boroughs of Manhattan, Bronx, and Richmond in the City of New York, and the Counties of Dutchess, Orange, Putnam, Rockland, Sullivan, Ulster, and Westchester in the State of New York; also the Bahamas Islands (British Possessions); an area of 471 square miles in the State of New York and 4,000 in the Bahamas Islands. The latter territory was placed in 1886 under this jurisdiction by the Holy See because the facilities of access were best from New York; it formerly belonged to the Diocese of Charleston. The suffragans of New York are the Dioceses of Albany, Brooklyn, Buffalo, Ogdensburg, Rochester, and Syracuse in the State of New York, and Newark and Trenton in New Jersey. All these, in 1808, made up the territory of the original diocese. The first division took place 23 April, 1847, when the creation of the Diocese of Albany and Buffalo cut off the northern and western portions of the State; and the second, in 1853, when Brooklyn and Newark were erected into separate sees.

New York is now the largest see in population, and the most important in influence and material prosperity of all the ecclesiastical divisions of the Church in Continental United States.

I. COLONIAL PERIOD.—Nearly a century before Henry Hudson sailed up the great river that bears his name, the Catholic navigators Verrazano and Gomez, had guided their ships along its shores and placed it under the patronage of St. Anthony. The Calvinistic Hollanders, to whom Hudson gave this foundation for a new colony, manifested their loyalty to their state Church by ordaining that in New Netherland the "Reformed Christian religion according to the doctrines of the Synod of Dortrecht" should be dominant. It is probable, but not certain, that there were priests with Verrazano and Gomez, and that from a Catholic altar went up the first prayer uttered on the site of the present great metropolis of the New World. While public worship by Catholics was not tolerated, the generosity of the Dutch governor, William Killen, and the permission of New Amsterdam to the Jesuit missionary, Father Isaac Jogues, in 1643, and after him, to his brother Jesuits, Fathers Bressani and Le Moyne, must be remembered in their everlasting credit. For more that one priest was the first priest to traverse the State of New York; the first to minister within the limits of the Diocese of New York; when he reached Manhattan Island, after his rescue from captivity in the summer of 1643, he found there two Catholics, a young Irishman and a Portuguese woman, whose confessions he heard.

St. Mary's, the first rude chapel in which Mass was said in the State of New York, was begun, on 18 November, 1655, on the banks of the lake where the City of Syracuse now stands, by the Jesuit missionaries, Fathers Claude Dablon and Pierre Chaumonot. In the same year another Jesuit, Father Simon Le Moyne, journeyed down the river to New Amsterdam, as we learn from a letter sent by the Dutch preacher, Megapolensis (a renegade Catholic), to the Classics at Amsterdam, telling them that the Jesuits had visited Manhattan Island, and that they were residing here, and especially for the accommodation of the French sailors, who are Papists and who have arrived here with a good price. The Church had no foothold on Manhattan Island until 1807, when the Duke of York claimed it for an English colony. Twenty years later, the Catholic governor, Thomas Dongan, not only fostered his own faith, but enacted the first laws passed in New York favourable to religious liberty. It is believed that the first Mass said on the island (30 October, 1883) was in a chapel he opened about where the custom house now stands. With him came three English Jesuits, Father Thomas Harvey, Henry Harrison, and Charles Gage, and they soon had a Latin school in the same neighbourhood. Of this Jacob Leisler, the fanatical usurper of the government, wrote to the Governor Dongan, in August, 1689: "I have formerly urged to inform your Honor, that Coll Dongan, in his time did erect a Jesuite College upon culfurf to learn Latin to the Judges West—Mr. Grahame, Judge Palmer, and John Tudor, who did contribute their share to New York and for nothing but to make it seem as if we are imitating them, the college vanished" (O'Callaghan, "Documentary Hist. of N. Y.", II, 23). With the fall of James II and the advent of William of Orange to the English throne, New York's Catholic colony was almost stamped out by drastic penal laws (see NEW YORK, STATE OF). In spite of them, however, during the years that followed a few scattered representatives of the Faith drifted in and settled down unobtrusively. To minister to them there came now and then from Philadelphia a zealous German Jesuit missionary, Father Ferdinand Steinmayer, who was commonly called "Father Farmer". Gathwas named: a letter sent on 8 Nov., 1808, by Father Kohnmann, who was then acting as the administrator of the diocese, to his friend Father Strickland, S. J., of London, England, says, "Your favour of the 6th Sept. was delivered to me at the beginning of October at the City of New York, where our Right Rev. Bishop Car- roll has thought proper to send me in the capacity of rector of this immense congregation and Vicar General of this diocese till the arrival of the Right Rev. Richard Luke Concanen, Bishop of New York. The congregation chiefly consists of Irish, some hundreds of French, and as many Germans, in all, according to the common estimation, of 14,000 souls. Rev. Mr. Fenwick, a young Father of his society, distinguished for his learning and piety, has been sent along with me. I was no sooner arrived in the city and, behold, the trustees, though before our arrival they had not spent a cent for the reparation and furniture of their clergyman's house, laid out for the said purpose above $800. All men seem to revive at the very name of the Society of Jesus, though yet little known in this part of the country. What rapid progress was made, he indicates, two years later, when, again writing to Father Strickland, on 1 Dec., 1810, he tells him: "Indeed it is but two years that we arrived in this city without having a cent in our pocket, not even our passage money, which the trustees paid for Father Fenwick and me... and to see things as advanced as to see not only the Catholic religion highly respected by the first characters of the city, but even a Catholic college established, the house well furnished both in town and in the college improvements made in the college [etc] for four or five hundred dollars... is a thing which I am at a loss to conceive and which I cannot ascribe but to the infinite liberality of the Hon. Co. to whom alone, therefore, be all glory and honour. The college is in the centre not of Long Island but of the Island of New York, the most delightful and most healthy spot of the whole island, at a distance of four small miles from the city, and of half a mile from the East and North rivers, both of which are seen from the house; situated between two roads which are very much frequented, opposite to the botanical gardens which belong to the State. It has adjacent to it a beautiful lawn, garden, orchard, etc."—This spot is now the site of St. Patrick's Cathedral on Fifth avenue.

We can judge from the family names on the register of St. Peter's church that the early Catholics of New York were largely Irish; next in number come the French, then the Germans, followed by those of Italian, Spanish and English origin. There were very few Germans in 1808 to think themselves entitled to a church and pastor of their own nationality, for on 2 March of that year Christopher Brehill, John Kerner, George Jacob, Martin Nieder, and Francis Wernecken signed a petition which they sent to Bishop Carroll praying him "to send us a pastor who is capable of undertaking the spiritual care of our souls in the German language, which is our mother tongue."
Many of us do not know any English at all, and those who have some knowledge of it are not well enough versed in the English Language to attend Divine Service with any utility to themselves. As we have not yet a place of worship of our own we have made application to the Trustees of the English Catholic Church in this city to grant us permission to perform our worship in the German Language in their church at such times as not to interfere with their regular services. This permission they have readily granted us. During the Course of the year we shall take care to find an opportunity to provide ourselves with a suitable building of our own, for we have no doubt that our number will soon considerably increase."

Nothing came of this petition, and no separate German congregation was organized in New York until a quarter of a century after its date. But Father Kohlmann saw to it that another church should be started, and St. Patrick's was begun "between the Broadway and the Bowery roads" in 1809, to meet the needs of the rapidly increasing number of Catholics on the east side of the city. It was also to serve as the cathedral church of the new diocese. The cornerstone was laid 8 June, 1809, but, owing to the hard times and the war of 1812 with England, the structure was not ready for use until 4 May, 1815, when it was dedicated by Bishop Cheverus who came from Boston for that purpose. It was then far on the outskirts of the city, and, to accustom the people to go there, Mass was said at St. Peter's every other Sunday. The ground on which it was built was purchased in 1801 for a graveyard, and the interments in it from that time until the cemetery was closed in 1838 numbered 521. Some of the Catholic laymen prominent during this period were Andrew Morris, Matthew Reed, Cornelius Heeney, Thomas Stoughton, Dominick Lynch, Benjamin Dinsley, Peter Burtell, under the Rev. James A. Neil, the first native of New York to be admitted to the priesthood, Joseph Icard, merchant and architect, Hugh McGinnis, Dennis Doyle, Miles F. Clooney, Anthony Trappani, a native of Meta, Italy, pioneer Italian merchant and the first foreigner to be naturalized under the Constitution, Francis Varet, John B. Lasala, Francis Cooper, George Gottsberger, Thomas O'Connor, Thomas Brady, Dr. William James Macneven, and Bernard Dornin, the first Catholic publisher, for whose edition of Pastori's "History of the Church," issued in 1807, there were 318 New York City subscribers.

THE HIERARCHY.—A. When Bishop Carroll learned that it was the intention of the Holy See to recognize the growth of the Church in the United States by dividing the Diocese of Baltimore and creating new sees, he advised that New York be placed under the care of the Bishop of Boston till a suitable choice could be made for that diocese. Archbishop Troy of Dublin, however, induced Pius VII to appoint as New York's first bishop an Irish Dominican, Father Richard Luke Concannon, who had resided many years in Rome as the agent of the Irish bishops and was much esteemed there. He was prior of St. Clement's at Rome, librarian of the Minerva, and distinguished for his learning. He had refused a nomination for a see in Ireland and was much interested in the missions in America, about which he had kept up a correspondence with Bishop Carroll. It was at his suggestion that Father Fenwick founded the first house of the Dominicans in Kentucky. He was consecrated first Bishop of New York at Rome, 24 April, 1808, and some time after left for Leghorn on his way to his see, taking with him the pallium for Archbishop Carroll. After waiting there for a ship for four months he returned to Rome. Thence he went to Naples, expecting to sail from that port, but the French military forces in possession of the city detained him as a British subject, and, while waiting vainly to be released, he died of fever, 19 June, 1810. Finding that he could not leave Italy, he had asked the pope to appoint the Rev. Ambrose Marechal as his coadjutor bishop in New York. The American bishops cordially endorsed this choice and considered that the appointment would be made. Archbishop Carroll, writing to Father C. Plowden, of London, 25 June, 1815, said: "It was known here that before the death of Dr. Concannon his Holiness at the Dr.'s entreaty intended to assign to him as his coadjutor the Rev. Mr. Marechal, a priest of St. Sulpice, now in the Seminary here, and worthy of any promotion in the Church. We still expected that this measure would be pursued; and that we made no presentation or recommendation of any other for the vacant see."

B.—Archbishop Troy, of Dublin, however, with the other Irish bishops, proposed to the pope another Irish Dominican, the Rev. John Connolly, for the vacant see of New York, and he was consecrated at Rome, 6 Nov., 1814 (see CONNOLLY, JOHN). It was a selection which might have proved embarrassing to American Catholics, for Bishop Connolly was a British subject, and the United States was then at war with Great Britain. "I wish," wrote Archbishop Carroll to Father Plowden, 26 June, 1815, "this may not become a very dangerous precedent fruitful of mischief by drawing upon our religion a false opinion of the servility of our principles." Owing to his own views of the situation in the diocese, Bishop Connolly did not announce his appointment to his fellow-members of the hierarchy or to the administrator of the diocese. Father Kohlmann was, therefore, in anticipation of the bishop's arrival, recalled by his superiors to Maryland, the college was closed, and the other Jesuits soon after left the diocese. Finally, Bishop Connolly arrived in New York unannounced, and without any formal local welcome, 24 Nov., 1815, his ship taking sixty-eight days to make the voyage from Dublin. In the diocese he found that everything was to be created from resources that were very small and in spite of obstacles that were very great. The diocese embraced the whole State of New York and half of New Jersey. There were but four priests in this territory. Lay trustees had become so accustomed to having their own way that they were not disposed to admit even the authority of a bishop.
Dr. Connolly was not wanting in firmness, but the pressing needs of the times, forcing an apparent concession to the established order of things, subjected him to much difficulty and many humiliations. He was a missionary priest rather than a bishop, as he wrote Cardinal Litta, Prefect of Propaganda, in February, 1818, but he discharged all his laborious duties with humility and earnest zeal. His diary further notes that he told the cardinal: "I found here about 13,000 Catholics. At present there are about 16,000 mostly Irish; at least 10,000 Irish Catholics arrived at New York only within these last three years. They spread through all the other states of this confederacy, and make their religion known everywhere. Bishops ought to be granted to whatever here is willing to erect a Cathedral, and petition for a bishop. . . . The present dioceses are quite too extensive. Our Cathedral owes $55,000 borrowed to build it. . . . This burden hinders us from supporting a sufficient number of priests, or from thinking to erect a seminary. The American youth have an invincible repugnance to the ecclesiastical state."

He made a visitation of the diocese, no mean accomplishment at that time; provided churches for the people in Brooklyn, Buffalo, Albany, Utica, and Paterson; introduced the Sisters of Charity, started the orphan asylum, and urged the opening of parochial schools. He died at his residence, 512 Broadway, 5 Feb., 1825, worn out by his labours and anxieties. Notable men of this period were Fathers Michael O’Gorman and Richard Bulger—the latter the first priest ordained in New York (1820)—Charles D. French, John Power, John Parnan, Thomas C. Levis, Philip Larey and John Shannahan. There were several distinguished converts, including Mother Seton, founder of the American branch of the Sisters of Charity; the Rev. Virgil Barber and his wife, the Rev. John Richards, the Rev. George Kewley, the Rev. George E. Ironside, Keating Lawson, and others. Two years elapsed before the next bishop was appointed, and the Rev. Dr. John Power during that period governed the diocese as administrator. Brooklyn's first church was organized during this time. It was during Bishop Connolly's administration also, that New York's first Catholic paper "The Truth Teller" was started, on 2 April, 1825.

C.—The choice of the Holy See for the third bishop was Rev. Dr. John Dubois, president of Mount St. Mary's College, Emmitsburg (see Dubois, John), and he was consecrated at Baltimore, 29 October, 1826. The Rev. William Taylor, a convert who had emigrated from Cork, Ireland, in June, 1818, at the suggestion of Bishop English of Charleston, endeavoured to be himself made bishop, going to Rome in January, 1829, for that purpose. This visit to Rome being fruitless, Taylor went to Boston, where he remained several years with Bishop Cheverus, returning to New York when that prelate was transferred to France. He was exceedingly popular with non-Catholics because of his liberality. He preached the sermon at the consecration of Bishop Dubois and used the occasion to expatiate on what he called "disastrous experiences which resulted to religion from injudicious appointments," hinting at coming trouble for the Church in New York. He left New York simultaneously with the arrival of the bishop there, and sailed for France, where his old friend Mgr Cheverus, then Archbishop of Bordeaux, received him. He died soon after, while preaching in the Irish college, Paris, in 1828.

None of the predicted disturbances happened when Bishop Dubois took possession of his see, though the abuse of trusteeism, grown more and more insolent and unmanageable by tolerance, hampered his efforts from the very start. Fanaticism was aroused among the Protestant sects, alarmed at the numerical increase of the Church through the immigration attracted by the commercial growth of the State. But in spite of all, he went on bravely visiting all parts of the State, building and encouraging the building of churches wherever they were needed, obtaining aid from Rome and from the charitable in Europe. He found but two churches in the city when he came; to these he added six others and multiplied for his flock the facilities for practising their religion, his constant endeavour being to give his people priests, churches, and schools. With the trustees in New York City and in Buffalo he had many sad experiences, but he unflinchingly upheld his constituted authority. In 1834 he organized, with the Rev. John Raffaener as pastor, the first German Catholic congregation in New York in a small disused Baptist church at Pitt and De Lancey Streets, which became the church of St. Nicholas. It was about this time, too, that a public controversy over Catholic doctrine raged between the Calvinist ministers, Rev. John Breckenridge and Rev. William Brownlee, and the vicar-general, Dr. Dr. Power, assisted by Fathers Varela, Levis, and Schneller. It was followed by the fanatical attack on Catholic religious communities known as "The Awful Disclosures of Maria Monk." Dr. Dubois "had then reached the age of seventy and, though still a vigorous combatant when necessary, was disinclined to religious controversy. Perhaps he did not understand the country and the people as well as the younger men who had grown up in America; perhaps he was deterred by his memories of the French Revolution" (Herbermann, "Hist. Records and Studies" 1, Pt. 2, 333).

At length the many burdens and anxieties of his charge told on the bishop, and he asked for a coadjutor, naming the Right Rev. P. F. Kenrick, Coadjutor of Philadelphia, as his first choice, and the Rev. Thomas F. Mulledy, S.J., and the Rev. John Hughes, of Philadelphia, as alternates. Father Hughes, of Philadelphia, who had been his pupil at Emmitsburg, was selected and consecrated titular Bishop of Basileo, 7 January, 1838. His youth and vigour soon put new life into the affairs of the Church in New York, and were especially efficient in meeting the aggression of the lay trustees. Bishop Hughes had fully realized the dangers of the system as shown in Philadelphia, and he lost no time in meeting and crushing it in New York. Bishop Dubois, through ill health, had to relinquish the details of his charge more and more to his youthful assistant, whose activity he warmly welcomed. Several attacks of paralysis warned him to give up the management of the diocese. His remain-
NEW YORK

D.—Bishop Hughes, the administrator, at once assumed the title of the see as its fourth bishop, and is the really great figure in the constructive period of New York’s history. “It was a day of great men in the civil order”, says the historian, Dr. John Gilmary Shea, “the day of Clay, Webster, Calhoun, man of that era spoke so directly or so effectively to the American people as Bishop Hughes. He was not an ordinary man. It had been well said that in any case he would have been notable. He was full of noble thoughts and aspirations and every plan and every project of his mind aimed at the greatest good of the country.”

The story of his eventful career is told in a separate article (see Hughes, John), and it will suffice to mention here some of the many distinguished men who helped to make his administration so important in local records. Among them were the Rev. William Quater, afterwards first Bishop of Chicago, and his brother, the Rev. Walter J. Quater; the Rev. Bernard O’Reilly, first Bishop of Hartford; the Rev. John Loughlin, first Bishop of Brooklyn; the Rev. James R. Bayley, first Bishop of Newark and Archbishop of Baltimore; the Rev. David Bacon, first Bishop of Portland; the Rev. William G. McCloskey, first rector of the American College at Rome and fourth Bishop of Louisville, Ky., son of one of the Brooklyn pioneers; the Rev. Andrew Byrne, first Bishop of Little Rock; the Rev. John J. Corry, Bishop of Albany; the Rev. William Starrs, vicar-general; the Rev. Dr. Ambrose Manahan, the Rev. Dr. J. W. Cummings, Archdeacon McCarron, the Rev. John Kelly (Eugene Kelly’s brother), who went as a missionary to Africa and then became first pastor at Jersey City. These are only a few of the names that are prominent. Among the notable converts of this period may be mentioned the Rev. Thomas S. Purcell, J. V. Huntington, F. E. White, Donald McLeod, Isaac T. Hecker, A. F. Hewit, Alfred Young, Clarence Walworth, and Edgar P. Wadhams, later Bishop of Ogdensburg.

E.—As the successor of Archbishop Hughes, Bishop John McCloskey of Albany was promoted to be the second archbishop. He had been consecrated Coadjutor of New York, with the right of succession, in 1844, but resigned both offices to become the first Bishop of Albany in 1847 (see McCloskey, John). He returned to New York in spite of his own protest of unworthiness, but with the unanimous approval and rejoicing of the clergy and laity. He was born in Brooklyn, 10 March, 1810, and was therefore the first native bishop, as he was the second native of New York to be ordained to the priesthood. He was a gentle, polished, amiable creature, and accomplished much for the progress of Catholic New York. The Protectors, The Foundling Asylum, and the Mission of the Immaculate Virgin for homeless children were founded under his auspices; he resumed work on the new Cathedral, and saw its completion; the preparatory seminary at Troy was organized; churches, schools, and charitable institutions were everywhere increased and improved. In the stimulation of a general appreciation of the necessity of Catholic education, he was a cardinal (he was elevated to the Purple in 1875) was incessant and most vigorous. He saw that the foundations of the structure, laid deep by his illustrious predecessor, were being steadily and constantly increased.

F.—Born in Newark, 31 August, 1839, his college days were spent at Mt. St. Mary’s, Emmitsburg, and at Rome. Ordained in 1863, Bishop Corrigan became president of Seton Hall College in 1868, Bishop of Newark in 1873, Coadjutor of New York in 1880, and archbishop in 1885 (see Corrigan, Michael A.). He died, from an accidental fall during the building of the Lady Chapel at the Cathedral, 2 May, 1902. It was said of him by the historian, “The memory of his life distils a fragrance like that of St. Francis.” By some New Yorkers he was for a time a much misunderstood man, whose memory time will vindicate. Acute thinker and critic, he appreciated the worth of a civilian as well as a churchman, and the fact that, for Catholics, he grappled with the first menacing move of Socialism and effectually and permanently checked its advance. By way of administrative ability and, socially, a man of winning personality, to the serious problem of providing for the spiritual need of the inrushing thousands of European immigrants he gave successful consideration. The splendid seminary at Dunwoodie is his best memorial. Its beautiful chapel it built at a cost of $60,000—his whole private inherited fortune. During his administration controversy over the school question was waged with a certain amount of acrimony. He was regarded as the leader of those all over the country who stood for uncompromising Catholic education. Archbishop Corrigan was also drawn into conflict with the Rev. Dr. Edward McGeely, rector of St. Stephen’s church, a man of considerable ability, but whose radical views on the ownership of land had brought on him the official censure of Cardinal Simeoni, Prefect of Propaganda. In the municipal election of 1886, in spite of the archbishop’s warnings, he became the open partisan of Henry George who was the candidate for mayor of the Single Tax party. As a consequence, he was suspended, and, as an alumnus of the College of Propaganda, was summoned to Rome to answer the charges made against him. He refused to go and was excommunicated.—For details and text of official letters, see Archbishop Corrigan’s statement to New York papers (21 January, 1887) and Dr. McGeely’s formal answer in Henry George’s “Standard” (5 February, 1887).—Dr. McGeely’s partisans organized themselves into what they called the Anti-Poverty Society. He addressed this body every Sunday until about Christmas, 1882, when, having willingly accepted the conditions laid down by the pope, he was absolved from censure and reconciled by Mgr Satolli, the Apostolic delegate, according to a published statement by Mgr Satolli, the conditions were in this form: “Dr. McGeely had presented a brief statement of his opinions on moral—economic matters, and it was judged not contrary to the doctrine constantly taught by the Church, and as recently confirmed by the Holy Father in the encyclical ‘Rerum Novarum’. Also it is hereby made known that Dr. McGlynn, besides publicly professing his adherence to all the doctrines and teachings of the Catholic Church, has no need of a Council (saying that he would be the first to regret it) for any word or act of his that may have seemed lacking in the respect due to ecclesiastical authority, and he hereby intends to retract any words or acts and any offense which may have been given to Catholics. Finally, Dr. McGlynn has of his own free will declared and promised that, within the limits of a not long period of time, he will go to Rome in the spirit and intention which are becoming to a good Catholic and a priest.” In 1894 Dr. McGlynn was appointed pastor of St. Mary’s church, Newburg, where he remained quietly until his death in 1901.

Archbishop Corrigan made his last visit ad limina in 1890 and after his return, until his death in 1902, devoted himself entirely to the duties of his high office. His death brought out the fact that he was the foremost figure of the community in the respect and affection of his fellow-citizens. His unassuming personality and his gentle method, his considerate kindness and his unaffected piety were pathways to the love and veneration of his own flock. His steadfast adherence to principle, as well as his persuasive manner of, not only teaching, but also of acting out the doctrines of his religion, his profound scholarship, his experienced judgment, were ever employed when the safe question of a religious, moral, or civil import to his fellow-men. The truth of this is to be found in the testimony of Leo XIII, himself, of the civil dignitaries of the land, of his brethren in the episcopate, of his clergy and laity, on the mournful occasion of his death. Under the second and third archbishops, Mgr William Quinn, V.G., was a prominent figure, and among his associates of this era were Mgr Thomas S. Prendergast, Mgr Arthur J. Donnelly, Mgr James McMahon, Mgr P. F. McSweeney, Fathers M. Curran, William Everett, W. H. Clowry, Felix H. Farrell, Eugene McGuire, Thomas Farrell, Edward J. Byrne, M. J. O’Farrell (later Bishop of Trenton), and Edmund Aubril.

G.—As fourth archbishop, the Holy See confirmed the choice of the diocesan electors, and appointed to fill the vacancy the auxiliary, the Right Rev. John McGlynn Farley, titular Bishop of Zeugma, who was promoted to the archiepiscopate 15 September, 1902. He was born at Newton Hamilton, County Armagh, Ireland, 20 April, 1842. His primary studies were made at St. Macartin’s College, Monaghan, and, on his coming to New York, were continued at St. John’s College, Fordham. Thence he went to the provincial seminary at Troy for his philosophy course, and after this to the American College, Rome, where he was ordained priest 11 June, 1870. Returning to New York, he ministered as an assistant in St. Peter’s parish, Staten Island, for two years, and in 1872 was appointed secretary to the then Archbishop McGliskey, in which office he served until 1884, when he was made pastor of St. Gabriel’s church, New York City. He accompanied the cardinal to Rome in 1878, for the election of Leo XIII, which event, however, took place before their arrival. In 1884 he was made a private chamberlain; in 1892 he was promoted to the domestical prelacy, and in 1896 to be prothonotary apostolic. In 1891 he was chosen vicar-general of the diocese by Archbishop Corrigan, and in 1895, 21 December, 1895, was consecrated as his auxiliary, with the title of Bishop of Zeugma. At the death of Archbishop Corrigan, he was appointed his successor, 15 Sept., 1902, and in 1903 was assigned to the pastoral throne, 1904. He made progress in Catholic education in the diocese the keynote of his administration, and within the first eight years added nearly fifty parochial schools to the primary list, encouraged the increase also of high schools, and founded Cathedral College as a preparatory seminary.

In the proceedings of the annual convention of the Catholic Educational Association held in New York in 1903, and of the National Eucharistic Congress in 1904, Archbishop Farley took a most active and directive part. Synods were held regularly every third year, and theological conferences quarterly, to give effect to every instruction and legislative act of the Holy See. A monthly recollection for all the priests of the diocese assembled together was instituted. Provision was made for the religious needs of Italians and other Catholic immigrants—the Italian portion of his flock numbering about 400,000 souls. The great work of issuing The Catholic Encyclopedia owed its inception and progress to his help and stimulus. The centenary of the erection of the diocese was celebrated under his direction by a magnificent festival lasting a week (April 27—May 2, 1908); the Lady Chapel of the Cathedral was completed, the Cathedral debt was paid off, and the edifice consecrated 5 Oct., 1910, Cardinal Vincenzo Vannutelli, papal legate, to the Twenty-first Eucharistic Congress, Cardinal Logue, Primate of All Ireland, Cardinal Gibbons of Baltimore, 70 prelates, 1000 priests, and an immense congregation of the laity being present at the Mass of the day.

Archbishop Farley was given an auxiliary in the Right Rev. Thomas F. Cusack, who was consecrated titular Bishop of Themiscrys, 25 April, 1904. Bishop Cusack was born in New York, 22 Feb., 1852, and made his classical course at St. Francis Xavier’s College where he graduated in 1880. His theological studies were pursued at the provincial seminary, Troy, where he was ordained priest in 1883. He was a very successful director of the Diocesan-Apostolate (1897—1904) before his consecration as bishop, after which he was appointed Rector of St. Stephen’s parish.

IV.—Diocesan Institutions.—The Cathedral.—St. Patrick’s Cathedral, standing on the crest of New York’s most magnificent thoroughfare, is the noblest temple ever dedicated, in any land, to the honour of the Apostles of Ireland. It is an edifice of which every citizen of the great metropolis is justly proud. Its style is the decorated and geometric Gothic of which the cathedrals of Reims, Amiens, and Cologne are prominent examples. It was planned in 1853 by James Renwick of New York; construction was begun in 1858, and the building was formally opened and dedicated on 25 May, 1879 (building operations having been suspended, owing to the Civil War, from 1861—66). The site of the cathedral, the block bounded by Fifth Avenue, Fifthieth Street, Fourth Avenue, and Fifty-first Street, has been in the possession of the church authorities, and used for ecclesiastical purposes, except during a very brief interval (1821—1826), since 1 March, 1810. The block on which the Cathedral stands was purchased at its then marketable value.

and therefore never was a gift or donation from the city, as has been said sometimes, either ignorantly or even with malicious intent. The cornerstone was laid on the afternoon of Sunday, 15 August, 1858, by Archbishop Hughes, in the presence of an assemblage estimated at one thousand. The address delivered by the archbishop was regarded as one of the most eloquent and memorable he ever uttered. The gathering may be considered the first public manifestation of that great Catholic New York which became the wonder and admiration of the nineteenth century, and it lent inspiration and power to the magic of his ringing words of joy and triumph.

St. Patrick’s Cathedral is the eleventh in size among the great churches of the world. Its dimensions are as follows, the Lady Chapel excluding: Exterior—Extreme length (with Lady Chapel), 308 feet; extreme breadth, 174 feet; general breadth, 132 feet; towers at base, 52 feet; height of towers, 300 feet. Interior—Length, 270 feet; breadth of nave and choir (excluding chapels), 96 feet; breadth of nave and choir (including chapels), 120 feet; length of transept, 140 feet; central aisle, 48 feet wide, 112 feet high; side aisles, 24 feet wide, 54 feet high; chapels 18 feet wide, 14 feet high, 12 feet deep. The foundations are of very large blocks of blue gneiss, which were laid in cement mortar up to the level of the surface. Above the ground-line, the first base-course is of granite, as is also the first course under the colonnade, and the walls of the interior. Above this base-course the whole exterior of the building is of white marble. The cost of the building was about four million dollars. In the original plan there was an apse at each end of the nave, but work on this was not begun until 20 July, 1901, during the administration of Archbishop Corrigan. It was finished by Archbishop Farley in 1906. The architect was George T. Mathews whose design was thirteenth-century French Gothic. This chapel is 56½ feet long by 28 feet wide and 56 feet high. The building of the Lady Chapel was started by a memorial gift for that purpose from the family of Eugene Kelly, the banker, who died in New York, 19 Dec., 1894. Eugene Kelly was born in County Tyrone, Ireland, 25 Nov., 1808, and emigrated to New York in 1834. He engaged in the drygoods business and later at St. Louis, Mo., where he died in 1850 during the gold excitement. As a banker and merchant there, he amassed a considerable fortune and the interests of which took him back to New York to live in 1866. He was a trustee of the Cathedral for several years and in 1852 he died. Bishop Hughes received for several years of terms and indemnities with the Catholic charitable, educational, and social movements of the city. In the crypt of the church the deceased archbishops are buried, and the vault of the Kelly family is at the rear of the sacristy under the Chapel.

Education.—In the cause of Catholic education the Diocese of New York can claim the proud distinction of being the pioneer of the unceasing and uncompromising advocate. In 1685 the Jesuit Fathers Harvey and Harrison began the first Catholic educational institution in the state; the New York Latin School, which stood near the present site of Trinity Church, Wall Street and Broadway, and was attended by the sons of the most influential colonial families. This school was closed by the fanatical intolerance which followed the Congregational administration in 1685. In 1801, Father Matthew O’Brien, O.P., pastor of St. Peter’s Church, opened the free school of the parish which has been carried on ever since without interruption. During the first five years it was supported entirely by the parishioners, but after the legislature of the state, by an act passed 21 March, placed the school on the same footing as those of other religious denominations in the city; all of them received state support at that time, and Father O’Brien’s school received its share of the public money. After St. Peter’s church was commenced, Father Kohlmann, S.J., began the

New York Literary Institution, the first collegiate school of the diocese, in a house on Mott Street opposite the church. It was an immediate success, and was soon removed to a house on Broadway, and then, in March, 1812, to a suburban site in the village of Elgin, now Fiftieth Street and Fifth Avenue, the site of St. Patrick’s Cathedral. Although well patronized by the best families of the city, the inability of the Jesuit community to keep up the teaching staff forced the abandonment of the enterprise in 1815. To supply teachers for girls, Father Kohlmann secured several Ursuline Nuns from Cork, Ireland, who arrived in the city 9 April, 1812. Their convent was located near the Literary Institution, and the Legislature, by the Act of 23 March, 1814, incorporated “The Ursuline Convent of the City of New York,” by which “Christian Fagan, Sarah Walsh, Mary Baldwin and others are incorporated for the purpose of teaching poor children.” After a year, as no other subjects joined their community, and they were not satisfied with the location, which was too remote from the city for them to receive daily spiritual direction from a chaplain, these nuns gave up the school and returned to Ireland.

With the advent of Bishop Connolly to the diocese (24 November, 1815) St. Patrick’s parochial school was opened in the basement of the cathedral. The “Catholic Almanac” for 1822 relates that “there are in this city two extensive Catholic schools, one upon a judicious plan and supported partly by the funds of the State and partly by moneys raised twice a year by the two congregations.” The report of the Superintendents of St. Peter’s church to the superintendents of the common schools, in 1824, states that the average number of scholars in St. Peter’s and St. Patrick’s schools from their opening had been about 500 each. These two were the pioneer schools in a great parochial system of free schools throughout the diocese which has been the example and stimulus for Catholic education all over the United States. On 28 June, 1817, three Sisters of Charity came to her native city by Mother Seton, arrived in New York from Emmitsburg to take charge of the orphan asylum and school of St. Patrick’s Church. In 1830 these Sisters of Charity took charge of St. Peter’s school and opened two academies. In 1816, owing to the conflict between the French rule of their institute, forbidding the care of boys, and other objections, the institute was dissolved and the school remained under the control of the diocese. In 1847 it was moved to Fifth Avenue and One Hundred and Fifth Street, where the academy for girls and mother-house of Mount St. Vincent was established. Ten years later the city took this property for Central Park, and the community moved to the banks of the Hudson, just below Yonkers, where the College of Mount St. Vincent, and the headquarters of the community now are. There are about eighteen hundred of these sisters teaching in more than sixty parish schools and in charge of diocesan institutions.

In 1841 a community of the Religious of the Sacred Heart was sent to the diocese by Mother Boscobel and established their first school at Houston and Mulberry Streets. A year later this was moved to Astoria, Long Island, and in 1846 to the present site of the convent at Manhattanville, where, under the direction of the famous Mother Mary Aloysia Hardey, it became, not only a popular educational institution but the centre whence radiated most of the progress made by the Institute throughout the United States. When the first Religious of the Sacred Heart arrived in New York, 31 July, 1827, on their way from France to make the first foundation in the
ST. PATRICK'S CATHEDRAL, NEW YORK
United States at St. Louis, Missouri, Bishop Dubois was most favorably impressed by them, and wished to have a community for New York also. A letter which he wrote to Mother Barat in the following October expresses this desire and gives a view of his charge at that time. "It was my intention", he says, "to visit you and your pious associates in Paris in order to give you a better idea of our country before asking you to establish a house in New York. There is no doubt as to the success of an order like yours in this city; indeed it is greatly needed; but a considerable sum of money would be required to supply the urgent needs of the foundation. The Catholic population, which averages over thirty thousand souls, is very poor, besides chiefly composed of Irish emigrants. Contributions from Protestants are so uncertain and property in this city so expensive that I cannot promise any assistance. All I can say is that I believe one of your schools, commenced with sufficient money to purchase property and support itself until the ladies have time to make themselves known, would succeed beyond all our expectations. . . . I have the sorrow of witnessing an abundant harvest rotting in the earth, through lack of Apostolic labourers and the necessary funds to organize the various needs of the diocese." Although Bishop Dubois was not able to accomplish his desire to have a school then established, his purpose was to secure it as soon as it was opened, which was amply justified by subsequent results.

The Sisters of Mercy, Sisters of St. Dominic, School Sisters of Notre Dame, and other teaching communities followed in the course of the succeeding years, until now (1910) the parish schools of the archdiocese are in charge of twenty-six different religious communities, twenty-two of Sisters and four of Brothers. In 1829, an Irishman named James D. Boyle with the approbation of Bishop Dubois attempted to establish a religious community on the lines of the Irish Brothers of Charity to teach the boys' schools, and opened two schools. The attempt failed in the course of the year, owing to want of business tact and the inimical spirit of trusteesism. The Christian Brothers opened their first school in New York in September, 1848, in St. Vincent de Paul's parish, at 16 East Canal Street. La Salle Academy was opened in Canal Street in 1850, moved to Mulberry Street in 1856 and East Second Street in 1857. Manhattan College was opened in 1853. These Brothers have charge also of the De La Salle Institute, the Clasen Group, Military Academy, twenty-six parish schools, and the great Catholic Proctorary. Bishop Hughes, in 1846, invited the Jesuits to return to the diocese and take charge of St. John's College and Seminary at Fordham, which he had opened there in the old Rose Hill mansion house, 24 June, 1841. The seminary was moved to Troy in 1864, and St. John's remained as part of Fordham University. St. Francis Xavier's College was begun at the school of the church of the Holy Name of Jesus, Elizabeth Street, in 1847. It was burned down in the following year, reopened in Third Avenue near Thirty-third Street, and finally located in West Sixteenth Street in 1850. Loyola School was opened by the Jesuits in 1899 at Park Avenue and Fifty-third street.

As has been said, the state appropriation for education was divided at first among all schools. Public education in New York, at the opening of the nineteenth century, was denominational, and under the direction of the Public School Society organized in 1835 "to provide a free school for the education of poor children in the city who do not belong to, or are not provided for by any religious denomination." In 1808 the name was changed to the "Free School Society of New York" and again in 1826 to the "Public School Society of New York," with the object of "providing for the education of all children not otherwise provided for." This society gradually became, under the control of intolerant sectarian ministers, a combination against Catholic interests so that, when, in 1840, the eight Catholic parish schools, with an attendance of about 4000 pupils, made a demand for the share of the school appropriations to which the law entitled them, it was refused by the Board of Aldermen after a memorable hearing of the Catholic petition in the City Hall on 29-30 October, 1840, at which Bishop Hughes made one of his greatest oratorical efforts. As a result of this contest the Public School Society was soon after abolished, and the present system of parish school control was enacted. The Catholics of New York also determined to organize and maintain their own system of free parish schools.

"Go", Bishop Hughes told them, "build your own schools; raise arguments in the shape of the best educated and most moral citizens of the Republic, and the day will come when you will enforce reception".

To supply priests for the diocese Bishop Dubois established a seminary at Nyack-on-Hudson, in 1833, but it was burned down just as it was ready to be opened. Cornelius Hessey then offered the bishop the ground in Brooklyn on which St. John's now stands, refusing, however, to give the diocese the title to the property immediately, and the design to build in Brooklyn was abandoned. In 1838 the estate of John Lafarge, Grovemont, in Jefferson County, was purchased and the seminary begun there. The place was then so inaccessible and impracticable that it was given up, and, on 24 June, 1841, Bishop Hughes, administrator of the diocese, opened with thirty students the new St. John's seminary and college at Fordham, then a village just outside the city. The Rev. John McClosey, later Archbishop of New York and first cardinal in the United States, was its first president. The seminary remained at Fordham until 24 Oct., 1864, when it was moved again to Troy, where St. Joseph's seminary began with fifty-seven students transferred from Fordham. The faculty was composed of secular priests from Ghent, Belgium, under the direction of the Very Reverend H. Vanderhende. Here the seminary remained until 1896, during which period more than 700 priests were ordained there. The building was then moved over to the western side of the city. St. Joseph's Church was then completed and the College opened there. In 1897, the new seminary was opened at Dunwoodie, the new parish school at Dunwoodie was solemnly dedicated by Cardinal Spellman, archbishop of New York, the first cardinal in the United States. The care of this seminary was entrusted to the Sulpicians Fathers, but these retired in 1906, and the work was continued by the secular clergy of the archdiocese. A further step in providing facilities for seminary training was taken up by Archbishop Farley in September, 1903, by the opening of Cathedral College for the preparatory studies of ecclesiastical students.

In the cause of education the work done by the Catholic publishers must be noted; for New York, with the increase of its Catholic population, developed also into a great producing and distributing centre for Catholic books of all kinds. It is claimed by Bernard Dornin who arrived in New York in 1803, an exile from Ireland, that he was the first publisher of exclusively Catholic works in the United States. His edition of Pastorini’s "History of the Christian Church" (1807), was the first Catholic book published in New York. The next year he issued an edition of Dr. Fletcher’s "Reflections on the Spirit of Religious Controversy", for which he had 144 city subscribers. There were 318 for the Pastorini book, and these two lists make an interesting directory of Catholic New York families at the opening of the nineteenth century. Dornin left New York for Baltimore in 1809. He was followed in New York by Matthew Field who published "at his library 177 Bowery within a few doors of Delancey St," the first American year book, "The Catholic Layman’s Directory to the Church Services with an almanac for the year 1817". In 1823 John Doyle began to publish books at 237 Broadway, and, up to 1849, when he went to San Francisco, he had issued many books of instruction and devotion. Most of the Doyle plates were taken over by Edward Duggan, who had been Dornin’s close associates. John Gilmary Shea’s early histories were published by this firm, as was a fine edition of Haydock’s Bible (1844) and many school-books and standard works. In 1837 Dennis and James Saliber began to issue Butler’s "Lives of the Saints" and an edition of the Bible in monthly parts, and thus commenced what later developed into one of the largest book concerns in the United States. The list of their publications is as varied as it is lengthy, and remarkable for the time with a series of "Metropolitan" school books. Patrick O’Shea, who had been associated with the Dugan concern, began for himself in 1854 and, until his death, in 1906, was a very industrious publisher of Catholic books, his publications including, besides a great number of select books and many editions of valuable works, such as Darras’ "History of the Church", Digby’s "More", Brownson’s "American Republic", Lingard’s "History of England", Wiseman’s and Lacordaire’s works. Bensiger Brothers, in 1853, opened the branch of their German house that developed into the great concern, covering all branches of the trade. Father Isaac T. Hecker, C.S.P., as part of his dream for the evangelization of his non-Catholic fellow-countrymen, founded, in 1866, the Catholic Publication Society. Into this enterprise his brother, George V. Hecker, also a convert, unsurpassedly put thousands of dollars. Its manager was Lawrence Koehoe, a man well versed in all the best ideals of the trade, who sent out its many books, bound and printed in a lavishness of style not attempted before.

Charities.—New York gave early evidence of the characteristic of heroic charity. In a letter written by Father Kohlmann, 21 March, 1809, he mentions "applications made at all houses to raise a subscription for the relief of thousands who have been collected to be paid constantly each year". New York then had only one church for its 16,000 Catholics. An orphan asylum was opened in 1817 in a small wooden house at the corner of Mott and Prince streets, the "New York Catholic Benevolent Society", for its support and management, was incorporated the same year by the Legislature—the first Catholic Society so legalized in the state—and Mother Seton sent three of her Sisters of Charity from Emmitsburg to take care of the children. This asylum was moved in 1851 to the block adjoining the Cathedral in Fifth Avenue and remained there until this property was sold and the institution located in Weehawken, Hudson county, in 1901. A Union Emigrant Society, to aid immigrants, the precursor of the Irish Emigrant Society and the Emigrant Industrial Savings Bank (see EMIGRANT INDUSTRIAL SAVINGS BANK) was established in 1847. St. Patrick’s, the first New York Conference of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul, was affiliated to the Paris Council in 1849, and in the steady increase of the organization throughout the diocese opened a new field for Catholic charity. The sturdy fight that had to be made against the raids on poor and neglected Catholic children in the public institutions was mainly through its members, and out of their efforts, in great measure, also grew the great Catholic Protectors, the Mission of the Immaculate Virgin, the Founding Asylum, and the more recent Fresh Air and Convalescent Homes, Day Nurseries, and other incidental details of modern philanthropy.

The progress of the diocese is shown by the records kept of the gradual growth of population which made a great metropolis out of the small provincial city. The notable increase begins with the immigration during the canal and railroad-building period, after 1825, the exodus from Ireland following the famine year of 1847, and the German flight after the Revolutions of 1848. In 1826 in New York City there were but three churches and 30,000 Catholics; and in the whole diocese (including New Jersey) only eight churches, eighteen priests and 150,000 Catholics. The diocesan figures for 1850 are recorded as follows: churches, 57; chapel, 8; stations, 30; priests, 99; seminary, 1, with 34 students; academies, 3; hospital, 1; charity of poor, by which means $3000 have been collected to be paid constantly each year. New York then had only one church for its 16,000 Catholics. An orphan asylum was opened in 1817 in a small wooden house at the corner of Mott and Prince streets, the "New York Catholic Benevolent Society", for its support and management, was incorporated the same

In 1900 we find these totals: churches, 259 (city, 111; country, 148); chapels, 154; stations, 34; priests, 676 (regular, 227); 112 ecclesiastical students; 60 parish schools for boys in city, with 18,683 pupils; 61 parish schools for girls outside city, with 21,160 pupils; 54 parishes outside city for boys, with 3743 pupils; for girls, 34, with 4542 pupils; in colleges and academies, 2439 boys and 2484 girls; schools for deaf mutes, 2; day nurseries, 4; emigrant homes, 5; homes for the aged, 3; hospitals, 15; industrial and reform schools, 26; infant asylum, 1; orphan asylums, 6; total of young people under Catholic care, 68,629; Catholic population, 1,000,000. The figures for 1910 are: archbishop, 1; bishop, 1; churches, 331 (city, 147; country, 184); chapels, 193; stations (without churches) regularly visited, 35; priests, 929 (secular, 605; regular, 324); theological seminary (Dunwoodie), 1; students, 165; students (Rome), 11; preparatory seminary, 1; students, 235; pupils in colleges and academies for boys, 3407; in academies for girls, 3512; parish schools, New York City, for boys, 90, with 27,909 pupils; for girls, 90, with 31,004 pupils; outside New York City, 88, with 6377 male pupils, 6913 female; total in parish schools, 72,193; schools for deaf mutes, 3; day nurseries, 15; emigrant homes, 5; homes for the aged, 4; hospitals, 22; industrial and reform schools, 26; orphan asylums, 7; asylums for the blind, 2; total of young people under Catholic care, 101,087; Catholic population, 1,219,920. Besides those for English-speaking Catholics, there are now churches and priests in New York for Germans, Italians, Poles, French, Hungarians, Bohemians, Lithuanians, Greek Albanians, Greek Syrians, Greek Ruthenians, Slovaks, Spaniards, Chinese, for coloured people and for deaf mutes.

NEW YORK, STATE OF, one of the thirteen colonies of Great Britain, which on 4 July, 1776, adopted the Declaration of Independence and became the United States of America.

BOUNDARIES AND AREA.—The State of New York lies between 40° 29' 40" and 45° 0' 22" N. lat. and between 71° 51' and 79° 45' 54" W. long. It is bounded by Lake Ontario, the St. Lawrence River, and the Dominion of Canada on the north; by Vermont, Massachusetts, and Connecticut on the east, by Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and the Atlantic Ocean on the south, and by Pennsylvania, Lake Erie, and the Niagara River on the west. It has an area of 49,170 square miles, of which 1500 square miles is water surface. From east to west it is 420-46 miles in width; it is 300 miles long on the line of the Hudson River.

PHYSICAL CHARACTERISTICS.—The physical geography of New York is very varied. It includes the higher part of the Adirondack Mountains in the northeastern part. In the southern and eastern part lie important portions of the Appalachian system, of which the principal branches are: the Catskill Mountains on the west bank of the Hudson River below Albany; the ranges of the Blue Ridge, which cross the Hudson at West Point and form the Litchfield and Berkshire Hills and the Green Mountains on the eastern boundary of the State and in Connecticut, Massachusetts, and Vermont, and the foothills of the Alleghenies in the southwestern portion. The highest peak in the State is Mount Marcy in the Adirondacks, which has an altitude of 5944 feet. The valley of the Mohawk River divides the mountainous district in the eastern part of the State, and forms a natural channel in which the Erie Canal now lies, and which affords easy communication by water and rail between the Great Lakes and the Hudson River valley. On the Niagara River is one of the great cataracts of the world, Niagara Falls, which is a mile wide and 164 feet high. The preservation of its natural beauty has been ensured by the erection of a State Park, which adjoins a similar park established by the Canadian Government.

Geologically, the State of New York is most interesting. The Hudson river valley, and the Adirondacks form part of the Archean continent, which is regarded as the oldest portion of the earth's surface. The Hudson River rises in the Adirondack country. It is navigable for 151 miles, from Troy to the sea. The Palisades of the Hudson are among the most interesting and important examples of basaltic rocks in the world. The principal rivers of the State, besides the

SEA OF NEW YORK
The only seacoast of the State is formed by Long Island, and extends for 130 miles from New York Harbour to Montauk Point, which is nearly opposite the boundary line between the States of Connecticut and Rhode Island. The waters lying between Long Island and the mainland form Long Island Sound, one of the most important waterways of the United States. From the head of navigation on the Hudson River at Troy, a distance of 151 miles from the sea, there extends across the State to Lake Erie one of its great possessions, the Erie Canal, completed in 1825. It is 357 miles long. From Troy to Whitehall at the head of Lake Champlain extends another of the State's great works, the Champlain Canal, establishing water connection with the St. Lawrence valley on the north. Ample communication by water from the Lake States on the west and from Canada on the north to the Atlantic Ocean at New York Bay is provided by this canal system. There are also three other important interior canals owned by the State, the Oswego, the Cayuga and Seneca, and the Black River canals. In 1909 the goods carried free on these state canals valued nearly sixty million dollars. There is now under construction by the State the Great Barge Canal, which it is estimated will cost more than $60,000,000. It is intended to provide a waterway for movement of barges of 1000 tons from Lake Erie to New York City.

The physical geography of the State has been an important factor in its growth. The easy communication afforded by its great rivers and its convenient waterways has greatly aided the domestic trade and commerce and emigration for more than a century, while its possession of the greatest seaport of the North Atlantic Ocean has made the State the principal gateway for the world's trade with North America. The ice-free and deep-channelled port of New York, lying at the mouth of the Hudson River, with its wide roadsteads and anchorages and vast transportation facilities is indeed the greatest canal property of the State of New York. The port has a total water front of 444 miles.

Means of Communication.—The means of communication within the State are admirable.

Railroads.—In 1907 there were 8505 miles of railway and 3950 miles of electric railway tracks. The great railroad of the State is the New York Central system between New York and Buffalo which provides communication between New York City and the principal cities of all parts of the State by its own lines and their direct connections. The great New England system, the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad, besides having its terminal in New York City, crosses the southern part of the State into the coal and iron country of Pennsylvania. It controls also the extensive New York, Ontario, and Western Railroad, extending diagonally across the State from Oswego on Lake Ontario to the Hudson River at Wewahken, opposite New York. The Erie system, in addition to being one of the trunk lines to Chicago, is probably the greatest freight carrier in the Union. Its passenger traffic around New York City is also of great extent. Its terminal is in Jersey City opposite New York. The Delaware and Hudson Railroad extends from its connection with the Grand Trunk of Canada at Rondout's Point, to Albany, where it forms a connection with a network of roads extending into many of the important centres of central and western New York. The Delaware, Lackawanna, and Western Railroad runs parallel to the southern boundary of the State in New Jersey and Pennsylvania, and has its eastern terminal at Hoboken on the Hudson River also opposite New York City.

The Delaware, Lackawanna, and Western Railroad runs from Binghamton to Buffalo, Utica, and Oswego. It is the greatest of the anthracite coal carriers. The Buffalo, Rochester, and Pittsburg Railroad connects the three great cities named in its title, and serves one of the important agricultural, manufacturing, and mining districts of the States of New York and Pennsylvania. The Pennsylvania Railroad, one of the great national trunk lines, with its Hudson tunnels and its new vast terminal in New York City, is one of the great institutions of New York. Its main line runs in a north-south direction from New York to Philadelphia. It owns and operates in addition to its other properties the entire railroad system of the State, and a vast number of branches in the State. It is a body of great importance and influence, to which the prosperity of New York, and in a great measure the prosperity of the whole country, is due. It gives employment to thousands of men, and its work of construction and maintenance is constantly increasing.

Water Routes.—The communication by water within New York State is not less important. The Hudson River, the state's principal waterway, is 338 miles long, with a water front of 444 miles.

Wagon Roads.—The improved system of State highways, begun in late years, has given a large measure of comfort and safety to many of the rural districts and laid out avenues between the cities. It is based upon subventions of highway improvements by means of loans and aids from the State treasury to the various local authorities. The growth of vehicular traffic by electric trams and by automobiles has greatly promoted this work.

Climate.—The climate of the State is salubrious, and corresponds generally with that of the north temperate zone. In 1909—which was somewhat abnormal, it is true—the extreme temperatures were 102° above zero maximum and 35° below zero minimum. For 1909 the mean annual temperature of New York State was 45.8°. The average rainfall throughout the State for the same year was 36.03 inches. New York State is divided by the Department of Agriculture of the United States into three climatological districts: (1) the Hudson, Delaware, and Susquehanna basins, (2) the Allegheny River, and (3) the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence. The great extent of the State causes very variable climatic conditions within its boundaries. In 1909 the mean annual temperature for one part of the Adirondack region was 39° and for the vicinity of New York City 52°. The rainfall during the year 1909 averaged from 15.10 inches in Livingston County to 62.37 in Jefferson County. The winters in the Adirondack country, the St. Lawrence, and the Champlain valleys are generally severe, while the Hudson Valley, Long Island, and the vicinity of New York City have moderate winters and hot summers.

Population.—New York has been since 1820 the most populous state in the Union. The Federal Census returns of 1870 show the population at 11,114,279; the State Census of 1895 placed it at 8,067,305. The City of New York in 1810 comprised 2,566,883 souls. It is one of the centres of the population of the world. In a circle of 650 square miles area with its centre at the Battery (the same area as that of Greater London) there are dwelling six millions of people, or scarcely a million less than in the London district, which it is to be remembered is not a municipality. This metropolitan district is the most cosmopolitan community in the world. Its urban character is most varied and interesting. One division of it, the City of New York proper, is so large that it would make three cities such as Chicago, Philadelphia, and Pittsburgh. Yet nearly a million and a half of people live outside the limits of the city and within the indicated area.

The cities of Buffalo, Rochester, Syracuse, Albany, and Troy are the five next in size; according to the census of 1910 they include respectively 423,715, 218,149, 137,249, 162,255, and 76,813 people. In 1900 there were 4,521 Indians still on the State Reservations. There were 47 municipalities in New York in 1900 having a population of more than 5,000 people, and in them 65-6 per cent of the people dwelt. In 1900 there were 2,614,780 males and 2,684,114 females in the State. There were 99,232 coloured people. 1,900,425 of the population or a little less than one quarter were foreign born. Of these there were 450,029 Irish, 425,535 Irish, 125,049 Italians, 165,641 Russian (mostly Hebrews), and 135,685 English—to mention only the largest groups. The population of the whole State in 1790 was 340,120 by the first Federal Census. In 120 years it has increased more than twenty-six times.

In 1906, according to the Federal Census Bureau, there were 2,258,768 Roman Catholics in New York, forming 63.6 per cent of the total of 5,921,974 religious communicants or church members in the State of New York. It is the largest religious denomination in the State. However, only 43-7 per cent of the people of the State claimed membership in any church or denomination. In 1900 there were 275 Roman Catholics for each 1000 of the population, a gain of 8.6 per cent over the figures of the census reports of 1890. The number of Protestant Episcopal communicants at the same date in the State was 24 for each 1000 of the population. In 1906 the Federal Census reports show that in the State of New York the number of churches and halls for worship was 9193, having a seating capacity of 3,191,297. There were also presbyteries valued at $22,283,225. The Sunday schools were 8785 in number and attended by 1,247,951 scholars. The entire value of all church property was $13,535,000 on which the debt was $2,972,533. It was $3,082. The Catholic Annual for 1910 shows the following carefully gathered for the dioceses of New York State. All these dioceses, it should be noted, are wholly included within the State boundaries and together comprise the whole State:

Three Catholic estimates are interesting for the purposes of comparison with those of the official documents, and particularly as being in advance of the results of the Federal Census of 1910, which are now being prepared but cannot be published in detail for some years to come. The present population of the State of New York, according to the census of 1910, is 9,113,279, about one-tenth of the entire population of the United States.

WEALTH AND RESOURCES.—New York is the wealthiest State in the Union. The aggregate value of all the property within the State in 1904, as estimated by the Federal Census Bureau, was $14,769,042,207, of which $9,151,770,081 represented real property and improvements. The revenue of the State Government in 1908-9 was $522,285,239. The City of New York received the enormous revenue of $308,696,334 in 1908, and had in the same year a funded debt of $598,012,644. The resources of the State of New York lie first in its commerce, and then in its manufactures, agriculture, and mining.

Commerce.—In 1906 New York City was the third shipping port of the world, being surpassed only by London and Liverpool. Its imports were of the value of approximately 750 millions and its exports 600 millions. The tonnage movement of foreign trade for the year ending 30 June, 1909, was: entered, 12,528,723 tons; cleared, 11,866,431 tons. The shipping of the inland waters and of the Great Lakes controlled by the State of New York is of equally vast extent. Buffalo, with a population of over 400,000, receives in its port on Lake Erie a large portion of the shipping trade of Canada and of the Lake States of the Union. The other ports of Lakes Erie and Ontario are similarly prosperous.

Manufactures.—New York is the leading State of the Union in manufactures. In 1905 it had invested in manufactures more than $2,000,000,000, and the value of its manufactures products was approximately $2,500,000,000. In the same year it produced 47 per cent of the men’s and 70 per cent of the women’s clothing made in the United States. The value of its textile output in the same year was $114,371,226.

Agriculture.—In 1900 there were in New York 226,720 farms of a total area of 22,648,100 acres, of which 15,599,986 acres were improved land. The principal crops are maize, wheat, oats, potatoes, and hay. The wool clip in 1908 was estimated at 5,100,000 pounds. The largest dairy interests in the United States are within the State of New York.

Mining.—The mines of the state in 1908 yielded products valued at $45,605,801; the quarries produced building stone valued at $6,137,279. The Onondaga salt springs produced in the same year products of the value of $2,136,738, while the petroleum wells yielded $2,071,533 worth of crude oil.

PUBLIC DEBT.—The State of New York has no funded debt except for canals and highways. Its outstanding bonds for these purposes on 30 September, 1909, aggregated $41,250,660. It has no direct taxation. It has a surplus in its treasury. The assessed valuation of the taxable property within the State for 1909 was just short of $10,000,000,000. The title of "Empire State", given to New York by common consent, is well deserved.

EDUCATIONAL SYSTEM.—The public educational system of New York is extensive and arranged upon broad plans. It is governed by a general revised statute of more than 2000 sections called "Education Law", adopted in 1910. This law provides for a central organization called the "Education Department" composed of the regents of the University of the State of New York, who are the legislative branch, and the Commissioner of Education, who is made the chief executive officer of the system and of the regents. The work of the Educational Department is divided into three parts, the common schools, the academic or secondary schools, and the colleges and universities. The head of the regents of the university is the chancellor. Executive control, however, is entrusted to the commissioner of education, who, with his assistants and subordinates, has the burden of the minutest details of the entire educational system of the State. under the legislative control of the regents and the direction of the statutes of the State passed by the legislature. The colleges and universities of the State are separate corporations, formed either by the regents or by special statutes. They are under either private or municipal control. There is no State university as such, although Cornell University has been given many of the privileges and State aids usually granted to such an institution. These corporations are subject, however, to the provisions of the Education Law and the jurisdiction of the Education Department. The academies or secondary schools are also either private or public. The public secondary schools are directly in charge of the boards of education of the various divisions of the State. The private academies may enroll themselves under the Department of Education, and receive the privileges of the public academies in respect to examinations and certificates from the Education Department. There is, however, no legal compulsion put upon them in this respect. The common schools of the State are divided generally into those which are controlled by the local boards of education in the cities and more populous centers, and those which are controlled by the local school officers elected by the people in the school districts in other parts of the State. Woman suffrage is granted in school officers' elections. In the great cities of the State the common and secondary schools are usually placed in charge of school boards and officers provided for in the city charters, which are in the form of statutes enacted by the legislature.

In New York City is situated the large college known as the College of the City of New York, maintained at public expense. It has the most extensive buildings for educational purposes in the city and an enrollment of more than 3,736 pupils. On the Hudson, at West Point, is situated the famous United States Military Academy, for the training of officers for the army. It is entirely under Federal control through the War Department, and has 525 cadets in attendance. The professional schools of the State of all classes are controlled by the Education Department under stringent provisions. Admission to the seminaries generally is granted by State certificates awarded after rigid examinations by State examining boards. The schools for the training of teachers are also under the department of education of the more populous centers, under the control of the several boards of education of the localities. Primary education is compulsory between the ages of seven and sixteen years. The State does interfere, however, with the liberty of choice of schools by parents. No discrimination is made against parochial and private schools, which have enrolled themselves with the Education Department; they receive, however, no public financial aid, if the small grant made by the Department to defray the cost of examinations in the enrolled secondary schools be excepted.

In 1908 there were 1,841,628 children between five and eighteen years of age in New York State; there were 1,273,754 pupils and 36,132 teachers in the public schools. The academies or secondary schools of the State had 95,170 pupils and 1,523 teachers; the colleges under the care of 22,077 students and 2,090 teachers. There were 12,086 public school buildings, 144 public secondary schools or academies, and 30 colleges and universities. The appropriation of public money for educational purposes in New York State for the year 1907 was $71,838,172. The City of New York alone paid in 1909 for public school education $38,319,024. Its schools contained 730,534 pupils and had 17,074 teachers. The public statistics of the Department of Education of New York City show available that 451 parochial schools, besides numerous academies and colleges, were conducted under the auspices of the Catholic Church in New York in 1908. The number of pupils in the Catholic educational institutions of the State cannot be ascertained with certainty. A large number of Catholic schools and academies make no public reports, but it is conservatively estimated that 210,000 pupils were in the Catholic schools in 1908. The State Education Department reported that in 1907, 179,677 pupils were registered as in the Roman Catholic Elementary Schools alone, and the Catholic Mutual Life Insurance estimates the number of young people under Catholic care including the orphans and other inmates of charitable institutions as 269,420.

There are many excellent high schools and academies in the State conducted by the Catholic teaching orders of men and women and by secular priests and laymen. The colleges under Catholic auspices are: Fordham University, St. Francis Xavier College, Manhattan College, Brooklyn College, St. Francis College, St. John's College, Brooklyn—all in New York City; Canisius College at Buffalo, Niagara University at Niagara Falls, and the College of New Rochelle, a flourishing college established in charge of the Ursuline Nuns. All of these institutions are under the jurisdiction of the Education Department of the State of New York. In 1894 there was inserted in the Constitution of the State as a proviso, that no school or institution from any denomination or in any part under the control or direction of any religious denomination or in which any denominational tenet or doctrine is taught. The Catholic seminaries for the education of flourishing and several others maintained by various religious orders, are in the Hudson Valley, south of Albany. The seminaries of St. John's at Brooklyn, St. Bonaventure's at Rochester, and the Seminary of Our Lady of Angels, conducted by the priests of the Mission at Niagara Falls, in the Diocese of Buffalo, are of the highest standing for scholarship and training.

MILITIA.—The militia of the State is composed exclusively of volunteers, numbers 17,038 trained officers and men in all the arms of the military service. It is intended to form the nucleus of a military force in time of war. The State is engaged in the training of men-soldiers in the military art. It is most liberally supported by the State and most carefully trained in cooperation with the Federal Government.

LIBRARIES.—The libraries of the State are numerous and important. The Education Department maintains a generous system for the establishment of libraries and provides generous State aid for their support. The great library of the State is the New York Public Library in the City of New York, which in 1909 owned 1,549,260 books and 295,978 pamphlets, in all 1,844,338 volumes. It will soon (1911) occupy the magnificent building erected by the City of New York at Bryant Square at Fifth Avenue and Forty-second Street, which has just been completed. It is largely endowed by the testamentary gifts of John Jacob Astor, James Lenox, and Samuel J. Tilden, and receives aid from the city treasury.

History.—The territory which now forms the State of New York may, as regards its history, be divided into two parts. The first part includes the Hudson River valley and the western end of Long Island, which, speaking generally, were, together with the upper Delaware River settlements, the only portions of New Netherland actually occupied by the Dutch when the province was granted by the English Crown to the Duke of York in 1684. The second part comprises the rest of the State excluding eastern Long Island: this was the Indian country, the home of the Iroquois and the other tribes forming the Five Nations, now mostly remembered from the old romances, but a savage and fierce reality to the Dutch and English colonists. As late as 1756 there were only two counties to be found in the entire province west of the Hudson River. Interposed between the French and the Dutch (and afterwards the English), and brought from time to time into their quarrels for supremacy, the Indians kept the land between the Great Lakes, the Hudson, and the St. Lawrence truly "a dark and bloody ground" until the end of the eighteenth century, when, as part of the military operations of the Revolution, the expedition of the American forces, sent by Washington under command of General John Sullivan, finally broke their power at the Battle of Newton near Elmina in 1777.

Although their military power was thus destroyed, the Indians still remained a menace to the settlers in remote districts for many years. Gradually, however, their opposition was overcome, and they finally became the wards of the State, living on reservations set apart for their exclusive occupancy. A remnant of them (4821 in the year 1905) still survives. Early in the nineteenth century large grants of land began to be bestowed by the State on wealthy citizens wealthy (who thereafter lived far away) as promoters of the purpose of fostering occupation by settlers. Systematic colonization was immediately undertaken, and a large emigration from Vermont, Massachusetts, Connecticut, and the other settlements in the Hudson Valley began to flow into the Iroquois country. This continued prosperously, but not rapidly until De Witt Clinton, one of the great figures in the history of New York, upon his taking the office of Governor in 1818, pressed forward vigorously the long-standing plans for the construction and completion of the great artificial waterways of the State, the Erie and the Champlain canals. European immigration then became essential to supply the labour needed for the success of these plans. Stalwart men and women flocked from the British Islands and Germany in astounding numbers, and in forty years the population of New York City increased more than six times (from 33,131 in 1790 to 202,589 in 1830). The labouring men, who worked outside the cities on the public works, with their families became settlers in the villages and towns that grew up along the canals. The general prosperity which succeeded the successful completion of these works and their operation, and the consequent enormous development of the State's resources, drew others into the territory. The population of the State of New York itself increased from 340,120 in 1790 to 1,918,608 in 1830.

The European immigration thus begun included a large proportion of Catholics. Bishop Dubois estimated that in 1830 there were 35,000 Catholics in New York City and 150,000 throughout the rest of the State and in northern New Jersey, made up chiefly of poor emigrants. The Irish element was very large, and the first Catholic congregation in New York were in some cases almost wholly Irish. To them soon came their devoted missionary priests to minister to them in the Faith which had survived some of their race and generations. There were instances of the iniquitous penal days, which had then but just begun to pass away. The State of New York, because of the uncertain boundaries of the old Dutch province of New Netherland, at first laid claim to the counties which now constitute the State of Vermont, and also to part of the land now lying in western Massachusetts and Connecticut. These claims were settled by mutual agreement in due course and the boundaries were fixed. The State of Vermont therefore upon became the fourteenth State of the Union in 1791, being the first admitted after the adoption of the United States Constitution in 1789. The first complete State Constitution framed after the Revolution was adopted on 20 April 1777, at Kingston on the Hudson. John Jay, George Clinton, and Alexander Hamilton were its principal framers. The City of New York became the capital of the State after the Revolution, and it also was the capital of the Province of New York before. Upon the adoption of the United States Constitution in 1789 it became the capital of the United States. President Washington was inaugurated there at Federal Hall at the head of Broad Street, the first capital of the United States. His house stood at the foot of Broadway. Its site is now occupied by the Washington Building. In 1790 the capital of the United States was removed to Philadelphia, and in 1797 the capital of the State was removed to Albany where it has since remained. Since 1820 the City of New York has been the commercial and financial centre of the continent of North America.

Ecclesiastical History.—On 8 April, 1808, the Holy See created the Diocese of New York coincidently with the establishment of the American hierarchy, by the erection of the Diocese of New York. Bishop John Connelly, a Frenchman, was appointed first Bishop of New York, but died at Naples in 1809, while awaiting an opportunity to elude Napoleon Bonaparte's embargo and set out for his see. After a delay of six years his successor Bishop John Connolly, also a Democrat, arrived at New York in November, 1815, and ministered as the first resident bishop to his scattered congregations of 17,000 souls (whom he describes as "mostly Irish") in union with the four priests, who were all he had to help him throughout his immense diocese. He died on 5 February, 1825, after a devoted and self-sacrificing episcopate, and is buried under the altar of the new St. Patrick's Cathedral. During the vacancy of the see, preceding the arrival of Bishop Connolly (1808-15), the diocesan affairs were administered by Father Anthony Kohlmann (q. v.). He rebuilt St. Peter's church in Barony Street, and in 1819 bought the site of old St. Patrick's Cathedral in Mott Street, the building of which he finished in 1815. He also bought in 1809 the land and old residence in the large block on Fifth Avenue at Fifth Street, and there established a flourishing boys' school called the New York Literary Institution.

In 1822 the diocesan statistics were: two churches in New York City, one in Albany, one in Utica, one in Auburn, one at Carthage on the Black River, all of which were served by one bishop and eight priests. Bishop Connolly was succeeded on 29 October, 1830, by John Dubois (q. v.), a Frenchman who had been a fellow student of Robespierre and was one of the émigrés priests of the French Revolution. He was one of the founders of Mount St. Mary's, Emmitsburg, Maryland—"the mother of nuns" as it has been called—and passed through the cholera epidemic of 1832, when 3000 people died in the City of New York between July and October. He increased the churches and brought to his diocese two more than twice the number of priests. It is noteworthy that he ordained to the priesthood at St. Patrick's in June, 1836, the Venerable John N. Neuman (q. v.), afterwards the saintly Bishop of Philadelphia. After a life of arduous labour, trial, and anxiety both as a missionary, an educator, and a pioneer bishop, his health broke down, and he was granted in 1837 as coadjutor John Hughes (q. v.), who justly bears the most distinguished name in the annals of the American hierarchy even to this day.
Bishop Hughes was consecrated on 9 February, 1838. A stroke of paralysis attacked the venerable Bishop Dubois almost immediately afterwards, and he was an invalid until his death on 20 December, 1842, whereupon he was succeeded by his coadjutor as Bishop of New York. In 1847, the See of Albany and Buffalo were created. Bishop John McCloskey (q. v.), afterwards the first American cardinal, who was then Coadjutor Bishop of New York, was transferred to Albany, and Reverend John Timon, Superior of the Congregation of the Mission, was made Bishop of Buffalo. In October, 1850, the Diocese of New York was erected into an archiepiscopal see with the Sees of Boston, Hartford, Albany, and Buffalo as its suffragans. Archbishop Hughes sailed for Rome in the following month, and received the pallium from the hands of Pius IX himself.

The career of Archbishop Hughes and the history of his archdiocese and its suffragan sees are fully treated under their appropriate titles, and need not be discussed here. The life of Archbishop Hughes marked the great formative period in the history of the pioneer Church in New York. His great work in the cause of education, in the establishment of the parochial schools, the establishment of the great teaching and other religious orders, and the erection of seminaries and colleges for the training of candidates for the priesthood, as well as in the solution of the tremendous problems connected with the building up of the churches and charities and the preservation of the Faith, had a profound effect upon the attitude of the State of New York towards religious institutions and persons and ecclesiastical affairs. The Knownothing movement of the fifties (see KNOWNOTHINGISM) was profoundly felt in New York, but the number and importance of the Catholic population protected them from the cowardly assaults made upon the Catholics in other places. The presence of Archbishop Hughes was ever a tower of strength in the conflict and in producing the overwhelming defeat which this un-American movement met. The only effect of this sectarian agitation upon the legislation of the State was the passage in 1855 of a plainly unconstitutional statute which sought to prevent Catholic bishops from holding title to property in trust for churches or congregations. It proved of no avail whatever. In 1862, after the Civil War began, it was quietly repealed.

By 1853 the Diocese of the long-suffering Newark in New Jersey was established, the first Bishop of Brooklyn being Reverend John Loughlin and the first Bishop of Newark Reverend James Roosevelt Bayley (q. v.), who later became Archbishop of Baltimore. In 1858 the Diocese of Rochester was separated from Albany, and the venerable and beloved apostle of Catholicism in northwestern New York, Bishop Bernard J. McGuaid (q. v.), appointed its first bishop.

In 1872 the Diocese of Ogdensburg was created, and in November, 1886, the youngest diocese of the State, Syracuse. It is unnecessary to sketch further here the history of Catholicism in New York State during the incumbency of the archiepiscopal see by Cardinal McCloskey, Archbishop Hughes's successor, and that of his successor Archbishop Corrigan, or of his successor, John M. Farley, who now sits in the Supreme Bench. It is sufficient to record the continual progress in the advancement of Catholic interests, in the building up of the Church, and in adjusting its activities to the needs of the people.

DISTINGUISHED CATHOLICS.—The Catholics of New York State have produced their full proportion of persons of distinction in the professions, commercial, political, and social life. Of the ninety-seven justices who were among the first state judges appointed by the framers of the Constitution in 1788, and were numbered among the杰克sonian party, and the Catholic faith. Among the justices of the lower courts are many Catholics. Since 1880 three mayors of New York City (Messrs. Grace, Grant, and Gilroy), have been Catholics. Francis Kernan was United States Senator for New York from 1879-82. Denis O'Brien closed a distinguished career as Judge of the Court of Appeals, the court of last resort, by his retirement for age in 1908 after a continuous service of forty-eight years. The Bishop of the Supreme Court was John R. Brady, elected in 1859, and loyal sons of the Church have been on that bench ever since. Mayors of the great cities of the State, senators, assemblyman, State officers and representatives in Congress, and a multitude of other public officials have been chosen from the Catholic citizenry ever since the beginning of the fourteenth century and have rendered distinguished service to the State. For many years the two brilliant leaders of the New York Bar were Charles O'Conor and James T. Brady, sons of Irish Catholic emigrants. In medicine Gunning S. Bedford and Thomas Addis Emmet kept for many years the Catholic name at the top of the profession, and they have now worthy successors. In the great public works and industries of the State Catholics have had more than their share of the labour and its rewards. In the commercial life of New York some of the largest fortunes have been honourably gathered by Catholic men, who have been most generous to the religious and charitable works of the State.

LEGAL.—The State of New York has a constitutional government. It was the model of that of the United States of America. The union of the executive, legislative, and judicial branches of government under one constitution is its principle. Its executive head is the governor. The legislature has two houses, the Senate and Assembly, which meet annually at Albany, the State capital. Its courts are composed principally of a Court of Appeals (the highest court), the Court of Appeals Appellate Division, and numerous courts of first instance, divided into districts throughout the State. There are many minor and local courts supplementing the Supreme Court.

The State of New York has always been foremost in the pursuit of freedom of worship and religious toleration. It is true, however, that her first Constitution in 1777 excluded all priests and ministers of the Gospel from her legislature and offices, and put a prohibitory religious test upon foreign-born Catholics who applied for citizenship. Herein was an echo of the spirit of the eighteenth century, which was strongly opposed in the Convention. The naturalization disability disappeared very soon on the adoption of the Federal Constitution in 1789, and, by subsequent constitutional amendments, all these remnants of ancient bigotry were formally abolished. It is remarkable to find John Jay, otherwise most earnest in the fight for civil liberty, the leader in these efforts to impose religious tests and restraints of liberty of conscience upon his Catholic fellow-citizens. This Constitution, nevertheless, proclaimed general religious liberty in unmistakable terms. The provision is as follows: "The free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship without discrimination or preference shall forever hereafter be allowed within this State to all mankind provided that the liberty of conscience hereby secured shall not be so construed as to authorize any person to commit an act of violence or of riotousness or justify practices inconsistent with the peace or safety of this State."

The statutes of the State which permitted the formation of religious corporations without restraint, and gave to them when formed, freedom to hold property and conduct their affairs unhampered by the civil power, are contemporaneous with the restoration of order within its borders after the British evacuation in November, 1783, and were an act of grace adopted by the Legislature in 1784. The laws of New York which relate to matters of religion have been in many instances models for the other States. The Dutchmen who settled in

New York, and the other emigrants and their descendants who came within their influence in the Province of New York, early learned the value and reason of religious toleration. The Dutchmen in America did not persecute for religion's sake. The present civil relations of the Catholic Church to the State of New York and their history form an interesting study. The Dutch Colony of the seventeenth century was a minority Protestant, but was, as has been noted, in practice tolerant and fair to people of other faiths who dwelt within New Netherlands. When the English took the province from the Dutch in 1664, they granted full religious toleration to the other forms of Protestantism, and preserved the property rights of the Dutch Reformed Church, while recognizing its discipline. The General Assembly of the province held in 1682 under the famous Governor Thomas Dongan, an Irish Catholic nobleman, adopted the Charter of Liberties, which proclaimed religious liberty to all Christians. Although this charters did not receive formal royal sanction, the fact of religious toleration was nevertheless universally recognized. In 1688 the Stuart Revolution in England reversed this policy of liberality, and the Province of New York immediately followed the example of the mother-country, in all its bitterness of intolerance and persecution by law of the Catholic Church and its adherents. In 1697, although the Anglican Church was never formally established in the Province of New York, Trinity Church was founded in the City of New York by royal charter, and received many civil privileges and the munificent grants of land which are the sources of its present great wealth. The Dutch Reformed Church continued, however, to enjoy their property and the protection of their rights undisturbed by the new Anglican foundation, the inhabitants of Dutch blood being then largely in the ascendency in the colony. For many years, indeed, until the Revolution occurred in 1776, the majority of the inhabitants of the Province of New York were, contrary to general belief, not of English descent.

The political conditions at home, and also the long conflict between England and France for the control of North America resulted, as has been stated, in the enactment by the provincial legislature from time to time of repressive laws against the Catholic Faith and its adherents—laws which are savage in their malignity. Catholic priests and teachers were ordered to keep away from the province or, if they were there, to leave at once. Severe penalties were provided for disobedience to these laws, extending to long imprisonment or even death. These laws were directed in many cases principally against the Catholic missionaries among the Indians, who were almost exclusively Frenchmen. They were adopted also, it is consoling to think, against the protest of many of the best of the colonial legislators and under the urging of authority, and were rarely enforced. This was not so in the case of the unfortunate schoolmaster John Ury, however. In the disturbances and panic of the so-called Negro Plot of 1741 he was actually tried in New York and executed under these statutes for the crime of being a "Popish priest" and teaching his religion. Although it is held by some that Ury was not a Catholic priest, Archbishop Bayley gives good reason for believing the contrary, citing especially the fact that the record shows that he never denied the accusation at any time, and therefore died as a priest. The entire body of this legislation was formally repealed at the first session of the Legislature of the State of New York.

The condition of the few Catholics who dared proscription and persecution in the province of New York before the Revolution of 1776 was deplorable from a religious point of view. These Catholics must have been recruited in numbers from time to time from seafaring people, emigrants, Spanish negroes from the West Indies, and at least part of the 7000 Acadians, who were distributed along the Atlantic seaboard in 1755 after the awful expedition which that devoted people suffered, although the same spirit of references even to their existence. Father Farmer from Philadelphia came to see the oppressed Catholics during his long service on the missions between 1752-86, but his visit to them was unfruitful. There was no church or institutions of any kind. As Archbishop Bayley truly said, a chapel, if they had had means to erect one, would have been torn down. The first mention of their public worship shown the the hearing Mass in a carpenter shop, and afterwards in a public hall in Vauxhall Garden (a pleasure ground on the Hudson near Warren Street), New York, between the years 1781-83 when they had begun to take heart because of the religious liberty which was to be theirs under the new republican government whose arms had already triumphed over England at Yorktown. Their number at this time was reported as being about two hundred, with only twenty odd communicants, as Father Farmer lamented.

The Revolution of 1776 overthrew entirely the system of government churches and all religious proscription by law, and the State of New York, in conformity with the spirit of the Constitution, toward each other shall forever prevail", and followed this by a general act providing for the incorporation of churches and religious societies under clear general laws, simple for all. This law made a most unusual provision in aid of justice for the vesting in these corporate bodies immediately of "all the temporalities granted or devised directly to said church or society, or to any person or persons in trust to and for their use and although such gift, grant or devise may not have strictly been agreeable to the rigid rules of law, or might on strict construction be defeated by the operation of the statutes of mortmain. It made provision also with great prescience for the protection of clergymen from the exercise of arbitrary power by the lay directors of religious corporations by taking from the trustees of the church the power to fix the salary of the clergyman and by requiring the congregation to fix it at special meetings. To prevent abuses, however, and in accordance with legal tradition and precedent, restrictions upon the amount of charitable and personal property which a church could hold were made, and the Court of Chancery was placed in control of all such matters by requiring that annual reports should be made by the churches to it. The final clause of the act crystallized the principle of the Constitution, that, while the State protects and fosters religion in its beneficent work, it must not interfere in religious matters. It is as follows: "Nothing herein contained shall be construed, adjudged, or taken to abridge or affect the rights of conscience or private judgment or in the least to alter or change the religious constitutions or governments of either of the said churches, congregations or societies, so far as any wise concerns the doctrine, discipline or worship thereof."

The Constitution of 1777 and the legislation of the Revolutionary period in aid of it are remarkable for deep sagacity and great grasp of principles, as well as for the conservative and sane treatment of the innovations and novelties which the radical changes in the government made necessary. This is the more remarkable when it is remembered that this Constitution was adopted in time of war by delegates who laid down their arms in most cases to join in the deliberations upon it, and that the Legislature met immediately after the close of this war time. It was besides a venture in an almost virgin field. Its wisdom, knowledge, and broadness are priceless treasures of the citizens of New York. The wisdom of the Constitution is shown particularly in the provision creating the body of the law for the State. It enacted that the law of the State should be constituted of the Common Law of England and of the Acts of the Legislature of the Colony of New York, as together forming the law of the colony on April, 1775 (the day of the battle of Concord and Lexington). It was expressly declared, however, "that all such parts of the said Common Law and all such of the said Statutes and Acts aforesaid or parts thereof as may be construed to establish or maintain any particular denomination of Christians or their ministers, are repugnant to this constitution and hereby are abrogated and rejected."

To New York belongs the honour of having been the first of all English-speaking states from the time of the Protestant Reformation, to protect by its courts and laws, the secrecy and sanctity of auricular confession. In June, 1613, it was judicially determined that auricular confession as a part of church discipline protects the priest from being compelled in a court of law to testify to matters made to him therein. The decision was made by De Witt Clinton, presiding in the Mayor's Court of New York City on the trial of one Phillips for theft, and the priest, whose protest was there considered, was the reverend Father Anthony Kohlmann mentioned above. The decision is more remarkable because it was contrary to the principles of the English cases, and the opposite view had the support of respectable authorities.

Although no form of religion is considered by the State of New York, New York rights superior to any other, yet the fact of the existence of the Christian religion as the predominating faith of the people has been uniformly recognized by the courts, constitutional conventions, and legislation. As early as 1811, Chancellor Kent, writing the opinion of the Court in the case of People vs. Ruggles (8 Johnson 294), made the celebrated dictum: "We are a Christian people and the morality of the country is deeply ingrained upon Christianity." This famous case arose on the conviction of the defendant for blasphemy in maliciously reviling Jesus Christ in a public place. In the absence of a specific statute the question was presented whether the act amounted to a crime at common law. The Court held that it was, because to vilify the Author of Christianity under the circumstances presented was a gross violation of decorum and good order, and just punishment of the right of religious liberty. The court further held that, though the Constitution discarded religious establishments, it did not forbid judicial cognition of those offenses against religion and morality which have no reference to any such establishment or to any particular form of government, but are punishable because they strike at the root of moral obligation and weaken social ties; that the Constitution never meant to withdraw religion in general, and with it the best sanctions of moral and social obligation, from all consideration and notice of the law; and that the framers intended only to banish test oaths, disabilities, and the burdens, and sometimes the oppressions, of Church establishments, and to secure the people of the State freedom from coercion and an equality of right on the subject of religion.

The decision of the Supreme Court that, although Christianity is not the religion of the State, considered as a political corporation, it is nevertheless closely interwoven into the texture of society and is intimately connected with all the social habits, customs, and modes of life of the people, gave offence in certain quarters. In view of this Ruggles case, an amendment was proposed in the Constitutional Convention of 1821 to the effect that the judiciary should not declare any particular religion to be the law of the land. It was rejected after a full debate in which its opponents, while differing in details, agreed that "the Christian religion was engrafted upon the law and entitled to protection as the basis of morals and the strength of Government." In 1861 a similar question was presented for decision in the well-known case of Lindenmuller vs. People (33 Barbour Reports 548). The plaintiff sought from the court an injunction to restrain the police of New York City from interfering with the performance of worship on Sunday. The opinion of the Supreme Court was written by Justice William F. Allen, a most distinguished jurist, and was afterwards (1877) adopted by the Court of Appeals as the decision of the intermediate court. It contains an admirable and exhaustive study of the Sunday laws. It takes the claim of the plaintiff, stated broadly, to be that "the Bible, and religion with all its ordinances, including the Sabbath, are as effectually abolished by the Constitution as they were in France during the Revolution, and so effectually abolished that duties may not be enforced as duties to the State because they have been heretofore associated with acts of religious worship or connected with religious duties." It then proceeds: "It would be strange that a people, Christian in doctrine and worship, many of whom or whose forefathers had sought these shores for the privilege of worshipping God in simplicity and purity of faith, and who regarded religion as the basis of their civil liberty and the foundation of their rights, should, in their zeal to secure to all the freedom of conscience which they valued contrary to the principles of the English cases, and the opposite view had the support of respectable authorities.

Although no form of religion is considered by the State of New York, New York rights superior to any other, yet the fact of the existence of the Christian religion as the predominating faith of the people has been uniformly recognized by the courts, constitutional conventions, and legislation. As early as 1811, Chancellor Kent, writing the opinion of the Court in the case of People vs. Ruggles (8 Johnson 294), made the celebrated dictum: "We are a Christian people and the morality of the country is deeply ingrained upon Christianity." This famous case arose on the conviction of the defendant for blasphemy in maliciously reviling Jesus Christ in a public place. In the absence of a specific statute the question was presented whether the act amounted to a crime at common law. The Court held that it was, because to vilify the Author of Christianity under the circumstances presented was a gross violation of decorum and good order, and just punishment of the right of religious liberty. The court further held that, though the Constitution discarded religious establishments, it did not forbid judicial cognition of those offenses against religion and morality which have no reference to any such establishment or to any particular form of government, but are punishable because they strike at the root of moral obligation and weaken social ties; that the Constitution never meant to withdraw religion in general, and with it the best sanctions of moral and social obligation, from all consideration and notice of the law; and that the framers intended only to banish test oaths, disabilities, and the burdens, and sometimes the oppressions, of Church establishments, and to secure the people of the State freedom from coercion and an equality of right on the subject of religion.

The decision of the Supreme Court that, although Christianity is not the religion of the State, considered as a political corporation, it is nevertheless closely interwoven into the texture of society and is intimately connected with all the social habits, customs, and modes of life of the people, gave offence in certain quarters. In view of this Ruggles case, an amendment was proposed in the Constitutional Convention of 1821 to the effect that the judiciary should not declare any particular religion to be the law of the land. It was rejected after a full debate in which its opponents, while differing ministered through the medium of corporate bodies, created by legislative power and endowed with the same legal capacity to hold property for their corporate purposes, as a private person or an ordinary private corporation had to receive and hold transfers of property. It was followed almost immediately by Chapter 701 of the Laws of 1893, which provides that gifts by will for charitable purposes shall not be defeated because of insufficiency in designating the beneficiaries, or the power in the regulation of the gifts for charitable purposes formerly exercised by the Court of Chancery under the ancient law of England should be restored and vested in the Supreme Court as a Court of Equity. The Court of Appeals construing this statute has held that the existence of a competent corporation or other definable trustee with power to take is no longer necessary for the validity of a trust for charitable uses, and that any legal trust for such purposes may be executed by proper trustees if such are named, and, if none are named, the trust will be administered by the Supreme Court. It is important to note, however, that this act must be confined to the cases to which it applies, and that it does not enable an unincorporated charity or association to take bequests or devises.

There exist, however, notwithstanding the liberal refusal of the New York system, some important restrictions upon the conduct of religious and charitable corporations. The better opinion and the weight of judicial authority are, that, notwithstanding the repeal of the act of the Legislature of 1877 above noted, the English statutes of Elizabeth, which restricted religious and charitable corporations, may hold in the alienation and encumbering of their real estate, have been adopted as the law of this State, and that such acts can only be lawfully done under the order of the Supreme Court. Limitations upon the value of the property and the amount of the income of religious and charitable corporations have been also uniformly made by the New York Statutes. The present law, however, is most liberal in this respect, the property of such corporations being limited to $6,000,000 and the annual income to $600,000, and provision is also made that no increase in the value of property arising otherwise than from improvements made thereon by the owners shall be taken into account. By recent the strict requirements for accounting to the Court, as to their property and income, which in the early statutes controlled such corporations, are confined to cases where the attorney-general intervenes for the purpose by petition to the Supreme Court upon proper cause being shown.

The law of New York on the general subject of the Church and the legal position of the latter before the law has been defined by the statutes and numerous decisions. The results may be briefly stated as follows:

Religious societies as such are not legal entities, although as an aggregation of the individuals composing them, for motives of convenience, they are recognized as existing in certain cases. They can neither sue nor be sued in civil courts. They cannot hold property directly, although they may control property held by others for their use or upon trust created by them. The existence, however, of the Church proper, as an organized legal entity, is not recognized by the municipal law of New York. There is no statute which authorizes the incorporation of the Church at large. The incorporation is generally made of the congregation or assemblage of persons accustomed to meet for Divine worship, although provision has been made for the incorporation of a church containing worship or community over churches. For example, the Catholic dioceses of Albany, Buffalo, and Brooklyn have been thus incorporated formally. The general plan provides for the incorporation and government of the churches of the separate denominations, as gathered into congregations. Each important denomination, therefore, has its own particular provisions in the Religious Corporation Law, the general statute of the State which has codified these laws and decisions. In the case of the Roman Catholic Church, incorporation is obtained in this way. A certificate of incorporation must be executed by the archbishop or bishop, the vicar-general of the diocese, the rector of the congregation, and two laymen from the congregation, or a majority of them. It must state the corporate name of the church, and also the municipality where its principal place of worship exists or is intended to be located. On filing such certificate with the clerk of the county in which the principal place of worship is or is intended to be, or with the Secretary of State in certain cases, the corporation is created.

Questions of the civil rights of persons, relating either to themselves or to others, or to property, whatever their relations to church organizations, are as a matter of course the subject of adjudication in the civil tribunals. But judicial notice will be taken of the existence of the church discipline or government in some cases, and it is always the subject of evidence. When, therefore, personal rights and rights of property are in cases in the courts dependent upon questions of doctrine, discipline, church government, customs, or law, the civil court will consider as controlling and binding the determinations made on such questions by the highest tribunal within the Church to which such persons belong. While a person or other person, may always insist that his civil or property rights as an individual shall be determined according to the laws of the land, his relations, rights, and obligations arising from his position as a member of some religious body must be determined according to the laws and procedure enacted by that body for such purpose. Where it appeared, therefore, in one case that questions growing out of relations between a priest and his bishop had been submitted by the parties to an ecclesiastical tribunal which the church itself had organized for hearing such causes and was there decided by it, it was held by the Court of Appeals that the civil courts were justified in refusing to proceed further, and that the decision of the Church judiciary in the matter was a bar to a good defense (Baxter vs. McDonnell, 155 New York, 38). The Church at last, however, under the Court of Chancery, as to their property and income, which in the early statutes controlled such corporations, are confined to cases where the attorney-general intervenes for the purpose by petition to the Supreme Court upon proper cause being shown.

Annulment of Marriage. An action to annul her marriage may be brought by a woman where she was under sixteen years of age at the time of the marriage, and the consent of her parents or guardian was not

and the marriage was not consummated and not ratified by mutual consent after she attained the age of sixteen years. Either the husband or wife may sue for annulment of marriage for lunacy, nonsens, per-valid marriage, or because consent was obtained by force, duress, or fraud, and finally for physical incapacity under certain rigid restrictions. The tendency of the courts of late years is to construe the provision as to fraud liberally, and annulment has been granted on this ground, where the husband has been convicted of a felony and concealed the fact before the marriage, and again where false representations had been made before the marriage by the woman as to the birth of a child to the plaintiff. The Court of Appeals in the last case held, as the reasonable construction of the statute, that the essential fact to be shown was that the fraud was material to the degree that, had it not been practised, the party deceived would not have consented to the marriage (Di Lorenzo vs.

Di Lorenzo, 14 New York, 467 and 471). This, ception, it should be noted, was put squarely on the ground that in New York marriage is a civil contract to which the consent of parties capable in law of contracting is essential, and, where the consent is obtained by legal fraud, the marriage may be annulled as in the case of any other contract. Condonation of the force, duress, or fraud is required to be assumed from the fact of voluntary cohabitation after knowledge of the facts by the innocent party, and will, if established, defeat the action. Provision is also made for an action for the annulment of a marriage in certain cases

at the instance of any relative having an interest in having it annulled or by a parent or guardian of the next friend either in the lifetime of a party or after his or death, where such an action will further the cause of justice.

Divorce. Actions for absolute divorce and the dissolution of marriage can be maintained only for the case of adultery The New York Courts will hear

no action for divorce unless both parties were residents of the State when the offence was committed, or married within the State, or the plaintiff was a resident of the State at the time of the offence and is resident when the action is commenced, or finally when the offence was committed within the State and the injured party is a resident of the State when the action is commenced. Divorces obtained by citizens of New York in the courts of foreign jurisdiction are not recognized as valid in the State of New York unless personal jurisdiction of both of the parties is properly obtained by the foreign courts. Collusion of the parties is strictly guarded against. Condonation of the offence is made a defence. The action must be brought within five years after the discovery of the offence. Adultery by the plaintiff is a complete defence to the action. The provisions for the custody of the children of a dissolved marriage and for the maintenance of the innocent wife and children are very detailed and effective. Remarriage is forbidden to the guilty party during the life of the spouse, unless,

after five years have elapsed, proof is made of his or her uniform good conduct, when the defendant may be permitted by the Court to marry again. The practical effect of these prohibitions is very slight because the entire validity of the subsequent marriages of guilty parties in New York divorce actions, when they are made out of the State of New York, is recognized by the New York courts, the only penalty provided for the disobedience to the decree being the punishment of the offender for contempt of court, and the infliction of this penalty is unheard of at the present day. The divorce law of New York, it may be noted, is more conservative than that of any other state in the Union except South Carolina, where no divorce a vinculo is permitted. Limited divorce or decree of separation a mensa et thoro is granted for numerous causes, viz: cruel and inhuman treatment, abandonment, neglect or refusal to provide for the wife, and conduct making it unsafe and improper for the plaintiff to cohabit with the defendant. The usual purpose of actions for limited divorce is to provide support for the children and alimony for the wife out of the husband's funds after his incapacity or incapability to have separated. These actions are comparatively infrequent. The judgment in them has of course no effect upon the validity of the marriage bond. It is granted only for grave cause, and the necessary bona fide residence of the parties in the State is of strictest proof, under the terms of the statute.

Charities.—The system of charities which has grown up within the State of New York, whether religious or secular, is one of the features of its social life. As was said by the Court of Appeals in 1888 in the famous case of Holland v. Alocet above noted: "It is not certain that any political change or society in the world offers a better system of law for the encouragement of property limitations in favor of religion and learning, for the relief of the poor, the care of the insane, of the sick and the maimed, and the relief of the destitute, than our system of creating and endowing them with the same legal capacity to hold property which a private person has to receive and hold transfers of property." A charitable or benevolent corporation may be formed under the Membership Corporation Law by five or more persons for any lawful, charitable, or benevolent purpose. It is subject in certain respects to the prosecution of the Board of Charities of the Supreme Court, but this power of visitation is not oppressive and never exercised except in case of gross abuse and under strict provisions as to procedure. State and municipal aid to private charitable corporations is permitted by law. Some of the great private charities of the Catholic Church receive such aid in large amounts, particularly in the great cities. The public subscription of private charitable corporations is an old institution in the State, but most all charities were in Protestant hands and the Catholic charities were very few and poor. Although vigorously attacked in the Constitutional Convention of 1901, it was sustained by the action of that convention and ratified by the people of the State. The system has done much for the cause of the education and maintenance of defective, dependent, and delinquent children, and for the building up of the hospitals for the destitute sick and aged in all the religious denominations. The Catholic protectories of New York and Buffalo and the Catholic foundling and infant asylums throughout the State are the models for such institutions in the whole United States. The charities under Catholic auspices which receive no State aid are, however, in the vast majority, and are found in great numbers in every part of the State, caring for the children and the aged, the sick and the destitute. They are served by an army of devoted religious, both men and women. The State institutions for the care of the insane and juvenile delinquents are numerous, and the almshouses, hospitals, and other charitable agencies under the care of the counties and other municipalities abound throughout the State. There are alone sixteen great State hospitals for the insane, conducted most carefully and successfully.

Restrictions on Bequests and Devises.—No person having a parent, husband, wife, or child can legally devise or bequeath more than one-half his estate to benevolent, charitable, or religious institutions, but such disposition is valid to the extent of one-half. In addition, certain kinds of corporations are still further restricted in respect to the portion of the estate of such persons which they may receive: in some cases it is only one-fourth. In respect to the invalidity by statute of legacies or devises made by wills executed within two months of the testator's death, this limitation was formerly wider, and amendments, however, have restricted it to the corporations formed under the old statutes, and it applies now to very few others, and these mostly corporations created by special statutes. Bequests and devises to unincorporated churches or charities are, as has been stated, invalid. Foreign religious and charitable corporations, however, may take bequests and devises if authorized to do so by their charters. They are also permitted to carry on unhampered their work in the State of New York. The legacies and devises to religious, charitable, and benevolent corporations are exempt from the succession tax assessed upon legacies and devises in ordinary cases.

Exemption from Taxation.—The Tax Law provides that the real and personal property of a "corporation or association organized exclusively for the moral or religious benefit of humanity, or for the positive good of the community by the distribution of the moral, religious, or charitable principles, or by the promotion of the Christian, Bible, tract, charitable, benevolent, missionary, hospital, infirmary, educational, scientific, literary, library, patriotic, historical, or cemetery purposes or for the enforcement of law relating to children or animals or for two or more of such purposes and exclusively for carrying out thereupon one or more of such purposes", shall be exempt from taxation. Great care is taken, however, to protect against the abuse of this right of exemption. In some few cases further exemptions are also made; thus, for example, real property not in exclusive use for the above corporate purposes is exempt from taxation, if the income therefrom is devoted exclusively to the support of the corporation. Property held by any officer of a religious denomination is entitled to the same exemption under the same conditions and exceptions as property held by a religious corporation itself.

Freedom of Worship.—It is expressly provided by statute that all persons committed to or taken charge of by incorporated or unincorporated houses of refuge, reformatories, protectories, or other penal institutions, receiving either public money or a part of any money from any municipality for the support of inmates, shall be entitled to the free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship without discrimination or preference, and that these provisions shall be enforced by the Supreme Court upon petition of any one feeling himself aggrieved by a violation of it (Prison Law Section 20). It is further provided that all children committed for destitution or delinquency by any court or public officer shall, as far as practicable, be sent to institutions of the same religious faith as the parents of the child.

Liquor Law.—The excise legislation of the State is treated in an elaborate general statute called the "Liquor Tax Law", but better known as the "Raines Law" from the name of the late Senator John Raines who drafted it. In substance it provides for a State Department of Excise presided over by a commissioner of excise, appointed by the governor and confirmed by the Senate, who is given charge of the issuance of all licenses to traffic within the State in intoxicating liquor, and also of the collection of the license fees and the supervision of the enforcement of the drastic penalties provided for violations of the law. Its purpose was to take away the granting of excess licenses by the local authorities, who had in some cases greatly abused the power, and also to subject local peace and police officers to the scrutiny, and in some cases the control of the State authorities in excise matters. It has resulted generally in a great improve-
NEW ZEALAND

EDWARD J. MCGUIRE.

New Zealand, formerly described as a colony, has, in 1840, by royal proclamation, been elevated to the rank and designation of "Dominion." It consists of various sets of three main islands, the South Island, sometimes called Stewart Island and several of the furthest islands lying at some distance from the main group. The smaller groups included in the main body are the Chatham Islands, Auckland, and the Bounty Group. The total area of the country is about one-twelfth less than the area of Great Britain and Ireland. The quantity and quality of the grazing land available have made New Zealand a great sheep, wool, and meat exporter, and the produce of its farms yields excellent timber, and its minerals, though as yet but little developed, is widely varied in character and form one of the country's most valuable assets. Volcanoes, one of which exploded in 1861, and a volcanic activity, the crater of the North Island, in the shape of the crater of the southernmost of those in Wyoming and the Gunflint "Hot Lakes" and pools, are characteristic features for all rheumatic diseases. The Alpine chain, studded with glaciers of greater or lesser extent, in the Alps of Europe, descends to the South Island. In the famous Otagoo lakes, Wanaka, and Manapouri, of which the town of Te Anau is on the western shore, and from which the town of Dunedin is distant over 1000 feet in height, the climate is excellent. The dominion holds at the end of the year, 21 December, in the midst of the Maori population of Cook and others. About 12,000 Europeans discovered the islands, but Captain Cook discovered the coast in 1769 and followed it up to the island of New Zealand, the island of New Zealand Company, after which the New Zealand Land Company, which was established in 1852, was formed in England and in New Zealand Company, after which the New Zealand Company, which was established in 1852, was formed in England.
(Australia), but on 3 May, 1841, was proclaimed a separate colony. A series of native wars, arising chiefly from endless disputes about land, began in 1843 and ended in 1850, since when time unbroken peace has prevailed. A measure of self-government was granted in 1852, and full responsible government in 1856. The provincial governments created by the Constitution Act were abolished in 1876, and one supreme central government established. The government consists of a governor, appointed by the crown, and two houses of Parliament—the legislative council, or upper chamber, with members nominated by the governor for life (except those nominated subsequently to September 17, 1891, after which date all appointments are for seven years only), and the house of representatives with members elected triennially on an adult suffrage. The first Speaker of the New Zealand House of Representatives (1853-60), the late Sir Charles Clifford, was a Catholic, and his son, Sir George Clifford, one of New Zealand’s prominent public men, though born in the dominion was educated at Stonyhurst College, and has shown his fidelity to old ties by naming his principal New Zealand residence “Stonyhurst.” There are a number of Catholic names in the list of past premiers, cabinet ministers, and members of Parliament who have helped to mould the laws and shape the history of the dominion. The present prime minister (1910), the Right Hon. Sir Joseph Ward, P.C., K.C.M.G., is a Catholic, and of a legislative council of forty-five members five are Catholics.

The prominent feature of the political history of the past twenty years has been the introduction and development of that body of legislation for which the name of New Zealand has become more or less famous. The mere enumeration of the enactments would occupy considerable space. It must suffice to say that, broadly speaking, their purpose is to fix the shield of the State over every man who works for his livelihood; and, in addition to regulating wages, they cover practically every risk to life, limb, health, and interest of the industrial classes. It should be mentioned that there is no strong party of professed State-Socialists in the dominion, and the reforms and experiments which have been made have in all cases been examined and taken on their merits, and not otherwise. Emphatically, they have been occasionally protested against some of the restrictions imposed, as being harassing and vexatious; but there is no political party in the country which proposes to repeal these measures, and there is a general opinion that, in its main features, the “advanced legislation” has come to stay. In 1893 an Act came into force which granted the franchise to women. The women’s vote has had a respectable effect in the relative position of political parties; but it is generally agreed that the women voters have been mainly responsible for the marked increase in recent years of the no-licence vote at the local option polls. Elections are quieter and more orderly than formerly.

II. THE MAORIS.—The New Zealand natives, or Maoris, as they call themselves, are generally acknowledged to be intellectually and physically the finest aboriginal race in the South Sea Islands. Their magnificient courage, their high intelligence, their splendid physique and manly bearing, the stirring part they have played in the history of the country, the very fact of their large population, have left an indelible impression on the mind. The Maoris have never been conquered, or made to conform to the customs of others, but have preserved their ancient habits, and their religion, until this day. They are even to-day barbarous, and have but few changes to offer to the white man. They are still the kind of people that one would expect to find among the Red Indians of North America—and according to tradition they came to New Zealand about twenty-one centuries ago (i.e., about five hundred and twenty-five years) from Hawaiki, an island of the Pacific not identified with any certainty. After being robbed and despoiled by the early white civilization and by trader-missionaries, tardy justice has at length been done to the native race. To-day the Maoris have four members in the central government, and two in the legislative council, all men of high lineage and natural orators. Until recent years it was supposed that the Maoris were dying out, but later statistics show the contrary. The official figures show that the Maori population fell from 85,928 in 1891 to 85,845 in 1896, increased to 43,143 in 1901, and further to 47,731 in 1906 (last census year).

III. THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN NEW ZEALAND.

The first Catholic settler in New Zealand was an Irishman named Thomas Poynton, who landed at Hokianga in 1822. Until ten years later the footsteps of a Catholic priest never pressed New Zealand soil. Poynton’s brave and pious wife, a native of Wexford County, took her first two children on a journey of over two thousand weary miles of ocean to be baptised at Sydney. Through Poynton’s entreaties for a missionary the needs of the country became known, first at Sydney and next at Rome. In 1835 New Zealand was included in the newly created Vicariate Apostolic of Western Oceania. In the following year its first vicar Apostolic, Mgr Jean Baptiste François Pompallier, who was introduced to the country by Dr. Grace, set out for his new field of labour with several members of the Society of the Marist Brothers, which, a few months before had received the approval of Pope Gregory XVI. On 10 January, 1838, he, with three Marist companions, sailed up the Waikato River, situated in the far north-west of the Auckland Province. The cross was planted in New Zealand, and the first Mass celebrated in the house of the first Catholic settler of the colony. Irish peasants immigrants were the pioneers of Catholic colonization in New Zealand; the French missionaries were their pioneer apostles. Four years later (in 1842) New Zealand was formed into a separate vicariate, Mgr Pompallier being named its first vicar Apostolic. From this time forward events moved at a rapid pace. In 1848 the colony was divided into two dioceses, Auckland with its territory extending to 39° of south latitude forming one diocese, Wellington with the remaining territory and the adjoining islands forming the second.

(See Auckland, Diocese of.) Bishop Pompallier remained in charge of Auckland, and Bishop Viard, who had been consecrated his coadjutor in 1840, was appointed administrator of the Diocese of Wellington, which was entrusted to the Society of Mary. By Brief of 3 July, 1800, Bishop Viard ceased to be coadjutor and was consecrated first Bishop of Wellington. In 1809 the Diocese of Dunedin, comprising Otago, Southland, and Stewart’s Island, was carved out of the Diocese of Wellington, and the Right Rev. Patrick Moran who died in 1856 was appointed its first bishop. His successor (the present occupant of the see), the Right Rev. Dr. Verdon, was consecrated in 1896. In 1887, at the petition of the Plenary Synod of Australasia, held in Sydney in 1885, the hierarchy was established in New Zealand, and Wellington became the archiepiscopal see. The Most Rev. Dr. Redwood, S.M., who had been consecrated Bishop of Wellington in 1874, was created archbishop and metropolitan by papal brief, receiving the pallium from the hands of the Right Rev. Dr. Lueck, Bishop of Auckland. The same year (1887) witnessed the erection of the Diocese of Christchurch. The first and present bishop of the diocese, Dr. Greymon, was consecrated in the same year. Ten years later New Zealand, hitherto dependent on Australia, was made a separate ecclesiastical province.

Some idea of the rapid growth of the Catholic population, both in numbers and in activity, may be gathered from the following figures. In 1840, when New Zealand was declared a colony, the number of Catholic colonists was not above 300 in a total population of some 9000. Eleven years later they numbered 3472 in a total population of 26,707. At the last Government census (1906) the Catholic total had amounted to 126,965. The total population of the dominion (exclusive of Maoris), according to the same census, was 589,578, so that the Catholic population is slightly over one-seventh of the whole. To-day (1910) the estimated Catholic population of New Zealand is over 130,000, with 4 dioceses, 1 archbishop, 3 suffragan bishops, 212 priests, 62 religious brothers, 936 nuns, 333 churches, 2 eclesiastical seminaries (comprising 1 provincial ecclesiastical seminary and 1 eclesiastical seminary for members of the Marist Order), 2 colleges for boys, 32 boarding and high schools, 18 superintendents of charitable institutions, 19 Catholic primary schools. According to the "New Zealand Official Year-Book" for 1909 (a Government publication) the total number of Catholic schools in the dominion is 152 and the number of Catholic pupils attending is 12,650. New Zealand has added one new religious congregation (the Sisters of Our Lady of Compassion), founded in 1854 by Mother Mary Aubert, to "Heaven's Army of Charity" in the Catholic Church. Under the direction of their venerable foundress the members of the order conduct schools for the Maoris at Hirurahama (Jerusalem) on the Wanganui River, a home for incurables, Wellington, and a home for incurable children, Island Bay, Wellington. The order has quite recently extended its operations to Auckland.

The ordinary organizations of the laity, as usually found in English-speaking countries, are well and solidly established throughout the dominion. For benefit purposes New Zealand formed a separate district of the Hibernian Australasian Catholic Benefit Society. Thanks to capable management, due to the fact that the society has drawn to its ranks the ablest and most representative of the laity, the organization is making remarkable progress. On 30 January, 1910, the membership was reported at 2312; the general fund stood at £7795 2:2: nearly £40,000) and the sick fund amounted to £12,558 5:9 (over £62,000). The Society of St. Vincent de Paul was probably the earliest lay organization established in New Zealand, a conference formed at Christchurch in July, 1867, by the Rev. Fr. Chastagner, S.M., being the first founded in Australia. In almost every parish there are young men's clubs, social, literary, and athletic; in connection with these a federation has been formed under the name of the Federation of Catholic Clubs of New Zealand. In 1909 a Newman Society, on the lines of the Oxford University Newman Society, but with wider and more directly practical objects, was inaugurated by the Catholic graduates and undergraduates of New Zealand University. As the number of university men amongst New Zealand Catholics is now very considerable, the new society promises to prove an important factor in the defence and propagation of the faith.

IV. MISSIONS TO THE MAORIES.—From the outset, the conversion of the native race was set in the forefront of the Church's work in this new land. When the Marist Fathers, having been withdrawn to the Diocese of Wellington, left the Diocese of Auckland in 1850, they had in that part of the North Island 5044 converts. In 1853 there were about a thousand native Christians in the Diocese of Wellington. Homes and schools for native children were founded by the Sisters of Mercy at Auckland and Wellington; and in 1857 the governor, Sir George Grey, in his official report to Parliament, gave high praise to the Catholic schools among the Maoris. Up until 1860 the Maori mission was most flourishing. Then came the long-drawn years of fierce racial warfare, during which the natives kept their territory closed against all white men; and the Catholic missions were almost completely ruined. They are being steadily built up once more by two bodies of earnest and devoted men, the Marist Fathers in the Archdiocese of Wellington and Diocese of Christchurch, and the Mill Hill Fathers in the Diocese of Auckland. The progress made during the last twenty-five years may be gathered from the following summary: (a) The Dioceses of Wellington and Diocese of Christchurch (districts: Otaki, Hirurahama, Raetihi, Wairau, and Okato) have about 40 stations and 19 churches, served by 7 priests. There are also 4 native schools; 1 efficiently natiive high school, maintained by the Sisters of Our Lady of the Missions; and 1 orphanage, conducted by the Sisters of Our Lady of Compassion. The total number of Catholic Maoris is about 2000. Several very successful conventions of Maori tribes have been held in Otaki since 1903. At the last (held in June, 1909), which was attended by His Grace Archbishop Redwood, the institution of a Maori Catholic magazine was decided upon and has since been carried out. (b) The Diocese of Auckland (districts: Rotorua, head-quarters of the provincial mission, Patata, Tauranga, Hokitika, Okahuau, Whanganui, Whangarei, Dargaville, and mangere) has 57 stations and 22 churches, served by 16 priests, of whom 9 are wholly and 7 are partly engaged on the Maori mission. There are 4 native schools conducted by the Sisters of Charity of St. Joseph. The total number of Maoris in Auckland is about 4000. Throughout the three dioceses the Maori population is extremely scattered, and the missionsaries have frequently to travel great distances. As the debiterious influence of Maori tolkungism (belief in wizards and medicine-men) is on the increase, and the rancorous feelings engendered by the war are now subsiding, the prospect in this distant outpost of the mission field is most hopeful and promising.

V. EDUCATION.—Education is compulsory in New Zealand; and of every 100 persons in the dominion at the time of the census of 1906, 83.5 could read and write, 1.6 could read only, and 14.9 could neither read nor write. As mentioned above, New Zealand became a self-governing colony in 1852. Each province has its separate legislature and the control of education within its borders, and most of the provinces subsidized denominational schools. The provincial legislatures were abolished by the Acts of 1875-6, and one of the early measures (1877) of the centralized New Zealand Government was to abolish aid to denominational schools and to introduce the so-called national system known as "free, secular, and compulsory". From that day to this the entire public school system of New Zealand has remained legally, purely secular.

From the first Catholics have protested against the exclusion of Christian teaching from the schools; and they have refused, and continue to refuse (unless where forced by circumstances) to send their children to schools from which their religion is excluded. As in other countries, so here, Catholics have shown the sincerity of their protest by creating, at enormous and continual sacrifices, a great rival system of education under which some 13,000 Catholic children are nurtured into a full and wholesome development of the faculties that God has bestowed upon them. With scarcely an exception, Catholic primary schools follow precisely the same secular curriculum as that prescribed under the Education Act for the public schools, and they are every year inspected and examined, under precisely the same conditions as are the public schools, by the State inspectors. The cost of carrying on the Catholic public school system is not derived from the rate or tax, but the amount is paid out of the Consolidated Fund, to which Catholics, as taxpayers, contribute their share. Catholics are thus subjected to a double impost: they have to bear the cost of equipping, and maintaining their own schools, and they are compelled also to contribute their quota of taxation for the maintenance of the public school system, of which, from conscientious motives, they cannot Avail themselves. New Zealand Catholics have never asked or desired a grant for the religious education which is imparted in their schools. But they have urged, and they continue to urge, their claim to a fair share of that taxation to which themselves contribute, in return for the purely secular instruction which, in accordance with the Government programme, is given in the Catholic schools. Their standing protest against the injustice long inflicted on them by the various governments of the country, and their unyielding demand for a recognition of the right of Christian taxpayers to have their children educated in accordance with Christian principles, constitute what is known, par excellence, as "the education question" in New Zealand. It is unhappily necessary to add that of late years, for no very obvious or adequate reason, Catholic agitation on the subject has not been so active as it once was; and unless a forward movement is made, the prospects of success for the cause, on behalf of which such splendid battles have been fought and such heroic sacrifices have been endured, are exceedingly remote.

VI. LITERATURE AND CATHOLIC JOURNALISM.—There is no New Zealand literature in the broad and general acceptance of the term. The usual reason assigned is that so young a country has not yet had time to evolve a literature of its own; but perhaps an equally important factor in producing and maintaining the existing condition of things is the smallness of the market for literature in consequence of which New Zealand writers possessing exceptional talent inevitably gravitate towards Sydney or London.

In general literature the one conspicuous name is that of Thomas Bracken, Irishman and Catholic, author of several volumes of poetry, in consequence of which New Zealand writers possessing exceptional talent inevitably gravitate towards Sydney or London. Amongst scientific writers, notable Catholic names are those of the late W. M. Mckay, formerly Registrar of New Zealand University, and the Very Rev. Dr. Kennedy, S.M., B.A., D.D., F.R.A.S., present Rector of St. Patrick's College, both of whom have made many valuable contributions to the pages of scientific journals and the proceedings of learned societies.

As usually happens in countries that are over-whemingly Protestant, by far the greater portion of the purely Catholic literature that has been published in New Zealand is apologetic in character. "What True Free-masonry Is: Why it is condemned", published in 1885 by the Rev. Thomas Keane, is a shock and intensely stimulating treatment of the subject. "Disunion and Reunion", by the Rev. W. J. Madden, is a popular and ably written review of the course and causes of the Protestant Reformation. One of the most learned and certainly the most prolific of the contributors to Catholic literature in New Zealand was the Very Rev. T. Le Menant des Chenes, S.M., recently deceased. His works include "Non-conformists and the Church"; "Out of the Maze"; "The Temuka Tournament" (a controversy); a volume on "Spiritism"; "The Church and the World"; etc. The last-named work, published only a few years before the venerable author's death, was very favourably reviewed by English and American papers. A notable addition to the Catholic literature of the dominion has been the recent publication of three volumes from the pen of the editor of the "New Zealand Tablet", the Rev. C. D. Cleary, D.D.

These works, "Catholic Marriages", "an exposition and defence of the decree "Ne temere", "An Impeached Nation; Being a Study of Irish Outrages"; and "Secular versus Religious Education: A Discussion of the Questions that arise through the treatment of the respective subjects and possess value of a permanent character. A modest beginning has been made towards the compilation of a detailed history of the Catholic Church in the dominion by the publication, a few months ago, of "The Church in New Zealand: Memoirs of the Early Days", by J. Y. Wilson.

The history of Catholic journalism in New Zealand is in effect the history of the "New Zealand Tablet", founded by the late Bishop Kilmurray in 1873, the Catholic Press of this country having followed the principle that it is better to be represented by one strong paper than to have a multiplicity of publications. From the first issue of the paper has been fought, and in his early days the work done by its revered founder, in his battle for Catholic rights, and by his valued assistant, Mr. J. F. Perrin, was of a solid character. The prestige and influence of the paper was still further enhanced by the Rev. Henry W. Cleary, D.D., who made the "New Zealand Tablet" a power in the land, and won the respect of all sections of the community not only for the Catholic paper but for the Catholic body which it represents. In February, 1910, Dr. Cleary was appointed Bishop of Auckland, and was consecrated on 21 August in Enniscorthy cathedral, Co. Wexford, Ireland. It is safe to say that there are few countries in the world in which, in proportion to size and population, the Catholic press has a higher status than in New Zealand.

It is no mere list of books, but gives a full account of each item, from the Journal of 1843 onwards, with explanatory notes, biographical information and criticism, synopsis of important periodicals, and a full index.

against Nicephorus Botaneiates, it was afterwardsced to the Turks by Alexius Comnenus. In 1056
the troops of Peter the Hermit, having attempted to capture the town, were completely defeated and massacred. In June, 1097, the city was taken, after a memorable siege by the Crusaders, and ceded for the Greek Emperor Alexius I. It was retained, but with great difficulty, during the twelfth century.
After the capture of Constantinople by the Latins in 1204 Nicea, restored, fortified, and embellished, became until 1261 the capital of the new Byzantine Empire of the Lascaris or Paleologi. For nearly sixty years it played a most important part. It was finally captured by the Turkish Sultan Orhan in 1353, from which time it has formed a part of the Ottoman Empire. To-day Nicea is called Isnik. It is a village of 1500 Greek and Turkish inhabitants in the sandjak of Erzurul and the vilayet of Brusa. The Greek metropolitan resides at Chmelek, the ancient Chios.
The ramparts, several times restored and now in a good state of preservation, are 4841 yards in circumference. There are 238 towers, some of them very ancient. Four ancient gates are well preserved.
Amidst the monuments may be mentioned Yezid-Djami, the Green Mosque, and the church of the Assumption, probably of the ninth century, the mosaics of which are very rich.

NICEA, COUNCILS OF, respectively the First and Seventh Ecumenical Councils, held at Nicea in Bithynia (see above).

1. The First Council of Nicea (First Ecumenical Council of the Catholic Church), held in 325 on the occasion of the heresy of Arius (see ARIANISM).
As early as 320 or 321 St. Alexander, Bishop of Alex-dria, convoked the council at Alexandria at which more than one hundred bishops from Egypt and Libya anathematized Arius. The latter continued to officiate in his church and to recruit followers. Being finally driven out, he went to Palestine and from there to Nicomedes. During this time St. Alexander published his "Epistola encyclicia," to which Arius replied; but henceforth it was evident that the quarrel had gone beyond the possibility of human control.
Some argue even speaks of a council of Bithynia which addressed an encyclical to all the bishops asking them to receive the Arians into the communion of the Church. This discord, and the war which soon broke out between Constantine and Licinius, added to the disorder and partly explains the progress of the religious conflict during the years 322-23. Finally Constantine, having conquered Licinius and become sole emperor, concerned himself with the re-establishment of religious peace as well as of civil order. He adressed letters to St. Alexander and to Arius deprecating these heated controversies regarding questions of practical importance, and advising the adversa-ties to agree without delay. It was evident that the emperor did not then grasp the significance of the Arian controversy. Hosius of Cordova, his counsell-lor in religious matters, bore the imperial letter to Alexandria, but failed in his missionary mission.
Seeing this, the emperor, perhaps advised by Hosius, judged no remedy more apt to restore peace in the Church than the convocation of an ecumenical coun-

The emperor himself, in very respectful letters, begged the bishops of every country to come promptly to Nicea. Several bishops from outside the Roman Empire, e.g., from Persia, were not historically known whether the emperor in con-volving the Council acted solely in his own name or in concert with the pope; however, it is probable that Constantine and Silvester came to an agreement (see SILVETRUS I, SAINT, Pope). In order to expedite the assembling of the Council, the emperor placed at the disposal of the bishops the public conveyances and postes of the empire; moreover, while the Council lasted he provided abundantly for the maintenance of the members. The choice of Nicea was favourable to the assembling of a large number of bishops. It was easily accessible to the bishops of nearly all the provinces, but especially to those of Asia, Syria, Palestine, Egypt, Persia, Ethiopia, Greece, and Thrace. The Council met in the principal church, and in the central hall of the imperial palace. A large place was indeed necessary to receive such an assembly, though the exact number is not known with certainty. Eusebius speaks of more than 250 bishops, and later Arabic manuscripts raise the figure to 2000—an evident exaggeration in which,

however, it is impossible to discover the approximate total number of bishops, as well as of the priests, deacons, and acolytes, of whom it is said that a great number were also present. St. Athanasius, a member of the council, speaks of 300, and in his letter "Ad forces" he says explicitly: This figure is almost universally adopted, and there seems to be no good reason for rejecting it. Most of the bishops present were Greeks; among the Latins we know only Hosius
of Cordova, Cæcilian of Carthage, Mark of Calabria, Pausianus of Dijon, Domnus of Alexandria, and the two Roman priests, Victor and Vincentius, representing the pope. The assembly numbered among its most famous members St. Alexander of Alexandria, Eustathius of Antioch, Macarius of Jerusalem, Hosius of Nicomedia, Eusebius of Cesarea, and Nicholas of Myra. Some had suffered during the last persecuton; others were poorly enough acquainted with Christian theology. Among the members was the deacon, Athanasius of Alexandria, for whom this Council was to be the prelude to a life of conflict and glory (see ATHANASIUS, SAINT).

The year 325 is accepted with hesitation as that of the First Council of Nicea. There is less agreement among our early authorities as to the month and day of the opening. In order to reconcile the indications furnished by Socrates and by the Acts of the Council of Chalcedon, this date may, perhaps, be taken as 20 May, and that of the drawing up of the symbol as 19 June. It may be assumed without too great hardness that the synod, having been convoked for 20 May, in the absence of the emperor held its meetings of a less solemn character until 14 June, when after the emperor’s arrival, the sessions properly so called began, the symbol being formulated on 19 June,
after which various matters—the paschal controversy,
etc.—were dealt with, and the sessions came to an end 25 August. The Council was opened by Constantine with the greatest solemnity. The emperor waited until all the bishops had taken their seats before making his entry. He was clad in gold and covered with precious stones in the fashion of an Oriental sovereign.
A chair of gold had been made ready for him, and when he had taken his place the bishops seated themselves. After he had been addressed in a hurried allocution, the emperor made an address in Latin, expressing his will that religious peace should be re-established. He had opened the session as honorary president, and he assisted at the subsequent sessions, but the direction of the theological discussions was abandoned, as was fitting, to the ecclesiastical leaders of the council. The actual president seems to have been Hosius of Cordova, assisted by the pope’s legates, Victor and Vincentius.

The emperor began by making the bishops understand that they had a greater and better business in hand than personal quarrels and internal commotions.
Nevertheless, he had to submit to the inflexion of hearing the last words of debates which had been going on previous to his arrival. Eusebius of Cæsarea and his two abbreviators, Socrates and Sozomen, as well as Rufinus and Gelasius of Cyricus, report no details of the theological discussions. Rufinus tells us only that daily sessions were held and that Arius was often present before the assembly; his opinions were seriously discussed and the opposing arguments attentively considered. The majority, especially those who were confessors of the Faith, energetically declared the infidelity against the impious doctrine of Arius. (For the part played by the Eusebian third party, see Eusebius of Nicomedia.) The adoption of the term ἱματιότον by the Council is fully treated under HOMOZION. For the Creed of Eusebius, see Eusebius of Nicomedia: Letter to St. Athanasius assures us that the activities of the Council were nowise hampered by Constantine's presence. The emperor had by this time escaped from the influence of Eusebius of Nicomedia, and was under that of Hosius, to whom, as well as to St. Athanasius, may be attributed a preponderant influence in the formulation of the symbol of the First Ecumenical Council, of which the following is a literal translation:

We believe in one God, the Father Almighty, Maker of all things visible and invisible; and in one Lord Jesus Christ, the only begotten of the Father, that is in the substance [καὶ τῷ οὐσίασι] of the Father God of God, light of light, true God of true God, begotten before the ages, and of our reasonable nature, was incarnate and was made man, suffered and rose again the third day, ascended into heaven and cometh to judge living and dead. And in the Holy Ghost. That is to say: There was a time when He was not, and He was not before He was begotten; and that He was made out of nothing (καὶ ὄφει βρέεται) or who maintain that He is of another hypostasis or another substance (οὐκ ὁ Πατερὲς), or that the Son of God is created, or mutable, or subject to change, [them] the Catholic Church anathematizes.

The adhesion was general and enthusiastic. All the bishops present declared themselves ready to subscribe to this formula, convinced that it contained the ancient faith of the Apostolic Church. The opponents were soon reduced to two, Theonas of Mar-Maria and Secundus of Poemenis, who were exiled and anathematized. Arius and his writings were also branded with anathema, his books were cast into the fire, and he was exiled to Illyria. The lists of the signers have reached us in a mutilated condition, disfigured by faults of the copyists. Nevertheless, these lists may be regarded as authentic. Their study is a problem which has been repeatedly dealt with in modern times, in Germany and England, in the critical editions of H. Gelzer, H. Hilgenfeld, and O. Conta on the one hand, and C. H. Turner on the other. The lists thus constructed give respectively 220 and 218 names. With information derived from one source or another, a list of 322 or 327 fathers known to have been present may be constructed.

Other matters dealt with by this council were the controversy as to the time of celebrating Easter and the Melitian schism. The former of these two will be found treated under Easter. Eastertide Controversy; the latter under MELETIUS OF LYCOPOLIS.

Of all the Acts of this Council, which, it has been maintained, were numerous, only three fragments have reached us: the creed, or symbol, given above (see also NICENE CREED); the canons; the synodal decree. In reality there never were any official acts besides these. But the accounts of Eusebius, Socrates, Sozomen, Theodoret, and Rufinus must be considered as very important sources of historical information, as well as some data preserved by St. Athanasius, and a history of the Council of Nicaea written in Greek in the fifth century by Gelasius of Cyricus. There has long existed a dispute as to the number of the canons of First Nicaea. All the collections of canons, whether in Latin or Greek, composed in the fourth and fifth centuries in attributing to this Council only the twenty canons, which were received, the following is a brief résumé: Canon I: On the admission, or support, or expulsion of clerics mutilated by choice or by violence. Canon II: Rules to be observed for ordination to the sacred Order ofutes, and the deposition of those guilty of a grave fault. Canon iii: All members of the clergy are forbidden to dwell with any woman, except a mother, sister, or aunt. Canon iv: Concerning episcopal elections. Canon v: Concerning the excommunicate. Canon vi: Concerning patriarchs and their jurisdiction. Canon vii confirms the right of the bishops of Jerusalem to enjoy certain honours. Canon viii concerns the Novatians. Canon ix: Certain sins known after ordination involve invalidation. Canon x: Lapsi who have been ordained knowingly or surreptitiously must be excluded as soon as their irregularity is known. Canon xi: Penance to be imposed on apostates of the persecution of Licinius. Canon xii: Penance to be imposed on those who upheld Licinius in his war on the Christians. Canon xiii: Indulgence to be granted to excommunicated persons in danger of death. Canon XIV: To be ordained for certain deacons at the order of the Church. Canon xv: Clerics are forbidden to lend at interest. Canon xvii: All clerics are forbidden to leave their church. Canon xvi: Formal prohibition of bishopric to one who has been deposed on account of heresy. Canon xx: Bishops, priests, and deacons are not to pass from one church to another. Canon xxi: All clerics are forbidden to leave their church. Canon xxii: Rules to be observed with regard to adherents of Paul of Samosata who wished to return to the Church. Canon xx: On Sundays and during the Paschal season prayers should be said standing.

The business of the Council having been finished Constantine celebrated the twentieth anniversary of his accession to the empire, and invited the bishops to a splendid repast, at the end of which each of them received rich presents. Several days later the emperor commanded that a final session should be held, at which he assisted in order to exhort the bishops to work for the maintenance of peace; he commended himself to their prayers, and authorized the fathers to return to their dioceses. The greater number hastened to take advantage of this and to bring the resolutions of the council to the knowledge of their provinces.

II. SECOND COUNCIL OF NICAEA (Seventh Ecumenical Council of the Catholic Church), held in 787. (For an account of the controversies which occasioned this council and the circumstances in which it was con-voiced, see ICONOCLASM, I, II.) An attempt to hold a council at Constantinople, to deal with Iconoclasm, having been frustrated by the violence of the Iconoclastic soldiery, the papal legates left that city. When, however, they had reached Sicily on their way back to Rome, they were recalled by the Empress Irene. She replaced the mutinous troops at Constantinople with troops commanded by officers in whom she had every confidence. This accomplished, in May, 787, the council was convoked at Nicea in Bithynia. The pope's letters to the empress and to the patriarch (see ICONOCLASM, II) prove superabundantly that the Holy See approved the convocation of the council. The pope afterwards wrote to Charlemagne: "Et sic synodum istam, secundum nostram ordinacionem, fecerunt" (Thus they have held the synod in accordance with our directions).

The empress-regent and her son did not assist in person at the sessions, but they were represented there by two high officials: the patrician and former consul, Petronius, and the imperial chamberlain and log-

The council promulgated twenty-two canons relating to points of discipline, which may be summarized as follows: Canon i: The clergy must observe "the holy canons," which include the Apostolic, those of the six previous Ecumenical Councils, those of particular synods which have been published at other synods, and those of the Fathers. Canon ii: Candidates for bishop's orders must know the Psalter by heart and must have read thoroughly, not cursorily, all the sacred Scriptures. Canon iii: The appointment of bishops, priests, and deacons by secular princes. Canon iv: Bishops are not to demand money of their clergy; any bishop who through gross negligence deprives one of his clergy is himself deposed. Canon v: Those who boast of having obtained church preferment with money, and recalls the Thirtieth Apostolic Canon and the canons of Chalcedon which say that clergy are to be held annually. Canon vii: Relics are to be placed in all churches: no church is to be consecrated without relics. Canon viii: Episcopal residences, monasteries, and other ecclesiastical buildings converted to profane uses are to be restored to their rightful ownership. Canon ix: Women are not to demand money of their clergy; any bishop who through gross negligence deprives one of his clergy is himself deposed. Canon x: Against clerics who leave their own dioceses without the consent of the people who have ordained them. Canon xi: Against bishops or abbots who convey church property to temporal lords. Canon xii: Episcopal residences, monasteries, and other ecclesiastical buildings converted to profane uses are to be restored to their rightful ownership. Canon xvii: The clergy must not wear sumptuous apparel. Canon xix: Among the laity, persons of opposite sexes may eat together, provided they give thanks and behave with decorum. But among religious persons, those of opposite sexes may eat together only in the presence of several God-fearing men and women, except on a joint table.---H. NICASTRO

America), lying between Honduras and Costa Rica, the Pacific Ocean and the Caribbean Sea, has an area of 40,200 square miles and a population of about 600,000 inhabitants. The great mass of the inhabitants are either aborigines, or negroes, or of mixed blood, those of pure European descent not exceeding 1500 in number. The legislative authority is vested in a single chamber of thirty-six members, elected for six years; the executive, in a president, whose term of office is also six years, exercising his functions through a cabinet of nine responsible ministers. The country is traversed by a deep depression, running parallel to the Pacific coast, within which are a chain of volcanoes (among them, Montonobo, 7000 feet) and the great lakes, Managua and Nicaragua (or Cocibolca). From the latter (a body of water 92 miles long and, at its widest, 40 miles wide) the country takes its name, derived from Nicara, the name of the aboriginal chief who held sway in the region round about Lake Cocibolca when the Spaniards, under Davila, first explored the country, in 1522. From that time, or soon after, until 1822 Nicaragua was a Spanish possession, forming part of the Province of Guatemala. From 1822 until 1839 it was one of the five states constituting the Central American Federation; from 1840 until the present time (1911) it has been an independent republic, with its capital at Managua (pop., about 55,000). The aborigines of the Mosquito Coast, a swampy tract extending along the Nicaraguan shores of the Caribbean, were nominally under British protection until 1860, when, by the Treaty of Managua, this protectorate was ceded to Great Britain to the republic; in 1905, another treaty recognized the absolute sovereignty of Nicaragua over what had been, until then, known as the Mosquito Reservation. Since the time of its acquiring political independence, Nicaragua has been in almost continuous turmoil. Commercially, the country is very poorly developed; its chief exports are coffee, cattle, and mahogany; a certain amount of gold has been mined of recent years, and the nascent rubber industry is regarded as promising.

The Diocese of Nicaragua was canonically erected in 1534 (according to other authorities, 1531), with Diego Alvarado for its first bishop. It appears to have been at first a suffragan of Mexico, though some authorities have assigned it to the ecclesiastical Province of Lima, but in the eighteenth century Benedict XIV made it a suffragan of Guatemala. The episcopal residence is at Leon, where there is a fine cathedral. A concordat between the Holy See and the Republic of Nicaragua was concluded in 1861, and the Catholic Church is still recognized as the state religion, though Church and State are now separated, and freedom is constitutionally guaranteed to all forms of religious worship. After 1894 the Zelaya Government entered upon a course of anti-Catholic legislation which provoked a protest from Bishop Francisco Ulloa y Larrios, and the bishop was banished to Panama. Upon the death of this prelate, in 1908, his coadjutor bishop, Simone Pereira, succeeded him. The returns for 1910 give the Diocese of Nicaragua 42 parishes, with 45 priests, a seminary, 2 colleges, and 2 hospitals.

NICASTRO (NECASTRENSE), a city of the Province of Catanzaro, in Calabria, southern Italy, situated on a promontory that commands the Gulf of St. Euphemia; above it is an ancient castle. The remembrance of the port of Nicastro consists of the exportation of oil, herbs, and wine. The cathedral, an ancient temple, with the episcopal palace, was outside the city; having been pillaged by the Saracens, it was restored in the year 1190, but it was destroyed in the earthquake of 1638, with the episcopal palace, under the ruins of which most valuable archives were lost. For a long time, the Greek Rite was in use at Nicastro. The first bishop of this city of whom there is any record was Henry (1090); Bishop Tancredo de Monte Foscolo (1279) was deposed by Honorius IV for having consecrated John of Aragon, King of Sicily, but he was reinstated by Boniface VIII; Bishop Paolo Capiusco (1329) was one of the judges in the case of the marriage of Henry VIII of England; Marcellino Cervino (1539) became Pope Marcellus II; Giovanni Tommaso Perrone (1639) built the new cathedral. In 1818 the ancient See of Martorano, the former Mamertum (the first bishop of which was Donnus, in 761), was united to the Diocese of Nicastro. The diocese is a suffragan of Reggio in Calabria; it has 52 parishes, with 110,100 inhabitants; 71 churches and chapels, 2 convents of the Capuchins, and one orphan asylum and boarding-school, directed by the Sisters of Charity.

CHURCH OF S. NICOLA

The leaning tower, containing the remarkable winding stairs unsupported at the centre, is the work of Nicola Pisano, modern plastic art. When barely past adolescence, he came to the notice of Frederick II of Swabia who took him to attend his coronation in Rome, thence to Naples, to complete Castel Capuano and Castel dell' Ovo (1221-31). In 1233 Nicola was in Lucua; the altorittore of the Deposition over the side door of the cathedral may be of this date. The marble urn or Arca made to contain the body of St. Dominic in the church bearing his name in Bologna, is said to be an early work, but shows maturity; the charming group of the Madonna and Child upon it, foreshadows all the Madonnas of Italian art. From Nicola's designs was built the famous basilica of St. Anthony in Padus, the church of the Fazzi in Avio is also attributed to him, possibly on insufficient grounds. In Florence he designed the interior of Sta. Trinita which Michelangelo loved so much that he called it his lady, "la mia Donna." Having been ordered by the Ghibellines to destroy the Baptistery frequented by the Guelfs, Nicola undermined the tower called Guatulo-norte, causing it to so fall that it did not touch the precious edifice. On his return to Pisa, the architect erected the campanile for the church of S. Niccolò which contains the remarkable winding stair supported at its centre; an invention repeated by Bramante for the "Belvedere", and by San Gallo in the renowned well at Orvieto. In 1242 Niccolò superintended the building of the cathedral of Pistoia, and in 1263 the restoration of S. Pietro Maggiore. He remodelled S. Domenico at Arezzo, the Duomo at Volterra, the Fraternita and Sta. Margherita at Cortona. Much of his work at Pisa is believed to have perished in the fire of 1610. A wonderful creation (1260) is the hexagonal, insulated pulpit of the Baptistry. It is supported by seven columns, three of them resting on lions. The panels have reliefs from the New Testament; the pediments, figures of virtues; the spandrels, prophets and evangelists. The architectural part is Italian Gothic; the sculptures are mainly pure reproductions of the antique. A second pulpit for the Duomo of Siena followed in 1266. Niccolò's early sculpture shows clumsiness, if we are to believe that the figures outside the Museovecchia in Florence are his. In later life, whether from Rome or from his own Camposanto at Pisa (1442; Mgr Duchene's cophagus used for the Countess Beatrice of Tuscany; Greek vase with figures he reproduced) he learned to create with the freedom, beauty, and power of ancient art. Ruhmer suggests that he may have used clay for his initial model, a method then practised in Italy. One of Niccolò's last works in architecture was the abbey and church of La Scogliera, commemorating Charles of Anjou's victory at Tagliacozzo, now in ruins; in sculpture, the statuettes for the famous Fonte Maggiore at Perugia, erected after his design (1277-80).

Nice, Diocese of (Nicaissis), comprises the Department of Alpes-Maritimes. It was re-established by the Concordat of 1801 as suffragan of Aix. The Countship of Nice from 1818 to 1960 was part of the Savilian State, and the see became a suffragan of Genoa. When Nice was annexed to France in 1860, certain parts which remained Italian were cut off from it and added to the Diocese of Vintimille. In 1862 the diocese was again a suffragan of Aix. The diocese of Grasse was separated from the Diocese of Fréjus in 1865, and given to Nice which now unites the three former Dioceses of Nice, Grasse, and Vence.

I. Diocese of Nice.—Traditions tell us that Nice was evangelized by St. Barnabas, sent by St. Paul, or else by St. Mary Magdalen, St. Martha, and St. Lazarus, and they made St. Basius, a martyr under Decius, the first Bishop of Nice. The See of Nice in Gaul existed in 314, since the bishop sent delegates to the Council of Arles in that year. The first bishop historically known is St. Anmarius who attended the Council of Aquileia in 381. Cimiez, near Nice, where still can be seen the remains of a Roman amphitheatre, and which was made illustrious by the martyrdom of the youthful St. Pontius about 260, had also a see, held in the middle of the fifth century by St. Valerianus; a rescript of St. Leo the Great, issued after 450 and confirmed by St. Hilarius in 465, united the Sees of Nice and Cimiez. This newly-formed see remained a suffragan of Embrun up to the time of the Revolution (see GAP, Diocese of). Mgr Duchenne has not discovered sufficient historical proof of the episcopate at Nice of St. Valerianus (435-43), of St. Deutierus (440-48), martyred by the Vandals, of St. Syagrius (d. 787), Count of Brignoles and son-in-law perhaps of Charlemagne. St. Anselm, a former monk of Lérins, is mentioned as Bishop of Nice (1100-07). Bishops of Nice bore the title of Counts of Drapp since the donation of property situated at Drapp made in 1072 by Pierre, Bishop of Vaison, a native of Nice, to Raymond I, its bishop, and to his successors. Charlemagne, when visiting Cimiez devastated by the Lombards in 774, caused St. Syagrius to build on its ruins the monastery of St. Pontius, the largest Alpine abbey of the Middle Ages.

II. Diocese of Grasse.—The first known Bishop of Antibes is Armentarius who attended the Council of Vaison in 442; Mgr Duchenne admits as possible that the Remigius, who signed at the Council of Nimes in 396 and in 417 received a letter from Pope Zosimus, may have been Bishop of Antibes before Armentarius. About the middle of the thirteenth century the See of Antibes was transferred to Grasse. Bishops of Grasse worthy of mention are: Cardinal Agostino Trivulzio (1537-1648); the poet Antoine Godet (1636-53), one of the most celebrated habitués of the Hôtel de Rambouillet, where he was nicknamed "Julia's dwarf" on account of his small stature.

III. Diocese of Vence.—The first known Bishop of Vence is Severus, bishop in 430 and perhaps as early as 419. Among others are: St. Veranus, son of St. Eucherius, Archbishop of Lyons and a monk of Lérins, bishop before 451 and at least until 465; St. Lambert, first a Benedictine monk (d. 1154); Cardinal Alessandro Farnese (1503-11). Antoine Godet, Bishop of Grasse, was named Bishop of Vence in 1638; the Holy See wished to unite the two dioceses. Meeting with opposition from the chapter and the clergy of Vence Godet left Grasse in 1638, to remain Bishop of Vence, which see he held until 1672.

The following saints are specially honoured in the Diocese of Nice: The youthful martyr St. Celestus, whom certain traditions make victim of Nero's persecution; St. Vincentius and St. Orontius, native of Cimiez, apostles of Aquitaine and of Spain, martyrs under Diocletian; St. Hospitius, a hermit of Cap Ferrat (d. about 581); Blessed Antoine Gallais (1300-92), a native of Nice, one of St. Catherine of Siena's confessors. The martyr St. Reparata of Casares in Palestine is the patroness of the diocese. The chief pilgrimages to the diocese are: Our Lady of Laghet near Monaco, a place of pilgrimage since the seventeenth century; the chapel of the Sacred Heart of Jesus at Roquefort near Grasse; Our Lady of Valezue; Our Lady of Brusil; Our Lady of Vie.
Prior to the application of the law of 1901 against associations, the diocese counted Assumptionists, Capuchins, Cistercians of the Immaculate Conception, Jesuits, Priests of the Christian Doctrine, Franciscans (La Passionnaires), Discalced Carmelites, Oblates of Mary Immaculate, Salesians of Don Bosco, Camillians, several orders of teaching Brothers. The Sisters of St. Martha, devoted to teaching and nursing and founded in 1892, have their mother-house at Grasse. At the beginning of the twentieth century religious congregations of the diocese conducted 4 that council a new form was presented and inserted in the Acts, though not accepted by the council. The Nicene Symbol, however, continued to be the only one in use among the defenders of the Faith. Gradually it came to be recognized as the proper profession of faith for candidates for baptism. Its insertion into the Nicene-Constantinopolitan formula, the one now in use, is usually ascribed to the Council of Constantinople, since the Council of Chalcedon (451), which re-designated this symbol as "The Creed of the Council of Constantinople of 381" had it twice read and inserted in its Acts. The historians Sozomen, Sozomen, and Theodore do not mention this, although they do record that the bishops who remained at the council after the departure of the Macedonians confirmed the Nicene faith. Hefele (II, 9) admits the possibility of our present creed being a condensation of the "Tome (vide), i.e. the exposition of the doctrines concerning the Trinity made by the Council of Constantinople; but he prefers the opinion of Remi Ceillier and Tillemont tracing the new formula to the "Anacrisus" of Epiphanius written in 374. Hort, Caesarei, Harack, and others are of the opinion that the Constantinopolitan form did not originate at the Council of Constantinople, because it is not in the Acts of the council of 381, but was inserted there at a later date; because Gregory Nazianzen who was at the council mentions only the Nicene formula, advertiting to its incompleteness about the Holy Ghost, showing that he did not know of the Constantinopolitan form which supplies this deficiency; and because the Latin Fathers apparently know nothing of it before the middle of the fifth century.

The following is a literal translation of the Greek text of the Constantinopolitan form; the brackets indicate the words altered or added in the Western liturgical form in present use:

"We believe (I believe) in one God, the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth, and of all things visible and invisible. And in one Lord Jesus Christ, the only begotten Son of God, and born of the Father before all ages. (God of God) light of light, true God, true God. Begotten not made, consubstantial to the Father, by whom all things were made. Who for us men and for our salvation came down from heaven, and was incarnate of the Holy Ghost and of the Virgin Mary and was made man; was crucified also for us under Pontius Pilate, suffered and buried; and the third day he rose again according to the Scriptures. And ascended into heaven, sitteth at the right hand of the Father, and shall come again with glory to judge the living and the dead; and the kingdom there shall be no end. And (I believe) in the Holy Ghost, the Lord and Giver of life, who proceedeth from the Father and the Son, to whom together with the Father and the Son is to be ascribed all honour and glory, both in the present age and the life to come. Amen."

In this form the Nicene article concerning the Holy Ghost is enlarged; several words, notably the two clauses "of the substance of the Father" and "of God of God", are omitted as also are the authentic ten clauses are added; and in five places the words are differently located. In general the two forms contain what is common to all the baptismal formulas in the early Church. Vossius (1577-1649) was the first to detect the similarity between the creed set forth in the "Anacrisus" and the baptismal formula of the Church of Jerusalem. Hort (1875) held that the symbol is a revision of the Jerusalem formula, in which the most important Nicene statements concerning the Holy Ghost have been inserted. The author of the revision may have been St. Cyril of Jerusalem (313-386, q. v.). Various hypotheses are offered to account for the tradition that the Niceno-Constantinopolitan symbol originated with the Council of Constantinople, but none of them is satisfactory. Whatever be its origin, the fact is that the Council of Chalcedon (451) attributed it to the Council of Constantinople, and if it was not actually composed in that council, it was adopted and authorized by the Fathers assembled as a true expression of the Faith. The history of the creed is considered in the article Byzantine Theology.

NICEPHORUS, SAINT. Patriarch of Constantinople, 806-815, b. about 758; d. 2 June, 829. This champion of the orthodox view in the second contest over the veneration of images belonged to a noted family of Constantinople. He was the son of the imperial secretary Theodore and his pious wife Eudokia. Eudokia was a strict adherent of the Church and Theodore became a monk: he was banished by the Emperor Constantine Copronymus (741-75) on account of his steadfast support of the ancient tradition of the Church. The young Nicaeas was brought to court, where he became an imperial secretary. With two other officials of high rank he represented the Emperor Irene before the Second Council of Nicaea (the Seventh Ecumenical Council), which declared the doctrine of the Church respecting images. Shortly after this Nicaeas was exiled to the Thracent Hospitium, but he had founded a monastery. Here he devoted himself to ascetic practices and to the study both of secular learning, as grammar, mathematics, and philosophy, and the Scriptures. Later he was recalled to the capital and given charge of the great hospital. Upon the death of Patriarch Tarasius (25 February, 806), there was great division among the clergy and higher court officials as to the choice of his successor. Finally, with the consent of the bishops, Emperor Nicephorus (802-811) appointed in a bazaar as patriarch. Although still a layman, he was known by all to be very religious and highly educated. He received Holy Orders and was consecrated bishop on Easter Sunday, 12 April, 808. The next day, Lucifer, a layman to the patriarchate, as had already happened in the case of Tarasius, aroused opposition in the ecclesiastical party among the clergy and monks. The leaders were the abbot, Plato of Saccidum and Theodore of Studium, and Theodore’s brother, Archbishop Joseph of Thessalonica. For this opposition the Abbot Plato was imprisoned for twenty-four days at the command of the emperor.

Nicephorus soon gave further cause for antagonism. In 795 a priest named Joseph had celebrated the unlawful marriage of Emperor Constantine VI (780-97) with Theodora, during the lifetime of Maria, the rightfull wife of the emperor, whom he had set aside. For this act Joseph had been deposed and banished. Emperor Nicephorus considered it important to have this matter settled and, at his wish the new patriarch, with the concurrence of a synod composed of a small number of bishops, pardoned Joseph and, in 806, restored him to his office. The patriarch yielded to the wishes of the emperor in order to avert more serious evils. This action was regarded by the church as a violation of ecclesiastical law and a scandal.

Before the matter was settled Theodore had written to the patriarch entreating him not to reinstate the guilty priest, but had received no answer. Although the matter was not openly discussed, he and his followers now held virtually no church communion with Nicephorus and the priest, Joseph. But, through a letter written by Archbishop Joseph, the course which he and the strict party pursued became public in 808, and caused a sensation. Theodore set forth, by speech and writing, the reasons for the action of the strict party and firmly maintained his position. Defending himself against the accusation that he and his companions were schismatic, he declared that he had kept silent as long as possible, had censured no bishops, and had always included the name of the patriarch in the liturgy. He asserted his love and his attachment to the patriarch, and said he would withdraw all opposition if the patriarch would acknowledge the violation of law by removing the priest Joseph. Emperor Nicephorus now took violent measures. He commanded the patriarch to call a synod, which was held in 809, and had Plato and several monks forcibly brought before it. The opponents of the patriarch were condemned, the Archbishop of Thessalonica was deposed, the Abbot Plato and Theodore with their monks were banished to neighbouring islands and cast into various prisons.

This, however, did not discourage the resolute opponents of the “Adulterine Heresy.” Emperor Nicephorus and Plato sent a joint memorial, through the Archimandrite Epiphanius, to Pope Leo III, and later, Theodore laid the matter once more before the pope in a letter, in which he besought the successor of St. Peter to grant a helping hand to the emperor in his efforts to put down the heresy of the “Adulterine Heresy.” Pope Leo sent an encouraging and consolatory reply to the resolute confessors, upon which letter they wrote another to him in which they declared that the Emperor Epiphanius. Leo had received no communication from Patriarch Nicephorus and was, therefore, not thoroughly informed in the matter; he also desired to spare the eastern emperor as much as possible. Consequently, for a time, he took no further steps in the matter. Emperor Nicephorus continued to persecute all adherents of Theodore of Studium, and, in addition, oppressed those who had grown suspicious, whether clergy or dignitaries of the empire. Moreover, he favoured the heretical Paulicians and the Iconoclasts and drained the people by oppressive taxes, so that he was universally hated. In July, 811, the emperor was killed in a battle with the Bulgarians. His son Staurakios, who had been wounded in the same fight, was proclaimed emperor, but was deposed by the chief men of the empire because he followed the example of his father, Theodora and his mother with the assent of the patriarch, Michael Rangabe, brother-in-law of Staurakios, was raised to the throne. The new emperor promised, in writing, to defend the faith and to protect both clergy and monks, and was crowned with much solemnity by the Patriarch Nicephorus. Michael succeeded in reconciling the patriarch and Theodore of Studium. The patriarch again deposed the priest Joseph and withdrew his decrees against Theodore and his partisans. On the other side Theodore, Plato, and the majority of their adherents recognized the patriarch as the lawful head of the Byzantine Church, and sought to bring the refractory to submission. In 809 Theodore Michael was an honourable man of good intentions, but weak and dependent. On the advice of Nicephorus he put the heretical and sedition Paulicians to death and tried to suppress the Iconoclasts.
The patriarch endeavored to establish monastic discipline among the monks, and to suppress double monasteries which had been forbidden by the Seventh Ecumenical Council. After his complete defeat, 22 June, 813, in the war against the Bulgarians, the emperor lost all authority. With the ascent of the patriarch, he resigned and entered a monastery with his children. The popular general, Leo the Armenian, now became emperor, 11 July, 813. When Nicephorus demanded the confession of faith, before the coronation, Leo put it off. Notwithstanding this, Nicephorus crowned him, and later, Leo again refused to make this confession. As soon as the new emperor had secured the peace of the empire by the baptism of the Bulgarians his true opinions began gradually to appear. He entered into connexion with the opponents of images, among whom were a number of bishops; it steadily grew more evident that he was preparing a new attack upon the veneration of images. With fearless energy the Patriarch Nicephorus now proceeded against the machinations of the Iconoclasts. He brought to trial before a synod several ecclesiastics opposed to images and forced an abbot named John and also Bishop Anthony of Sylaeum to submit. Bishop Anthony's acquiescence was merely feigned. In December, 814, Nicephorus had a long conference with the emperor on the veneration of images but no agreement was reached. Later the patriarch sent several learned bishops and abbots to convince him of the truth of the position of the Church on the veneration of images. The emperor was disposed to debate between representatives of the opposite dogmatic opinions, but the adherents of the veneration of images refused to take part in such a conference, as the Seventh Ecumenical Council had decided the question. Then Nicephorus called together an assembly of bishops and abbots at the Church of St. Sophia at which he communicated the perjured Bishop Anthony of Sylaeum. A large number of the laity were also present on this occasion and the patriarch with the clergy and people remained in the church the entire night in prayer. The emperor then summoned Nicephorus to him, and the patriarch went to the imperial palace accompanied by the abbots and monks. Nicephorus first had a long, private conversation with the emperor, in which he vainly endeavored to dissuade Leo from his opposition to the veneration of images. The emperor received those who had accompanied Nicephorus, among them seven metropolitan Abbots and Theodore of Studium. They all repudiated the interference of the emperor in dogmatic questions and once more rejected Leo's proposition to hold a conference. The emperor then commanded the abbots to maintain silence upon the matter and forbade them to hold meetings. Theodore declared that silence under these conditions would be treason and expressed sympathy with the patriarch whom the emperor forbade to hold public service in the church. Nicephorus fell ill; when he recovered the emperor called upon him to defend his course before a synod of bishops friendly to iconoclasm. But the patriarch would not recognize the synod and paid no attention to the summons. The pseudo-synod now commanded that he should no longer be called patriarch. His house was surrounded by crowds of angry Iconoclasts who shouted threats and invectives. He was guarded by soldiers and not allowed to perform any official act. With a protest against this mode of procedure the patriarch notified Leo that he found it necessary to resign the patriarchal see. Upon this he was arrested at midnight in March, 815, and banished to the monastery of St. Theodore, which he had built on Mount Athos.

Leo now raised to the patriarchate Theodotus, a married, illiterate layman who favored iconoclasm. Theodotus was consecrated 1 April, 815. The exiled Nicephorus persevered in his opposition and wrote several treatises against iconoclasm. After the murder of the Emperor Leo, 25 December, 820, Michael the Amorian ascended the throne and the defenders of the veneration of images were now more considerably treated. However, Michael would not consent to an actual restoration of images such as Nicephorus demanded from him, for he declared that he did not wish to interfere in religious matters and would leave everything as he had found it. Accordingly Empiric measures were not repealed, although the persecution ceased. Nicephorus received permission to return from exile if he would promise to remain silent. He would not agree, and remained in the monastery of St. Theodore, where he continued to write and defend the veneration of images. The dogmatic treatises, chiefly on this subject, that he wrote are as follows: a lesser "Apology for the Catholic Church concerning the newly arisen St. Basil in regard to Sacred Images" (Migne, P. G., C. 833-849), written 813-14; a larger treatise in two parts; the first part is an "Apology for the pure, unadulterated Faith of Christians against those who accuse us of idolatry" (Migne, loc. cit., 535-843); the second part contains the "Antirrheticus", a refutation of a writing by the Emperor Constantine Copronymus on images (loc. cit., 986-1190). Nicephorus added to this work seventy-five extracts from the writings of the Fathers (edited by Pitra, "Spicilegium Solomense", I, Paris, 1852, 227-370); in two further writings, which also apparently belong together, passages from previous writers, that had been used by the enemies of images to maintain their opinions, are examined and explained. Both these treatises were edited by Pitra; the first "Epistola in Spicilegium Solomense", I, 832-335; the second "Antirrheticus" in the same volume, 375, 503, and IV, 292-380. The two treatises discuss pas- sages from Macarius Magnes, Eusebius of Cesarea, and from a writing wrongly ascribed to Epiphanius of Cyprus. Another work written in the latter year of Nicephorus' life was edited by Pitra under the title "Antirrhetica adversus iconomachos" (Spicilegium Solom., IV, 233-91). A final and, as it appears, especially important treatise on this question has not yet been published. Nicephorus also left two small historical works, one known as the "Brevarium", the other as the "Chronographia", both are edited by C. de Boor, "Nicophoroe archiep. Const. opuscula hist.," in "Bibliotheca Teubneriana" (Leipzig, 1880). At the end of his life he was revered and after death regarded as a saint. In 747 his bones were translated to Constantinople with much pomp by the Patriarch Methodius and interred in the Church of the Apostles. His feast is celebrated on this day both in the Greek and Roman Churches; the Greeks also observe 2 June as the day of his death.

Nicéron, Jean-Pierre, French lexicographer, b. in Paris, 11 March, 1685, d. there, 8 July, 1738. After his studies at the College Marain, he joined the Barnabites (August, 1702). He taught rhetoric in the college of Loches, and soon after at Montargis, where he remained ten years. While engaged in teaching, he made a thorough study of modern languages. In 1716 he went to Paris and devoted his time to literary work. His aim was to put together, in a logically ar- ranged compendium, a series of biographical and bibliographical articles on the men who had distinguished themselves in literature and sciences since the time of the Renaissance. It required long research as well as great industry. After eleven years he published the first volume of his monumental work under the title of "Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire des hommes illustres de la république des lettres avec le catalogue de leurs ouvrages" (Paris, 1737). Father Oudin, J. de Michaud, and Abbé Goujet later contributed three volumes to the collection. A German translation of it was published in 1747–1777. It has been often repeated that this work lacks method, and that the length of many articles is out of proportion to the value of the men to whom they are devoted. This criticism, however true it may be, does not impair the genuine qualities and importance of the whole work. Even now, these "Mémoires" contain a great amount of information that could hardly be obtained elsewhere. Moreover, they refer to sources which, but for our author, would be easily overlooked or ignored. Besides this original composition, he translated various books from English, among which is known the "Pilgrimage to the Holy Land." His work on the development of the Church's understanding of the Eucharist is particularly noteworthy. From the late 18th century, its influence has been recognized and used in various works, including those by other scholars. It is a valuable contribution to the history of the Catholic Church.

NICETAS

Nicetas (Niceta), Bishop of Remesiana (Roma- nia) in the late 3rd century. He is known for his writings, particularly "De Viris Illustribus," which contains a biography of Nicetas. It is a significant work in the history of the Church, as it provides insight into the early Christian church and its leaders. Nicetas' writings are a valuable resource for understanding the development of church doctrine and the role of bishops in the early Christian Church.

NICETAS

The tradition concerning his writings after his death became confused; his works were erroneously ascribed to Bishop Nicetas of Aquileia (second half of the fifth century) and to Nicetas of Trier. It was not until the researches of Dom Morin, Burn, and others that a larger knowledge was attained. In 1718, thirty-eight volumes followed from 1728 to 1738. The last volume from his pen was published two years after the author's death (Paris, 1740). Father Oudin, J. de Michaud, and Abbé Goujet later contributed three volumes to the collection. A German translation of it was published in 1747–1777. It has been often repeated that this work lacks method, and that the length of many articles is out of proportion to the value of the men to whom they are devoted. This criticism, however true it may be, does not impair the genuine qualities and importance of the whole work. Nicetas (Niceta), Bishop of Remesiana (Romania), in the late 3rd century. He is known for his writings, particularly "De Viris Illustribus," which contains a biography of Nicetas. It is a significant work in the history of the Church, as it provides insight into the early Christian church and its leaders. Nicetas' writings are a valuable resource for understanding the development of church doctrine and the role of bishops in the early Christian Church.

Tradition concerning his writings after his death became confused; his works were erroneously ascribed to Bishop Nicetas of Aquileia (second half of the fifth century) and to Nicetas of Trier. It was not until the researches of Dom Morin, Burn, and others that a larger knowledge was attained. In 1718, thirty-eight volumes followed from 1728 to 1738. The last volume from his pen was published two years after the author's death (Paris, 1740). Father Oudin, J. de Michaud, and Abbé Goujet later contributed three volumes to the collection. A German translation of it was published in 1747–1777. It has been often repeated that this work lacks method, and that the length of many articles is out of proportion to the value of the men to whom they are devoted. This criticism, however true it may be, does not impair the genuine qualities and importance of the whole work. Even now, these "Mémoires" contain a great amount of information that could hardly be obtained elsewhere. Moreover, they refer to sources which, but for our author, would be easily overlooked or ignored. Besides this original composition, he translated various books from English, among which is known the "Pilgrimage to the Holy Land." His work on the development of the Church's understanding of the Eucharist is particularly noteworthy. From the late 18th century, its influence has been recognized and used in various works, including those by other scholars. It is a valuable contribution to the history of the Catholic Church.

Nicetius, Saint, Bishop of Trier, b. in the latter part of the fifth century, exact date unknown; d. in 563 or more probably 566. Saint Nicetius was the most important bishop of the ancient see of Trier in the era when, after the disorders of the Migrations, Frankish supremacy began in what had been Roman Gaul. Considerable detail of the life of this vigorous and zealous bishop is known from various sources, from letters written either by himself or to him, from two poems of Venantius Fortunatus (Poem., Lib. III, ix. x. ed. Leo, in Mon. Germ. Hist.: Auct. ant. IV (1881), Pt. I, 63-64 sq.) and above all from the statements of his pupil Areduis, later Abbot of Limoges, which have been preserved by Gregory of Tours (De vita Patrum, xvii; De Gloria Confessorum, xcviii-xciv). Nicetius came from a Gallo-Roman family; his home was apparently in Auvergne. The Nicetius mentioned by Sidoanius Apollinaris (Epist. VIII, vi) may have been a relative. From his youth he devoted himself to religious life and entered a monastery, where he developed so rapidly in the exercise of Christian virtue and in sacred learning that he was made abbot. It was while abbot that King Theoderic I (511-34) learned to know and esteem him. Nicetius often rencontrins him on account of his wrong-doing without obtaining any reception. After the death of Bishop Aprunculus of Trier, an embassy of the clergy and citizens of Trier came to the royal court to elect a new bishop. They desired Saint Gallus, but the king refused his consent. They then selected Abbé Nicetius, whose election was confirmed by Theoderic. About 527 Nicetius set out as the new bishop for Trier, accompanied by an escort sent by the king, and while on the journey had an opportunity to make known his firmness in the administration of his office.

Trier had suffered terribly during the disorders of the Migrations. One of the first cares of the new bishop was to rebuild the cathedral church, the restoration of which is mentioned by the poet Venantius Fortunatus. Archæological research has shown, in the cathedral of Trier, the existence of mason-work belonging to the Frankish period which may belong to this reconstruction by Nicetius. A fortified castle (castellum) with a chapel built by him on the river Moselle is also mentioned by the same poet (Poem., Lib. III, n. xii). The saintly bishop devoted himself with great zeal to his pastoral duty. He preached daily, opposed vigorously the numerous evils in the moral life both of the higher classes and of the common people, and in so doing did not spare the king and his favourites. Despite all these threats, he staunchly fulfilled his duty. On account of his misdeeds he excommunicated King Clotaire I (511-61), who for some time was sole ruler of the Frankish dominions; in return the king exiled the determined bishop (560). The king died, however, in the following year, and his son and successor Sigebert, the ruler of Austrasia (561-75), allowed Nicetius to return home. Nicetius took part in several synods of the Frankish bishops: the synod of Clermont (533), of Orleans (549), the second synod of Clermont (549), the synod of Toul (550) at which he presided, and the synod of Paris (554).

Nicetius corresponded with ecclesiastical dignitaries of high rank in distant places. Letters are extant that were written to him by Abbé Florianus of Romain-Moutier (Canton of Vaudois, Switzerland), by Echebulo Rufus of Carcassonne (the Canton of Valais, Switzerland), and by Archbishop Mappinio of Reims. The general interests of the Church did not escape his watchful care. He wrote an urgent letter to Emperor Justinian of Constantinople in regard to the controversies arising from Monophysitism. Another letter that has been preserved is to Codosvinda, wife of the Lombard King Alboin, in which he exhorts this princess to do everything possible to bring her husband over to the Catholic faith. In his personal life the saintly bishop was very ascetic and self-mortifying; he fasted frequently, and while the priests and clerics who lived with him in the monastery, he would go, concealed by a hooded cloak, to pray in the churches of the city. He founded a school of his own for the training of the clergy. The best known of his pupils is the later Abbot of Limoges, Areduis, who was the authority by which the latter's biographical account of Nicetius. Nicetius was buried in the church of St. Maximin at Trier. His feast is celebrated at Trier on 1 October; in the Roman Martyrology his name is placed under 5 December. The genuineness of two treatises ascribed to him is doubtful: "De Vigiliis servorum Dei" and "De Psalmodiae Bono".

Niche, a recess for the reception of a statue, so designed as to give it emphasis, frame it effectively, and afford some measure of protection. It hardly existed prior to the twelfth century, and is one of the chief decorative characteristics of Gothic architecture. The niches inclosing the statues sculptured in the round in the churches of the saints was an essential part of the great style that was so perfectly to express the Catholic Faith, and that had its beginnings in Normandy as a result of the great Cluniac reform movement; and from the latter the roughly chiseled bas-relief reliefs of the round and detached figure, the unerring artistic instinct of the medieval builders taught them—so it had taught the Greeks—that figure sculpture becomes architectural only when it is incorporated with the building of which it is a part, by means of surrounding architectural forms that harmonize it with the fabric itself. In Romanesque work this frame is little more than flanking shafts supporting an arch, the statue being treated as an accessory, and given place wherever a space of flat wall appeared between the columns and arches of the structural decoration. The convenient cover of the arrangement was immediately apparent, however, and thence forward the development of the niche as an independent architectural form was constant and rapid. Not only did the canopied niche form a suitable basis for the architectural entity and afford it that protection from the weather so necessary in the north; it also, in conjunction with the statue itself, produced one of the richest compositions of line, light, and shade known to art. The medieval architects realized this and seized upon it with avidity, using it almost as their chief means for obtaining those spots and spaces of rich decoration that gave the final touch of perfection to their marvellous fabrics. In the thirteenth century the wall became recessed to receive the statue, the flanking shafts became independent supports for an arched and gabled canopy, while a pedestal was introduced, still further to tie the sculpture into the architecture. Later the section of the embrasure became hexagonal or octagonal, the arched canopy was crousted, the gable enriched with crockets and pinnacles, and finally in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries the entire feature became almost an independent composition, the canopy being developed into a thing of marvellous complexity and richness, while it was lavished on almost every part of the building, from the doors to the spires, and within and without. But notwithstanding all the fantastic and revolutionary iconoclasm that has left outside of France, a few examples of niches properly filled by their original statues, but in such masterpieces of art as the cathedrals of Paris, Chartres, Amiens, and Reims, one may see in their highest perfection those unique manifestations of the subtlety and refinement of the perfect art of Catholic civilization.

RALPH ADAMS CRAM.

Nicholas I, Saint, Pope, b. at Rome, date unknown; d. 13 November, 867; one of the great popes of the Middle Ages, who exerted decisive influence upon the historical development of the papacy and its position among the Christian nations of Western Europe. He was of a distinguished family, being the son of the Defensor Theodore, and received an excellent training. Already distinguished for his piety, benevolence, ability, knowledge, and eloquence, he entered, at an early age, the service of the Church, was made subdeacon by Pope Sergius II (844-47), and deacon by Leo IV (847-55). He was employed in all important matters during the pontificate of his predecessor, Benedict III (855-58). After Benedict's death (7 April, 858) the Emperor Louis II, who was in the neighborhood of Rome, came into the city to exert his influence upon the election. On 24 April Nicholas was elected pope, and on the same day was consecrated and enthroned in St. Peter's in the presence of the emperor. Three days after, he gave a farewell banquet to the emperor, and afterwards, accompanied by some of the Roman nobility, visited him in his exalted position in the city, on which occasion the emperor came to meet the pope and led his horse for some distance.

Christianity in Western Europe was then in a most melancholy condition. The empire of Charlemagne had fallen to pieces, Christian territory was threatened both from the north and the east, and Christendom seemed on the brink of anarchy. Christian morality was despised; many bishops were worldly and undue claims upon their offices. The papacy, at that time, was the only power that could check the spread of paganism. Nicholas appeared as a conscientious representative of the Roman Primate in the Church. He was filled with a high conception of his mission for the vindication of Christian morality, the defence of God's law against princes and dignitaries, and of ecclesiastical law against powerful bishops. Archbishop John of Ravenna oppressed the inhabitants of the feudal territory, treated his suffragans and bishops with violence, made unjust demands upon them for money, and illegally imprisoned priests. He also forged documents to support his claims against the Roman See and maltreated the papal legates. At the warnings of the pope were without result, and the archbishop ignored a thrice-repeated summons to appear before the papal tribunal, he was excommunicated. Having first visited the Emperor Louis at Pavia, the archbishop repaired, with two imperial delegates, to Rome, where Nicholas cited him before the Roman synod assembled in the autumn of 860. Upon this John fled from Rome. Going in person to Ravenna, the pope then investigated and equitably regulated everything. Again appealing to the emperor, the archbishop was recommended by him to submit to the pope, which he did at the Roman Synod of November, 861. Later on, however, he entered into a pact with the excommunicated Archbishops of Trier and Cologne, was himself again excommunicated, and once more forced to make his submission to the pope. Another conflict arose between Archbishop Hinemar of Reims: this concerned the prerogatives of the papacy. Bishop Rothad of Soissons had appealed to the pope against the decision of the Synod of Soissons, of 861, which had deposed him; Hinemar opposed the appeal to the pope, but eventually had to acknowledge the right of the papacy to take cognizance of important legal cases (causes majoris) and pass independent judgment upon them. A further dispute broke out between Hinemar and the pope as to the elevation of the cleric Wulfad to the archiepiscopal See of Bourges, but here, again, Hinemar finally submitted to the decrees of the Apostolic See, and the Frankish synods passed corresponding ordinances.

Nicholas showed the same zeal in other efforts to maintain ecclesiastical discipline, especially as to the marriage laws. Inglutud, wife of Count Boso, had left her husband for a paramour, and Nicholas commanded the bishops in the dominions of Charles the Bold to excommunicate her unless she returned to her husband. As she paid no attention to the summons to appear before the Synod of Milan in 860, she was put under the ban. The pope was also involved in a desperate struggle with Lothair II of Lorraine over the inviolability of marriage. Lothair had abandoned his lawful wife Theuberta to marry Waldrade. At the Synod of Aachen, 28 April, 862, the bishop of Lorraine, unmindful of their duty, approved of this illicit union. At the Synod of Metz, June, 863, the papal legates, bribed by the king, assented to the Aachen decision, and condemned the absent Theuberta. Upon this the pope brought the matter before his own tribunal. The two archbishops, Günther of Cologne and Thiegaud of Trier, who had come to Rome as delegates, were summoned before the Lateran Synod of October, 863, when the pope condemned and deposed them as well as John of Ravenna and Hageno of Bergamo. The Emperor Louis II took up the cause of the deposed bishops, who then appealed to Rome. They were received at Rome with an army and laid siege to the city, so that the pope was confined for two days in St. Peter's without food. Yet Nicholas did not waver in his determination; the emperor, after being reproved, withdrew from Rome and proceeded to the Archbishops of Trier and Cologne to return to their homes. Nicholas never ceased from his efforts to bring about a reconciliation between Lothair and his lawful wife, but without any success. Another notable case in which Nicholas interposed was that of Judith, daughter of Charles the Bold, who had married Baldwin, Count of Flanders, without her father's consent. Frankish bishops had excommunicated Judith, and Hinemar of Reims had taken sides against her, but Nicholas urged leniency, in order to protect freedom of marriage. He commanded Hinemar to bring about a reconciliation between father and daughter, and succeeded in obtaining Charles's consent to the marriage. In many other ecclesiastical matters, also, he issued letters and decisions, and he took active measures against bishops who were neglectful of their duties.

In the matter of the emperor and the patriarchs of Constantinople Nicholas showed himself the Divinely appointed ruler of the Church. In violation of ecclesiastical law, the Patriarch Ignatius was deposed in 857 and Photius illegally raised to the patriarchal see. In a letter addressed (8 May, 862) to the patriarchs of the East, Nicholas called upon them and all their bishops to refuse recognition to Photius, and at a Roman synod held in April, 863, he excommunicated Photius. He also encouraged the missionary activity of the Church. He sanctioned the union of the sees of Bremen and Hamburg, and confirmed to St. Ansgar, Archbishop of Bremen, and his successors the office of papal legate to the Danes, Swedes, and Slavs. Bulgaria having been converted by Greek missionaries, its ruler, Prince Boris, in August, 863, sent an embassy to the pope with one hundred and six questions on the teaching and discipline of the Church. Nicholas answered these inquiries exhaustively in the celebrated "Responsa Nicolai ad Cumultas Boso." (Mansi, "Coll. Conc.," XV, 401 sqq.). The letter shows how keen was his desire to foster the principles of an earnest Christian life in this newly-converted people. At the same time he sent an embassy to Prince Boris, charged to use their personal efforts to attain the pope's object. Nevertheless, Boris finally joined the Eastern Church.

At Rome, Nicholas rebuilt and endowed several churches, and constantly sought to encourage religious life. His own personal life was guided by a spirit of earnest Christian asceticism and profound piety. He was very highly esteemed by the citizens of Rome, as he was by his contemporaries generally (cf. Regino, "Mon. Germ. Hist. Script.", I, 579), and after death was regarded as a saint. A much discussed question and one that is important in judging the position taken by this pope is, whether he made use of the forged pseudo-Issidoran papal decretales. After exhaustive investigation, Schrös has decided that the pope was neither acquainted with the pseudo-Issidoran collection in its entirety, nor did he use, or its individual parts; that he had perhaps a general knowledge of the false decretales, but did not base his view of the law upon them, and that he owed his knowledge of them solely to documents which came to him from the Roman Mintus, "Papst Nikolaus I. in "Historisches Jahrbuch", XXV (1904), i sq.; Idem, "Die pseudoisidorische Excep-tio spoliai bei Papst Nikolaus I. in "Historisches Jahrbuch", XXVI (1905), 275 sqq.").

Nicholas II, Pope (Gerhard of Burgundy), b. at Chevron, in what is now Savoy; elected at Siena, December, 1058; d. at Florence 19 or 27 July, 1061. Like his predecessor, Stephen X, he was canon at Liège. In 1048 he became, not only of Florence, as its indissoluble of the opposition party, but it enabled Nicholas to undertake in the early part of 1059 a pastoral visitation to Spoleti, Farfa, and Osimo. During this journey he raised Abbot Desiderius of Monte Cas-so to the dignity of cardinal-priest and appointed him legate to Campania, Benevento, Apulia, and Calabria. Early in his pontificate he had sent St. Peter Damiani and Bishop Anselm of Lucca as his legates to Milan, where a married and simoniac clergy had recently given rise, according to the

as the "Pataria." A synod for the restoration of ecclesiastic discipline was held under the presidency of these consistory, which endangered their lives. (2) A successor of the Béarnese clergy was appointed by Archbishop Guido and the Milanese clergy a solemn repudiation of simony and concubinage.

One of the most pressing needs of the time was the reform of papal elections. It was right that they should be freed from the nefarious influence of the Roman factions and the secular control of the emper-orum, hitherto so disastrous but always objectionable. To this end Nicholas II held in the Lateran at Easter, 1059 a synod attended by one hundred and thirteen bishops and famous for its law concerning papal elections. It came into the authentic text of this decree caused considerable controversy in the eleventh century. That the decree did not result in a consensus of opinion on the matter need not surprise, if it be remembered that thirty years after the publication of the decree complaints were heard regarding the dexterity in the text. Whether the text is a papal and an imperial recension and the sense of the law may be stated substantially as follows: (1) At the death of the pope, the cardinal-bishops are to confer among themselves concerning a candidate, and, if they have agreed upon a name, they and the other cardinals are to proceed to the election. The remainder of the clergy and the laity enjoy the right of ac-

his elevation, due to violence and corruption, was contrary to the specific orders of Stephen X that, at his death, no choice of a successor was to be made; (3) Hildbrand's return from Germany. Several cardinals protested against the irregular proceedings, but they were compelled to flee from Rome. Hildebrand was returning from his mission when the news of these events reached him. He interrupted his journey at Florence, and after agreeing with Duke Godfrey of Lorraine-Tuscany upon Bishop Gerhard for elevation to the papacy, he won over part of the Roman population to the support of his candidate. An embassy dispatched to the imperial court secured the confirmation of the choice by the Empress Agnes. At Hildebrand's invitation, the cardinals met in De-

December, 1058, at Siena and elected Gerhard who assumed the name of Nicholas II. On his way to Rome the new pope held at Sutri a well-attended synod at which, in the presence of Duke Godfrey and the imninary council, Guibert of Parma, he pronounced denominative, no. the latter was removed from the city in January, 1059, and the solemn coronation of Nicholas took place on the twenty-fourth of the same month. A cultured and stainless man, the new pontiff had about him capable advisers, but to meet the danger still threatening from Benedict X and his armed supporters, Nicholas empowered Hildebrand to enter into negotiations with the Normans of south-

NICHOLAS III, POPE GIOVANNI GAETANI ORSINI; born 1215; elected at Naples 25 November, 1277; died at Rome 5 March, 1280. His father, Matteo Orsini, was of the illustrious Roman family of the Orsini, while his mother, Perna Gaetana, belonged to the noble house of the Gaetani. His cousin Matteo Orsini had defended Rome against Frederick II and saved it to the papacy. He was a priest of St. Peter in Rome and belonged to his third order, facts not without influence on the son, for both as cardinal and pope the latter was ever kindly disposed towards the Franciscans. We have no knowledge of his education and early life. Innocent IV, prior to his exile, rendered to the Holy See by his father, created the young Orsini (28 May, 1211) cardinal-deacon with the title of St. Nicholas in Carcere Tolosano and gave him benefices at York, Laon, and other places. Probably at an earlier date the administration of the Roman churches of San Lorenzo in Damaso and of San Gregorio had been entrusted to him. One of hisardininals, he accompanied Innocent IV in his flight from Civita Vecchia to Genoa and there to Lyons (29 June, 1244). In 1252 he was dispatched on an unsuccessful mission of peace to the warring Ghibellines and Guelfs of Florence. In 1258 Louis IX paid an eloquent tribute to his independence and impartiality by suggesting his selection as equally acceptable to England and to France for the solemn resolution of the peace concluded between the two nations. His election was likewise above reproach, his work was accepted for his services. So great was the influence in the Sacred College that the election of 1277 was mainly due to his influence, the name of the Franciscans (1263). Under Clement IV (1265-68) he was a member of the delegation which expelled Charles of Anjou from the Kingdom of Naples (28 June, 1265). Later he played an important part at the elections of Gregory X, who succeeded the two at his hands, and of John XXI, whose successor he became and who named him as his legate in France. After the death of six popes he succeeded John as Nicholas III.

His reign was fated to free Rome from one imperial authority. His policy aimed not only at the re-establishment of Roman rule over the territories won by the imperial princes, Nicholas III, as pope, confined the province through his nephew, Luke, to whom he shortly before 12 March, 1278, raised to the cardinalate, to the Roman Church. In 1278, after the death of the Emperor, he created Berthold, uncle of the new pope, Count of the Roman Eagle, in the capacity of the new pope took his relatives in hand and used them as a lever in the distribution of benefices and lucrative places. He compelled Charles of Anjou in 1278 to resign the regency of Tuscany and in the same year the regency of the Kingdom of Sicily. The freedom of papal elections, he ordained in a constitution of 18 July, 1278, that hereafter the spiritual power and all municipal offices were to be reserved to Roman citizens with the exclusion of foreigners, and that the pope was to have the right of absolution and to nominate all the clergy in his diocese. In furtherance of more harmonious relations with the Byzantine court, the pope absolved his subjects from the obligation of paying the tribute of theCONNEXION, one of Rudolf's daughters. The much-discussed plan of a new division of the empire into four parts is not sufficiently attested to be attributed with certainty to Nicholas. In this partition Germany, as hereditary monarchy, was to fall to Rudolf; the Kingdom of Arles was to devolve on his son-in-law, Charles Martel of Anjou, while the Kingdoms of Lombardy and Tuscany were to be founded in Italy and bestowed on relatives of the pope. Nicholas's efforts to promote the union of France and Castile remained fruitless. Unable to carry out his desire of personally appearing in Hungary, where internal dissensions and the devastations of the Cumans endangered the very existence of Christianity, he named, in the full of 1278, Bishop Philip of Fermo his legate to that country. A synod, held at Buda in 1279 under the presidency of the papal envoy, could not complete its deliberations owing to the violent interference of the people. King Ladislaus IV, instigator of the trouble, was threatened in a papal letter with spiritual and temporal penalties if he failed to reform his ways. The king temporarily heeded this solemn admonition, and at last suppressed the raids of the Cumans. The appointment of worthy incumbents to the Archdioceses of Gran and Kubessa was made under this pontificate further helped to strengthen the cause of Christianity. The task of Nicholas III in his dealings with the Eastern Church was the practical realization of the union accepted by the Greeks at the Second Council of Lyons (1274), for political reasons rather than out of dogmatic persuasion. The instructions to the legates whom he sent to Constantinople contained, among other conditions, the renewal by the emperor of the oath sworn to by his representatives at Lyons. The maintenance of the Greek Rite was granted only in so far as papal authority did not consider it opposed to unity of faith; those of the clergy opposed to reunion were required to obtain absolution of the incurred censures from the Roman excommunication. These were more rigorous conditions than had been imposed by his predecessors, but the failure of the negotiations for reunion can hardly be attributed to them, for the Greek nation was strongly opposed to submission to Rome and the emperor pursued temporal advantages under cover of desire for ecclesiastical harmony. At the request of Abaga, Khan of the Tatars, the pope sent him in 1276 five Franciscan missionaries who were to preach the Gospel first in Persia and then in China. They encountered considerable obstacles in the former country and it was not until the pontificate of Nicholas IV that their preaching produced appreciable results. The realization of the pope's desire for the organization of a Crusade was frustrated by the distracted state of European politics. On 14 August, 1279, he issued the constitution "Exit qui seminat", which is still fundamental for the interpretation of the Rule of St. Francis and in which he approved the stricter observance of poverty (see Francis, Rule of Saint). While the Vatican had been occupied from time to time by some of his predecessors, Nicholas III established there the papal residence, remodelled and enlarged the palace, and secured in its neighbourhood a landed property, subsequently transformed into the Vatican gardens. He lies buried in the Chapel of St. Nicholas, built by him in St. Peter's. He was an ecclesiastically-minded pontiff of great diplomatic ability and, if we except his acts of nepotism, of unblemished character.

NICHOLAS IV

Nicholas IV, Pope (Girolamo Marschi), b. at Ascoli in the March of Ancona; d. in Rome, 4 April, 1292. He was of humble extraction, and at an early age entered the Franciscan Order. In 1272 he was sent as a delegate to Constantinople to invite the participation of the Greeks in the Second Council of Lyons. Two years later he succeeded St. Bonaventure in the generalship of his order. While he was on a mission to France to promote the restoration of peace between that country and Castile, he was created cardinal-priest with the title of Santa Prisenzia (1278) and in 1281 Martin IV appointed him Bishop of Palestrina. After the death of Honorius IV (3 April, 1287), the conclave held at Rome was for a time hopelessly divided in its selection of a successor. When the cardinals had carried off six of the electors, the others, with the sole exception of Girolamo, left Rome. It was not until the following year that they reassembled and on 15 February, 1288, unanimously elected him to the papacy. Obedience and a second election however (22 February) were alone capable of overcoming his reluctance to accept the supreme pontificate. He was the first Franciscan pope, and in loving remembrance of Nicholas III he assumed the name of Nicholas IV.

The reign of the new pope was not characterized by sufficient independence. The undue influence exercised at Rome by the Colonna is especially noteworthy and was so apparent even during his lifetime that Roman wits represented him encased in a column—the distinctive mark of the Colonna family—out of which only his tiara-covered head emerged. The efforts of Rudolf of Habsburg to receive the imperial crown at the hands of the new pope were not successful. His failure was partly due to the estrangement consequent upon the attitude assumed by the pope in the question of the Sicilian succession. As feudal suzerain of the kingdom, Nicholas annulled the treaty, concluded in 1288 through the mediation of Edward I of England, which confirmed James of Aragon in the possession of the island. He lent his support to the rival claims of the House of Anjou and crowned Charles II King of Sicily and Naples at Rieti, 29 May, 1289, after the latter had expressly acknowledged the suzerainty of the Apostolic See and promised not to accept any municipal dignity in the States of the Church. The action of the pope did not end the armed struggle for the possession of Sicily nor did it secure the kingdom permanently to the House of Anjou. Rudolf of Habsburg also failed to obtain from the pope the repeal of the authorization, granted the French king, to levy tithes in certain German districts for the prosecution of the war against the House of Aragon. When he appointed his son Albert to succeed Ladislaus IV of Hungary (31 August, 1290), Nicholas claimed the realm as a papal fief and conferred it upon Charles Martel, son of Charles II of Naples.
In 1291 the fall of Ptolemais put an end to Christian dominion in the East. Previous to this tragic event, Nicholas had in vain endeavoured to organize a crusade. He now called upon all the Christian princes to take up arms against the Mussulman and instigated the diets of councils to devise the means of sending assistance to the Holy Land. These synods were to discuss likewise the advisability of the union of the Knights Templars and Knights of St. John, as the dispensions among them had partly caused the loss of Ptolemais. The pope himself initiated the preparations for the crusade and fitted out twenty ships for the war. His appeals and his example remained unheeded, however, and nothing of permanent value was accomplished.

Nicholas IV sent missionaries, among them the celebrated John of Montecorvino (q. v.), to the Bulgarians, Ethiopians, Tartars, and Chinese. By his constitution of 18 July, 1289, the cardinals were granted one half of the revenues of the Apostolic See and a share in the financial administration. In 1290 he renewed the condemnation of the sect known as the Apostolicis (q. v.). Nicholas was pious and learned; he contributed to the artistic beauty of Rome, building particularly a palace beside Santa Maria Maggiore, the church in which he was buried and where Sixtus V erected an imposing monument to his memory. N. A. WEBER.

Nicholas V, Pope (TOMMASO PARENTUELLI), a name never to be mentioned without reverence by every lover of letters, b. at Sarzana in Liguria, 15 November, 1397; d. in Rome, 24-5 March, 1455. While still a youth he lost his father, a poor but skilful physician, and was thereby prevented from completing his studies at Bologna. He became tutor in the families of the Strozzi and Albizzi at Florence, where he made the acquaintance of the leading Humanist scholars of the day. In 1419 he returned to Bologna, and three years later took his degree as master of theology. The saintly bishop of Bologna, Niccolò Albergati, now took him into his service. For more than twenty years he was the bishop's factotum, and in that capacity was enabled to indulge his passion for building and that of collecting books. Unlike many bibliophiles he was as well acquainted with the matter contained within his volumes as with their bindings and value. Some of them are still preserved, and contain many marginal notes in his beautiful writing. His knowledge was of the encyclopedic character not unusual at a time when the learned undertook to argue de omni re scibili. His mind, however, was receptive rather than productive. Nevertheless, he could make good use of what he had studied, as was shown at the Council of Florence where his familiarity with Patristic and Scholastic theology gave him a prominent place in the discussions with the Greek bishops. He accompanied Albergati in various legate missions, notably to France, and was always mindful of rare and beautiful books. Eugene IV wished to attach such a brilliant scholar to his own person; but Parentucelli remained faithful to his patron. On the death of the latter he was appointed to succeed him in the See of Bologna, but was unable to take possession owing to the troubled state of the city. This led to his being entrusted by Pope Eugene with important diplomatic missions in Italy and Germany, which he carried out with such success that he obtained as his reward a cardinal's hat (Dec., 1440). Early next year (23 Feb.) Eugene died, and Parentucelli was elected in his place, taking as his name Nicholas in memory of his obligations to Niccolò Albergati (5 March, 1447).

As soon as the pontiff was firmly seated on his throne, it was felt that a new spirit had come into the papacy. Now that there was no longer any danger of a fresh outbreak of schism and the Council of Constan-tence had lost all influence, Nicholas could devote himself to the accomplishment of objects which were the aim of his life and had been the means of raising him to his present exalted position. He designed to make Rome the site of splendid monuments, the home of literature and art, the bulwark of the papacy, and the worthy capital of the Christian world. His first care was to strengthen the fortifications, and restore the churches in which the stations were held. Next he took in hand the cleansing and paving of the streets. Rome, once famous for the number and magnificence of its aqueducts, had become almost entirely dependent for its water supply on the Tiber and on wells and cisterns. The "Aqua Virgo", originally constructed by Agrippa, was restored by Nicholas, and is to this day the most prized by the Romans, under the name of "Acqua Trevi". But the works on which he especially set his heart were the rebuilding of the Leonine City, the Vatican, and the Basilica of St. Peter. On this spot, as in a centre, the glory of the papacy were to be focused. We cannot here enter into a description of the noble designs which he entertained (see Pastor, "History of the Popes", II, 173 sqq., Eng. tr.). The basilica, the palace, and the fortress of the popes are not now what he would have made them; but their actual splendours are due in no small measure to the lofty aspirations of Nicholas V. He has been severely censured for pulling down a portion of the old St. Peter's and planning the destruction of the remainder. He defended his action on the ground that the buildings were on the verge of ruin (Münitz, "Les Arts à la Cour des Papes", p. 118); but the almost equally ancient Basilica of San Paolo fuori le Mura was preserved and restored until it was destroyed by fire in 1823. The pontiff's veneration for antiquity may have yielded to his desire to construct an edifice more in harmony with the chaste taste of the Renaissance, but it is certain that he himself was so ardent an adherent. Nothing but praise, however, can be given to him for his work in the Vatican Palace. Indeed it was he who first made it the worthy residence of the pontiffs. Some of his constructions still remain, notably the left side of the court of St. Damasus and the chapel of San Lorenzo, decorated with Fra Angelico's frescoes.

The Vatican, Rome.
Nicholas 59

Though a patron of art in all its branches, it was literature that obtained his highest favours. His lifelong love of books and his delight in the company of scholars could now be gratified to the full. His immediate predecessors had held the Humanists in suspicion; Nicholas welcomed them to the Vatican as friends. Carried away by his enthusiasm for the New Learning, he overlooked any irregularities in their morals or opinions. He accepted the dedication of a work by Poggio, in which Eugene was assailed as a hypocrite; Valla, the Voltaire of the Renaissance, was made an Apostolic notary. In spite of the demands on his resources for building purposes, he was always generous to deserving scholars. If any of them secretly declined his bounty, he would say: "Do not refuse; you will not always have a Nicholas among you."

He set up a vast establishment in the Vatican for translating the Greek classics, so that all might become familiar with at least the matter of these masterpieces. "No department of literature owes so much to him as history. By him were introduced to the knowledge of western Europe, two great and unrivalled models of historical composition, the work of Herodotus and the work of Thucydides. By him, too, our ancestors were first made acquainted with the great and lucid simplicity of Xenophon and with the mainy goodly sense of Polybius" (Macaulay, Speech at Glasgow University). The crowning glory of his pontificate was the foundation of the Vatican Library. No lay sovereigns had such opportunities of collecting books as the pontiff. Nicholas's agents ravaged the monasteries and palaces of every country in Europe. Precious manuscripts, which would have been eaten by the moths or would have found their way to the furnace, were bought from their ignorant owners and sumptuously housed in the Vatican. In this way he accumulated five thousand volumes at a cost of more than forty thousand scudi. "It was his greatest delight to wander through his library, arranging the books and glancing through their pages, admiring the handsome bindings, and taking pleasure in contemplating his own arms stamped on those that had been dedicated to him, and dwelling in thought on the gratitude that future generations of scholars would entertain towards their benefactor. Thus he is to be seen depicted in one of the halls of the Vatican library, immersed in studying his books" (Voigt, quoted by Pastor, II, 213).

His devotion to art and literature did not prevent him from the performance of his duties as Head of the Church. By the Concordat of Vienna (1448) he secured the recognition of the bishops' dioceses and benefices. He also brought about the submission of the last of the antipopes, Felix V, and the dissolution of the Synod of Basle (1449). In accordance with his general principle of impressing the popular mind by outward and visible signs, he proclaimed a Jubilee which was the fitting symbol of the cessation of the schism and the restoration of the authority of the popes (1450). Vast multitudes flocked to Rome in the first part of the year; but when the hot weather began, the plague which had been ravaging the countries north of the Alps wrought fearful havoc among the pilgrims. Nicholas was seized with a panic; he hurried away from the city, disguised as a friar, from castle to castle in the hope of escaping infection. As soon as the pestilence abated he returned to Rome, and received the vassals of many German princes and prelates who had long been upholders of the decrees of Constance and Basle. But another terrible calamity marred the general rejoicings. More than two hundred pilgrims lost their lives in a crush which occurred on the bridge of Sant'Angelo a few days before Christmas. Nicholas erected two chapels at the entrance of the bridge where Mass was to be said daily for the repose of the souls of the victims.

On this occasion, as in previous Jubilees, vast sums of money found their way into the treasury of the Church, thus enabling the pontiff to carry out his designs for the promotion of art and learning, and the support of the poor. As the Jubilee was the proof that Rome was the centre of all Christendom was drawn, so at its conclusion Nicholas sent forth his legates into the different countries to assert his authority and to bring about the reform of abuses. Cardinal D'estouteville was sent to France; Cardinal Nicholas of Cusa, one of the most devout and learned men of his day, was sent to North Germany and England; and the heroic Franciscan, St. John Capistran, to South Germany. They held provincial and other synods and assemblies of the hierarchical clergy, in which wholesome decrees were made. Nicholas of Cusa and St. John preached the word in season and out of season, thereby producing wonderful conversions among both clergy and laity. If they did not succeed in destroying the germs of the Protestant revolt, they certainly postponed for a while the evil and narrowed the sphere of its influence. It should be noted that Cusa never reached England, and that D'estouteville initiated the process for the rehabilitation of Bl. Joan of Arc. The restored authority of the Holy See was further manifested by the coronation of Charles V as Holy Roman Emperor—the first of the House of Habsburg raised to that dignity, and the last of the emperors crowned in Rome (1452).

Meantime the pontiff's own subjects caused him great anxiety. Stefano Porcaro, an able scholar and politician, who had enjoyed the favour of Martin V and Eugene IV, made several attempts to set up a republic in Rome. Twice he was pardoned and pensioned by the generous Nicholas who would not tolerate such an ornament of the New Learning. At last he was seized on the eve of a third plot, and condemned to death (Jan., 1453). A deep gloom now settled down on the pontiff. He had lost his most ardent and sincere supporter, and he could not reconcile himself to the fact that Rome and his mild government of his subjects had not been able to quell the spirit of rebellion. He began to collect troops and never stirred abroad without a strong guard. His health, too, began to suffer seriously, though he was by no means an old man. And before the conspiracy was thoroughly stamped out a fresh blow struck him from which he never recovered. We have seen that a prominent part Parentucelli had taken in the Council of Florence. The submission of the Greek bishops had not been sincere. On their return to Constantinople most of them openly rejected the decrees of the council and declared for the papal rights concerning the schism. Eugene IV vainly endeavoured to stir up the Western nations against the ever-advancing Turks. Some help was given by the Republic of Venice and Genoa; but Hungary and Poland, more nearly menaced, supplied the bulk of the forces. A victory at Nish (1443) had been followed by two terrible defeats (Varna, 1444, and Kosovo, 1449). The whole of the Balkan peninsula, except Constantinople, was now at the mercy of the infidels. The emperor, Constantine XII, sent messages to Rome imploring the pope to summon the Christian peoples to his aid. Nicholas sternly reminded him of the promises made at Florence, and insisted that the terms of the mission should be observed. Nevertheless the fear that the Turks would attack Italy, if they succeeded in capturing the bulwark of the east, induced the pontiff to take some action—especially as the emperor professed his readiness to accept the decrees of the council. In May, 1452, Cardinal Isidore, an enthusiastic Greek patriot, was sent as legate to Constantinople. A solemn function in honour of the Holy Roman Emperor on 12 Dec., 1452, with prayers for the pope and for the patriarch, Gregorius. But the clergy and the populace cursed the Uniates and boasted that they would rather submit to the turban of the Turk than Nicholas, Blessed, date of birth unknown, became monk in the Benedictine monastery of San Nicola del Lido at Venice in 1153. When, in a military expedition of the Venetians in 1172, all the other members of the family of the Justiniari perished in the Aegean Sea near the Island of Chios, the Republic of Venice mourned over this disaster as a noble family as over a public calamity. In order that the entire family might not die out, the Venetian Government sent Baron Morosini and Toma Falier as dispensers to Alexander III, with the request to dispense Nicholas from his monastic vows. The dispensation was granted, and Nicholas married Anna, the daughter of Doga Michiel, becoming thus the head of a new Venetian family. Soon after 1179 he returned to the monastery of San Nicola del Lido, having previously founded a convent for women on the Island of Anziano, where his wife took the veil. Both he and his wife died in the odour of sanctity and were venerated by the people, though neither was ever formally beatified.

Nicholas of Cussa, German cardinal, philosopher, and administrator, b. at Cues on the Moselle, in the Archdiocese of Trier, 1400 or 1401; d. at Todi, in Umbria, 11 August, 1464. His father, Johann Crifyt (Krebs), a wealthy boatman (nauta, not a "poor fisherman"), died in 1450 or 1451, and his mother, Catharina Roemern, in 1457. The legend that Nicholas fled from the ill-treatment of his father to Count Ulrich of Manderscheid is doubtfully reported by Hartzheim (Vita N. de Cussa, Trier, 1730), and has never been proved. Of his early education in a school or monastery nothing is known; but in 1416 he was matriculated in the University of Heidelberg, by Rector Nicholas of Bettenberg, as "Nicolaus Cancro de Coesze, cler[cus] Trever[ensis] dio[eis]s[ias]". A year later, 1417, he left for Padua, where he graduated, in March 24 and October 31, 1424, and was made "doctor decretorum" under the celebrated Giuliano Cesari. It is said that, in later years, he was honored with the doctorate in civil law by the University of Bologna. At Padua he became the friend of Paolo Toscanelli, afterwards a celebrated physician and scientist. He studied Latin, Greek, Hebrew, and, in later years, Arabic, though, as his friend Johannes Andreae, Bishop of Aleria, testifies, and as appears from the style of his writings, he was not a lover of rhetoric and poetry. That the loss of a lawsuit in Mains should have decided his choice of the clerical state, in 1421, is not supported by his biographer, with whom I am in accord. The Archbishop of Trier, he matriculated in the University of Cologne, for dignity, under the rectorship of Petrus von Weiler, in 1425. His identity with the "Nicolaus Treverensis", who is mentioned as secretary to Cardinal Orsini, and papal legate for Germany in 1426, is not certain. After 1428, benefices at Coblenz, Oberwezel, Münstermaifeld, Dypurg, St. Wendel, and Liège fell to his lot, successively or simultaneously.

His public career began in 1431, at the Council of Basle, which opened under the presidency of his former teacher, Giuliano Cesari. The cause of Count Ulrich of Manderscheid, which he defended, was lost and the transactions with the Bohemians, in which he represented the German nation, proved fruitless. His main efforts at the council were for the reform of the calendar and for the unity, political and religious, of all Christendom. In 1437 the orthodox minority sent him to Eugene IV, whom he strongly supported. The pope entrusted him with a mission to Constantinople, where, in the course of two months, besides discovering Greek manuscripts of St. Basil and St. John Damascene, he gained over for the Council of Florence, the emperor, the patriarch, and twenty-eight archbishops. After reporting the result of his mission to the pope at Ferrara, in 1438, he was created papal legate to support the cause of Eugene IV. He did so before the Diets of Mainz (1441), Frankfort (1442), Nuremberg (1444), again of Frankfort (1446), and even at the court of Charles V of France, with the result that Eugene IV was able to force that Aeneas Sylvius called him the Hercules of the Eugenies. As a reward Eugene IV nominated him cardinal; but Nicholas declined the dignity. It needed a command of the next pope, Nicholas V, to bring him to Rome for the acceptance of this honour. In 1449 he was proclaimed cardinal-priest of the title of St. Peter ad Vincula.
His new dignity was fraught with labours and crosses. The Diocese of Brixen, the see of which was vacant, needed a reformer. The Cardinal of Cusa was appointed (1450), but, owing to the opposition of the chapter and of Sigismund, Duke of Austria and Count of the Tyrol, could not take possession of the see until two years later. In the meantime the cardinal was sent by Nicholas V, as papal legate, to make peace with Germany and the Netherlands. He was to preach the Jubilee indulgence and to promote the crusade against the Turks; to visit, reform, and correct parishes, monasteries, hospitals; to endeavour to reunite the Hussites with the Church; to end the dissensions between the Duke of Cleve and the Archbishop of Cologne; and to treat with the Duke of Burgundy with a view to peace between England and France. He crossed the Brenner in January, 1451, held a provincial synod at Salzburg, visited Vienna, Munich, Ratisbon, and Nuremberg, held a diocesan synod at Bamberg, presided over the provincial chapter of the Benedictines at Würzburg, and reformed the monasteries in the Diocese of Erfurt, Thuringia, Magdeburg, Hildesheim, and Minden. Through the Netherlands he was accompanied by his friend Denys the Carthusian. In 1452 he concluded his visitations by holding a provincial synod at Cologne. Everywhere, according to Abbot Trithemius, he had appeared as an angel of light and peace, but it was not to be so in his own diocese. The troubles began with the Poor Clares of Brixen and the Benedictine nuns of Sonnenburg, who needed reform, but were shielded by Duke Sigmund. The cardinal had to take refuge in the stronghold of Andraz, at Buechenstein, and finally, by special authority conferred from Pius II, pronounced an interdict upon the Countship of the Tyrol. In 1460 the duke made him prisoner at Burneck and extorted from him a treaty unfavourable to the bishopric. Nicholas fled to Pope Pius II, who excommunicated the duke and laid an interdict upon the diocese, to be enforced by the Archbishop of Salzburg. But the duke, himself an immoral man, and, further, instigated by the antipapal humanist Heimbach, defied the pope and appealed to a general council. It needed the strong influence of the emperor, Frederick III, to make him finally (1464) submit to the Church. This took place some days after the cardinal’s death. The account of the twelve years’ struggle given by Jäger and, after him, by Prantl, is unfair to the “foreign reformer” (see Pastor, op. cit. infra, II). The cardinal, who had accompanied Pius II to the Venetian fleet at Ancona, was sent by the pope to Leghorn to hasten the Genoese crusaders, but on the way succumbed to an illness, the result of his ill-treatment at the hands of Sigmund, from which he had never fully recovered. He died at Todt, in the presence of his friends, the physi- cian Tocamann and Bishop Johannes Andreis.

The body of Nicholas of Cusa rests in his own titular church in Rome, beneath an effigy of him sculptured in relief, but his heart is deposited before the altar in the hospital of Cusa. This hospital was the cardinal’s own foundation. By mutual agreement with his sister Clare and his brother John, his entire inheritance was made the basis of the foundation, and by the cardinal’s last will the altar, service, manuscript library, and scientific instruments were bequeathed to it. The extensive buildings with chapel, cloister, and refectory, which were erected in 1451–56, stand to this day, and serve their original purpose of a home for thirty-three old men, in honour of the thirty-three years of Christ’s earthly life. Another foundation of the cardinal was a residence at Deventer, called the Burza Cusana, where twenty poor clerical students were to be supported. Among bequests, a sum of 280 ducats was left to St. Maria dell’ Anima in Rome, for an infirmary. In the archives of this institution is found the original document of the cardinal’s last will.

The writings of Cardinal Nicholas may be classified under four heads: (1) juridical writings: “De concordantia catholica” and “De auctoritate presidendi in concilio generali” (1432–35), both written on occasion of the Council of Basle. The superiority of the general councils over the pope is maintained; though, when the majority of the assembly drew from these writings starting conclusions unfavourable to Pope Eugene, the author seems to have changed his views, as appears from his action after 1437. The political reforms proposed were skilfully utilized by Görres in 1814. (2) In his philosophical writings, composed after 1439, he set aside the definitions and methods of the “Aristotelian Scot” and replaced them by deep speculations and mystical forms of his own. The best known in his first treatise, “De docta ignorantia” (1439–40), on the finite and the infinite. The Theory of Knowledge is critically examined in the treatise “De conjecturis” (1440–44) and especially in the “Compendium” (1464). In his Cosmology he calls the Creator the Possess (posse-est, the possible-actual), alluding to the argument: God is possible, therefore actual. His microcosmos in created things has some similarity with the “monads” and the “emanation” of Leibniz. (3) The theological treatises are dogmatic, ascetic, and mystic. “De tributione alchorani” (1460) was occasioned by his visit to Constantinople, and was written for the conversion of the Mohammedans. For the faithful were written: “De querendo Deum” (1445), “De filiatione Dei” (1445), “De visione Dei” (1453), “Excitatum libri X” (1451–54), and others. The favourite subject of his mystical speculations was the Trinity. His concept of God has been much disputed, and has even been called pantheistic. The context of his writings proves, however, that they are all strictly Christian. Schoeps calls his theology a Thomas & Remius in philosophical language. (4) The scientific writings consist of a dozen treatises, mostly short, of which the “Reparatio Calendarii” (1436), with a correction of the Alphonsine Tables, is the most important. For an account of its contents and its results, see Lillius, Altorius. The shorter mathematical treatises are examined in Kastner’s “History of Mathematics”, II. Among them is a claim for the exact quadrature of the circle, which was refuted by Regiomontanus [see Müller (REGIO-MONTANUS), JOHANN]. The astronomical views of the cardinal are scattered through his philosophical treatises. They evince complete independence of traditional doctrines, though they are based on symbolism of numbers, on combinations of letters, and on abstract speculations rather than observation. The earth is a star like other stars, is not the centre of the universe, is not at rest, nor are its poles fixed. The celestial bodies are not strictly spherical, nor are their orbits circular. The difference between theory and appearance is explained by relative motion. Had Copernicus been aware of these assertions he would probably have been encouraged by them to publish his own monumental work. The collected editions of Nicholas of Cusa's works are: Incunabula (before 1476) in 2 vols., incomplete; Paris (1514) in 3 vols.; Basle (1565), in 3 vols.

Nicholas of Flüe (DE RUFÉ), BLESSED, d. 21 March, 1417, lived as a recluse in a fertile plateau near Sarscha, Canton Obwalden, Switzerland; d. 21 March, 1487, as a recluse in a neighbouring ravine, called Ranft. He was the oldest son of pius, well-to-do peasants and from his earliest youth was fond of prayer, practised mortification, and conscientiously performed the labour of a peasant boy. At the age of 21 he entered the army and took part in the battle of Ragaz in 1446. Probably he fought in the battles near the Etzel in 1439, near Baar in the Canton of Zug in 1443, and assisted in the capture of Zürich in 1444. He took up arms again in the so-called Thurgau war against Archduke Sigismund of Austria in 1460. It was due to his influence that the Dominican Convent St. Katharinalin, whither many Austrian had fled after the capture of Diezenhofen, was not destroyed by the Swiss confederates. Heeding the advice of his pastor, he married, about the age of twenty-five, a pious girl from Sarscha, named Dorothy Wyssling, who bore him five sons and five daughters. His youngest son, Nicholas, born in 1467, became a priest and a doctor of theology. Though averse to worldly dignities, he was elected cantonal councillor and judge. The fact that in 1462 he was one of five arbiters appointed to settle a dispute between the parish of Sarscha and the monastery of Engelberg, shows the esteem in which he was held. When he was about twenty-five years in wedlock he listened to an inspiration of God and with the consent of his wife left his family on 26 October, 1467, to live as a hermit. At first he intended to go to a foreign country, but when he came into the neighbourhood of Basle, a divine inspiration ordered him to take up his abode in the Ranft, a valley along the Melcha, about an hour's walk from Sarscha. Here, known as the "Hermit Nicholas", he lived over twenty years, without taking any bodily food or drink, as was established through a careful investigation, made by the civil as well as the ecclesiastical authorities of his times. He wore neither shoes nor cap, and even in winter was clad only in a shirt and a gown. In 1485 he saved the town of Sarnen from a conflagration by his prayers and the sign of the cross. God also favoured him with numerous visions and the gift of prophecy. Distinguished persons from nearly every country of Europe came to him for counsel in matters of the utmost importance. At first he lived in a narrow hut, which he himself had built with branches and leaves, and came daily to Mass either at Sarscha or at Kerns. Early in 1469 the civil authorities built a cell and a chapel for him, and on 29 April of the same year the chapel was dedicated by the vicar-general of Constance, Thomas, Bishop of Ascalon. In 1479 a chaplain was put in charge of the chapel, and thenceforth Nicholas always remained in the Ranft. When in 1490 delegates of the Swiss confederates assembled at Stans to settle their differences, and civil war seemed inevitable, Henry V, Emperor, the pastor of Stans, hastened to Nicholas, begging him to prevent the shedding of blood. The priest returned to his negotiations with the hermit's counsellors and propositions, and civil war was averted. Nicholas was beatified by Pope Clement IX in 1669. Numerous pilgrims visit the chapel near the church of Sarscha, where his relics are preserved.

Nicholas of Gorran (or Gourain), medieval preacher, and scriptural commentator; b. in 1232 at Gorran, France; d. about 1295. He entered the Dominican Order in the convent of his native town and became one of its most illustrious alumni. His talents excited him out for special educational opportunities, and he was sent accordingly to the famous convent of St. James in Paris. At this convent he subsequently served several terms as prior. His piety and sound judgment attracted the attention of Philip IV of France, whom he served in the double capacity of confessor and advisor. In most of his ecumenical studies he does not seem to have excelled notably; but in preaching and in the interpretation of the Scriptures he was unsurpassed by any of his contemporaries. His scriptural writings treat all of the books of the Old and the New Testament, and possess more than ordinary merit. Indeed, in such high esteem were they held by the doctors of the University of Paris that the latter were wont to designate their au-
Nicholas of Lyra, exegete, b. at Lyons in Normandy, 1270; d. at Paris, 1340. The report that he was of Jewish descent dates only from the fifteenth century. He took the Franciscan habit at Verneuil, studied theology, received the doctor's degree in Paris and was appointed professor at the Sorbonne. In the famous controversy on the Beatific Vision he took sides with the professors against John XXII. He laboured very successfully, both in preaching and writing, for the conversion of the Jews. He is the author of numerous theological works, some of which are yet unpublished. It was to exasperate that Nicholas of Lyra devoted his best years. In the second prologue to his monumental work, "Poëtul sinister per tocum in universa S. Scripture", after stating that the literal sense of Sacred Scripture is the foundation of all mystical expositions, and that it alone has demonstrative force, as St. Augustine teaches, he deplores the state of Biblical studies in his time. The literal sense, he avers, is much obscured, owing partly to the carelessness of the copyists, partly to the uninsightfulness of some of the correctors, and partly also to our own translation (the Vulgate), which is not infrequently departures from the original Hebrew. He holds with St. Jerome that the text must be corrected from the Hebrew codices, except of course the prophecies concerning the Divinity of Christ. Another reason for this obscurity, Nicholas goes on to say, is the attachment of scholars to the method of interpretation handed down by others who, though they have said many things well, have yet touched but sparingly on the literal sense, and have so multiplied the mystical senses as nearly to intercept and choke it. Moreover, the text has been distorted by a multiplicity of arbitrary divisions and concordances. Hereupon he declares his intention of insisting, in the present work, upon the literal sense and of interspersing only a few mystical interpretations. Nicholas utilised all available sources, fully mastered the Hebrew and Greek languages, and the valuable commentaries of the Jewish exegetes, especially of the celebrated Talmudist Rashi. The "Pugio Fidei" of Raymond Martini and the commentaries of St. Thomas Aquinas were laid unreserve distribution. His exposition is lucid and concise; his observations are judicious and sound, and always original. The "Poëtul sinister" soon became the favourite manual of exegesis. It was the first Biblical commentary printed. The solid learning of Nicholas commanded the respect of both Jews and Christians.

Nicholas of Lyra owes much to Nicholas of Lyra, but how widely the principles of Nicholas differed essentially from Luther's views is best seen from Nicholas's own words: "... I protest that I do not intend to assert or determine anything that has not been manifestly determined by Sacred Scripture or by the authority of the Church... Therefore I submit all I have said or shall say to the correction of Holy Church, and of all learned men..." (Prol. secund. in Postillas, ed. 1493). Nicholas taught no new doctrine. The early Fathers and the great schoolmen had repeatedly laid down the same sound exegetical principles, but, owing to adverse tendencies of the their efforts had partly failed. Nicholas carried through these principles effectively, and in this lies his chief merit—one which ranks him among the foremost exegetes of all times.

Nicholas of Myra (or of Baris), Saint, Bishop of Myra in Lycia, d. 6 December, 345 or 352. Though Nicholas of Osimo (Auximanius), celebrated preacher and author, b. at Osimo, Italy, in the second half of the fourteenth century; d. at Rome, 1435. After having studied law, and taken the degree of doctor at Bologna, he joined the Friars Minor of the Observants in the convent of San Paolo Conspiacus for zeal, learning, and preaching, as companion of St. James of the Marches in Bosnia, and as Vicar-Provincial of Apulia (1389). Nicholas greatly contributed to the University of the Observants for whom (1440) he obtained complete independence from the Conventuals, a privilege shortly after revoked according to the desire of St. Bernardine. He was also appointed Visitator and afterwards Superior, of the Holy Land, but many difficulties seem to have hindered him from the discharge of these offices. Nicholas wrote both in Latin and Italian a number of treatises on moral theology, the spiritual life, and on the Rule of St. Francis. We mention the following: (1) "Summa Magistriatiss. seu Psiamellae", a revised and increased edition of the "Summa" of Bartholomew of San Concordio (or of Pisa), O.P., completed at Milan, 1444, with many editions before the end of the fifteenth century; (2) "Summulae,"Opera gent. 1747; Milan, 1479; Reutlingen, 1483; Nuremberg, 1494. (2) "Quadriga Spiritual"se, in Italian, treats in a popular way what the author considers the four principal means of salvation, viz., fasting, good works, confession, and prayer. These are like the four wheels of a chariot, whence the name. The work was printed at Jesi, 1475, and under the name of St. Bernardine of Siena in 1494.

Nicholas of Strasburg, mystic, flourished early in the fourteenth century. Educated at Paris, he was later on lector at the Dominican convent, Cologne. Appointed by John XXII, he was, on the appointment of the German Dominican province, where great discord prevailed. Relying on two papal briefs dated 1 August, 1325, it appears that the sole commission received from the pontiff was to teach the confession in its head and members, and to act as visitor to the sisters. Nicholas, however, assumed the office of inquisitor as well, and closed a process already begun by Archbishop Heinrich (Cologne) against Master Eckhart, O.P., for his teachings on mysticism, in favour of the latter (1326). In January, 1327, the archbishop renewed the cause and arraigned Nicholas as a patron of his confresseur's errors. Almost simultaneously, Hermann von Höchst, a discontented religious on whom Nicholas had imposed a well-merited penalty, took revenge by having him excommunicated. Nicholas, however, was soon released from this sentence by Pope John, that he might appear at the general chapter of his order convened at Perpignan, May 31, 1327. He is last heard of after the settlement of the process against Eckhart as vicar of the German Dominicans, 1329. Thirteen extant sermons show him to have been of a rather practical turn of mind.

Having realized the inherent necessity of solid piety being based upon the principles of sound theology, he urges in clear, pregnant, and forcible style the sacred importance of good works, penitential practices and indulgences, confession and the Holy Eucharist. Only by the use of these means can the love of God be well-regulated and that perfect conversion of the heart attained which is indispensable for a complete remission of guilt. Built up on so firm a groundwork, there is nothing to cause but much to commend in his allegorical interpretations of Sacred Scripture, which are altogether consistent with his fondness for parable and animated illustration. "De Adventu Christi," formerly attributed to Nicholas, came originally from the pen of John of Paris.

of Gorkum was taken by the Watergeuzen, the heretics detained the priests and religious, and confined them in a dark and foul dungeon. (See GORKUM, THE MARTYRS OF.) During the first night the Calvinists vented their rage particularly against Nicholas. Tying about his neck the cord which girded his loins, they first suspended him from a beam and then let him fall heavily to the ground. This torture was prolonged till the cord broke, and he was lying lifeless, fell to the floor. They then applied a burning torch to his ears, forehead, and chin, and forced open his mouth to burn his tongue and palate, either to find out whether he was still alive or in order to torture him. Meanwhile, the two brothers of Nicholas were busy taking steps to obtain the deliverance of the captives. This was promised them only on condition that the prisoners would renounce the authority of the pope, and, as nothing could make Nicholas and his companions waver in their faith, they were taken to Brie, where they all gained the crown of martyrdom. Nicholas and his companions were beatified by Clement X, 24 November, 1675, and canonized by Pius IX, 29 June, 1867.

NICHOLAS (or NICOLLS), GEORGE, VENERABLE, ENGLISH MARTYR, b. at Oxford about 1550; executed at Oxford, 19 October, 1589. He entered Brasenose College in 1564 or 1565, and was readmitted 20 August, 1567, and supplicated for his B.A. degree in 1570–1. He subsequently became a lawyer and practised at St. Paul's Church, London. He arrived at Reims with Thomas Pilchard (q.v.), 20 Nov., 1581; but went on to Rome, whence he returned 21 July, 1582. Ordained subdeacon and deacon at Laon (probably by Bishop Valentine Douglas, O.S.B.) in April, 1583, and priest at Reims (by Cardinal Archbishop Louis de Guise) 24 Sept., he was sent on the mission the same year. Having converted many, notably a convicted highwayman in Oxford Castle, he was arrested at the Catherine Wheel Inn, opposite the east end of St. Mary Magdalen's Church, Oxford, together with Humphrey Priched, a Welsh servant at the inn, and Thomas Belsin (q.v.); and Richard Yaxley. This last was a son (probably the third, certainly not the sixth) of William Yaxley of Boston, Lincolnshire, by Rose, daughter of John Langton of Northome. Arriving at Reims 29 August, 1582, he received the tonsure and minor order 20 Sept., 1583, and the subdiaconate 5 or 6 April, 1585, from the cardinal archbishop. Probably the same hand conferred the deaconate on 20 April. The priesthood was conferred at Reims by Louis de Brezé, Bishop of Meaux, 21 Sept., 1585. Yaxley left Reims for England 28 January, 1583–4. All four prisoners were sent from Oxford to the Bridewell prison in London, where the two priests were hanged up for five hours to make them betray their hosts, but without avail. Yaxley was sent to the Tower as a close prisoner 25 May, 1589, and appears to have been racked frequently. Belsin was sent to the Tower on 20 July, and another two remained in Bridewell. Nicholas being put into "a deep dungeon full of venomous vermin". On 30 June all four were ordered back to Oxford to take their trial. All were condemned, the priests for treason, the laymen for felony. Nicholas suffered first, then Yaxley, then Belsin, and last Prichard. The priests' heads were set up on the castle, and their quarters on the four city gates.

Nicholson, Francis, a controversial writer; b. at Manchestor (baptized 27 Oct.) d. at Lisbon, 13 Aug. 1731. The son of Henry or Thomas Nicholson, a Manchester citizen, when sixteen he entered University College, Oxford, as a servitor, and took his degrees as Bachelor of Arts (18 June, 1669) and Master of Arts (4 April, 1673). Ordained an Anglican clergyman, he officiated, first about Oxford, afterwards near Canterbury, where he gained some success in reconciling Nonconformists to the Church of England. A sermon preached at St. Mary’s, Oxford, on 20 June, 1680, led to his being charged with unorthodox doctrine and the fact that he had been a pupil of Obediah Walker caused him to be suspected of Catholic tendencies. The actual date of his reception into the Church is unknown, but during the reign of James II (1685–88) he was a professor Cologne and busied himself in the king’s interests. At this time he wrote the appendix on the doctrine of the Church of England concerning the Real Presence, and the “Vindication of two recent discourses” on the same subject, added to Abraham Woodhead’s “Compendious Discourse on the Eucharist”, published in 1688. After the revolution he joined the Catholic master at Nieuport in Flanders, but his health was unequal to this austere life, and in 1692 he returned to England. There he entered the service of the Queen Dowager, Catharine of Braganza, whom he accompanied back to Portugal. For some years he resided at the Portuguese Court and then retired to an estate which he had bought at Pera, half a league south of the Tagus, and not, as the writer in the “Dictionary of National Biography” oddly asserted, the “suburb of Constantinople”. He spent a considerable period there in devotion and study, until reaching his seventieth year he made over all his real and personal property to the English College at Lisbon, subject to the discharge of his debts, the provision of board and lodging for the remainder of his life, and a small annuity. Three years before his death at the college he sent back to the Catholic antiquary, Dr. Cuthbert Constable, all the surviving MSS. of Abraham Woodhead, which had passed into his hands as executor of Obediah Walker. With him also he sent his MS. life of Constable, published with additions in his edition of that author’s “Third Part of a Brief Account of Church Government”.

Nicodemus, a prominent Jew of the time of Christ, mentioned only in the Fourth Gospel. The name is of Greek origin, but at that epoch such names were occasionally borrowed by the Jews, and according to Josephus (Ant. of the Jews, XIV, iv, 2) Nicodemus was the name of one of the ambassadors sent by Aristobulus to Pompey. A Hebrew form of the name (נוכדם) is found in the Talmud. Nicodemus was a Pharisee, and in his capacity of sanhedrith (John, vii, 50) was a leader of the Jews. Christ, in the interview when Nicodemus came to him by night, called him a master in Israel. Judging from John, xix, 39, Nicodemus must have been a man of means, and it is probable that he wielded a certain influence in the Sanhedrim. Some writers conjecture from John, xvi, 15, that Nicodemus was “the master to whom John is old”, that he was already advanced in years, but the words are too general to warrant such a conclusion. He appears in this interview as a learned and intelligent man, but timid and not easily initiated into the mysteries of the new faith. He must appear (John, vii, 50, 51) in the Sanhedrin offering a word in defence of the accused Galilean; and we may infer from this passage that he embraced the Messiah as it was fully made known to him. He is mentioned finally in John, xix, 39, where he is shown co-operating with Joseph of Arimathea in the embalming and burial of Jesus. His name occurs later in some of the apocryphal writings, e. g. in the “Acts of Pilate”, a heterogeneous document which in the sixteenth century was published under the title “Evangelium Nicodemi” (Gospel of Nicodemus). The time of his death is unknown. The Roman Martyrology commemorates the finding of his relics, together with those of Sts. Stephen, Gamaliel, and Abibo, on 3 August.

Nicolaus, Jean, celebrated Dominican theologian and controversialist, b. in 1594 at Moussay in the Diocese of Verdun, France; d. 7 May, 1673, at Paris. Entering the order at the age of twelve, he made his religious profession in 1612, studied philosophy and theology in the convent of St. James at Paris, obtained (1632) the doctorate in theology at the Sorbonne, and taught there branches with distinction in various houses of the order. He was highly respected for his strict observance of the rule, prudence, rare erudition, and power of penetration. Besides Latin and Greek he was conversant with Italian, Spanish, and Hebrew. He was a member of the commission appointed to examine the works and teachings of the Jansenists and to prevent the further dissemination of their doctrine in the Sorbonne. In the disputes on grace between the Thomists and Jansenists, which the teaching of Jansenius revived, he adhered strictly to the Thomist doctrine. His numerous works fall into three classes: (a) new editions of older theologians which he supplied with commentaries and explanatory notes; (b) his own theological works; (c) his poetical and political writings. The most important of the first class are “Raineri de Pisa [1351] ord. Fr. Prad. Pantheologia sive universae theologica ordine alphabeticis per varios titulos distribuita” (Lyons, 1670); to each of the three volumes of this work he added a dissertation against the Jansenists; “S. Thomae Aq. Expositio continuas super quattuor evangelistas” (Lyons, 1670); “Commentarius posterior super librum sententiarum P. Lombardi” (Lyons, 1659); “Commentarius posterior super librum sententiarum” (Lyons, 1660); “S. Thomae Aq. questiones quodlibetales” (Lyons, 1660); “S. Thomae Aq. Summa theologica innumeris Patrum. Conciliorum, scripturarum ac decretorum testimoniorum ad materias controversiarum vel ad moralem disciplinam pertinentibus illustrata” (Lyons, 1663); “S. Thomae Aq. explanatio in omnes d. Pauli epistolae commentaria” (Lyons, 1689). His important theological works are: “Judicium seu censorium sufragium de propositione Ant. Arnoldi sorbonicis doctoris et socii ad questionem juris pertinentiam” (Paris, 1556); “These theologiae de gratia seu theses molisticiae thomisticae nota expuncta” (Paris, 1656); “Apologia naturae et gratiae” (Bordeaux, 1656). Against Launoy, the champion of the “Gallican Liberties”, he wrote “De infantio Christiani et Judaei abestinens vero ac legitimo ritu” (Paris, 1667); “De Concilio plenario, quod contra Donatistas baptismi questionem ex Augustini sensu definitit” (Paris, 1667); “De plenarii Concili et baptismalibus horticionibus. Assertio et illustratio posteriori Anto. firmans” (Paris, 1668); “De baptismo antiquo usu ab Ecoleio instituto, dissertatio” (Paris, 1668); “De Constantian baptismi, ubi, quando et a quis fuerit usus, dissertationes” (Paris, 1668). The purpose of his poetical and political Nicolaites seems to have been to extol the dignity and glory of France and her kings. Thus, he delivered in Rome in 1628 a panegyric in honour of the victory of Louis XIII and La Rochefoucauld in 1610; composed a poem in honour of the son of Louis XIV. He was highly esteemed at the royal court and received a pension of 600 francs. He was buried in the chapel of the convent of St. James in Paris, and a marble stone beside the tomb bears a long inscription recounting his virtues, his learning, and his services to his country. JOSEPH SCHROEDER.

Nicolaites (Nicolaitanes), a sect mentioned in the Apocalypse (ii, 6, 15) as existing in Ephesus, Pergamus, and other cities of Asia Minor, about the character and existence of which there is little certainty. Irenaeus (Adv. Hær., I, xvi, 3; III, xi, 1) discusses them but adds nothing to the Apocalypse except that "they lead lives of unrestrained indulgence". Tertullian refers to them, but apparently knows only what is found in St. John (De Præscript. xxxiii; Adv. Marc., I, xxix; De Pud., xxvii). Hippolytus based his narrative on Irenaeus, though he states that the description of Nicholas was the author of the heresy and the sect (Philos., VII, xxvi). Clement of Alexandria (Strom., III, iv) exonerates Nicholas, and attributes the origin of the promiscuity, which the sect claimed to have derived from him, to a malicious distortion of words harmless in themselves. With the exception of the statement in Eusebius (H. E., III, xxix) that the sect was short-lived, none of the references in Ephesians, Theodoret etc. deserve mention, as they are taken from Irenaeus. The common statement, that the Nicolaites held the antinomian heresy of Corinth, has not been proved. Another opinion, favoured by a number of authors, is that, because of the allegorical character of the Apocalypse, the reference to the Nicolaites is merely a symbolic manner of reference, based on the identical meaning of the names, to the Philistines or Balsames (Apoc., ii, 14) who are mentioned just before them as professing the same doctrines.

Nicolas, Armea, popularly known as "La bonne Armelle", a saintly French serving-maid held in special veneration among the people, though not then canonized by the Church, b. at Campenac in Brittany, 9 September, 1606, of poor peasants, George Nicolas and Francisca Neant; d. 24 October, 1671. Her early years were spent in the pious, simple life of the hard-working country folk. When she was twenty-two years of age her parents wished her to marry, but she chose rather to enter service in the neighbouring town of Ploermel, where she found more opportunity for her pious works and for satisfying her spiritual needs. After a few years she went to the larger town of Vannes, where she served in several families, and for a year and a half was porter at the Ursuline monastery. She here formed a special friendship with a certain sister, Jeanne de la Nativité, to whom she told from time to time many details of her spiritual life, and who noted down these communications, and afterwards wrote the life of Armelle, who could herself neither read nor write. Even the lowly work at the convent did not satisfy her craving for toil and humiliation, and she returned to one of her former employers, where she remained to the end of her life. To her severe trials and her penance she owed many works of penance and was rewarded by the growth of her inner life and her intimate union with God. During the last years of her life a broken leg caused her great suffering, patiently borne. Many recommended themselves to her prayers and her death-bed was surrounded by a great number of persons who held her in special veneration. Her heart was preserved in the Ursuline church and she was buried in the church of the Ursulines. Near her grave was erected a tablet to "La bonne Armelle"; her tomb is a place of pilgrimage. Armella has been claimed, but without good grounds, as an exponent of Quietism (q. v.). If some of her expressions seemed tinged with Quietist thought, it is because the controversy which cleared and defined many notions concerning Quietism has yet to arise. On the other hand her simple, laborious life and practical piety make any such aberrations very unlikely.

EDWARD F. GARESCHÉ.

Nicolas, Auguste, French apologist, b. at Bordeaux, 6 Jan., 1807; d. at Versailles 18 Jan., 1888. He first studied law, was admitted an advocate, and entered the ministry. From 1841-49 he was justice of the peace at Bordeaux; as early as 1842 he began the publication of his apologetical writings which soon made his name known among Catholics. When in 1849 M. de Failly began public worship he summoned Nicolas to assist him as head of the department for the administration of the temporal interests of ecclesiastical districts. He held this office until 1854 when he became general director of the libraries. In 1850 he was appointed judge of the tribunal of the Seine and finally councillor at the Paris court of appeals. Nicolas employed his leisure and later his retirement to write works in defence of Christianity taken as a whole or in its most important dogmas. He showed his accurate conception of apologetics by adapting them to the dispositions and the needs of the minds of his time, but he lived in a period where Traditionalism still dominated many French Catholics, and this is reflected in his works. He aimed no doubt at defending religion by means of philosophy, good sense, and arguments from authority; but he also often appeals to the traditions and the groping moral sense of mankind at large. The testimonies, however, which he cites, are often apophasial, and frequently also he interprets them uncritically and ascribes to them a meaning or a scope which they do not possess. Besides, his apologetics speedily grew out-of-date when ecclesiastical and critical studies were revived in France and elsewhere. His writings also met sometimes the layman lacking in the learning and precision of the theologian, and some of his books were in danger of being placed on the Index. Some bishops, however, among them Cardinals Dupanloup and Pie, intervened in his behalf and certified to the uprightness of his intentions. Otherwise the author addressed himself to the general public and especially to the middle classes which were still penetrated with Voltairean incredulity, and he succeeded in reaching them. His books were very successful in France and some of them even in Germany, where they were translated. Among his works may be mentioned: "Etudes philosophiques et le christianisme" (Paris, 1841-45), a philosophical apology for the chief Christian dogmas, which reached a twenty-sixth edition before the death of the author; "La Vierge Marie et le plan divin, nouvelles études philosophiques sur le christianisme" (4 vols., Paris, 1852, 1853, 1861), in which is explained the role of the Blessed Virgin in the plan of Redemption, and which was translated into German, and reached the eighth edition during the author's lifetime; "Du prophétisme et des hérésies dans leur rapport avec le socialisme" (Paris, 1852, 2 vols., 8 editions); "L'art de croire, ou préparation philosophique au christianisme" (Paris, 1866-67), translated into German; "La Divinité de Jésus-Christ, démonstration nouvelle (1864); "Jésus Christ introduction à l'Évangile étudié et médité à l'usage des temps nouveaux" (Paris, 1875). As semi-religious and semi-political may be mentioned: "La Monarchie et la question du drapeau" (Paris, 1873); "La Révolution et l'ordre théodose" (Paris, 1874); "L'État contre Dieu" (Paris, 1879); "Rome et la Papauté" (Paris, 1883); and finally the works in historical-philosophical vein: "Étude sur Main de Biran (Paris, 1886); "Etude sur l'Église de Guerre" (Paris, 1883); "Mémoires d'un père sur la vie et la mort de son fils" (Paris, 1869); "Étude historique et critique sur le Père Lacadore" (Toulouse, 1886).

ANTOINE DÉGERT.

NICOLAUS GERMANUS (often called "Donis" from misapprehension of the title "Donum" or "Donus" an abbreviated form of "Dominus"), a fifteenth-century cartographer, place of birth, and date of birth and death unknown. The first allusion to him of authentic date is an injunction of Durandus d'Este (15 March, 1466) to his referendary and privy counselor, Ludovico Casella, at Ferrara, to have the "Cosmographia" of Donicolò thoroughly examined and then determined the compasses for itself. The duke, on the third day of the same month, called upon his treasurers for 100 florins in gold "as a mark of his appreciation to Donus Nicolaus Germanus for his excellent book entitled "Cosmographia"." On 8 April, 1466, the same duke paid the thirty-flannel florins to the Rev. Nicolaus, who "in addition to that excellent Cosmographia" (ultra illud excellens cosmographica opus) had dedicated to the duke a calendar made to cover thirty years to commemorate St. Vincentius and St. Thomas, devoting part of his time to teaching in the schools of Port-Royal. In 1469 he received the degree of Bachelor of Theology, and then withdrew to Port-Royal des Champs, where he fell in with the Janizaries, leaders, especially from the Moslem world. He was found in him a willing ally. He returned to Paris in 1654 under the assumed name of M. de Rosy. Four years later, during a tour in Germany, he translated Pascual's "Provinciales" into Latin, with notes of his own and publishing the whole as the work of William Wondrec. In 1676 he sought admission to Holy orders, but was refused by the Bishop of Chartres and never got beyond tonsure. A leta which he wrote (1677) to Innocent XI in favour of the Bishops of Saint-Pone and Arns, involved him in difficulties that obliged him to quit the capital. In 1679 he went to Belgium and lived for a time with Arnauld in Brussels, Liège, and other cities. About 1683 de Harlay, Archbishop of Paris, to whom he had sent a sort of retratization, authorized Nicholus to return to Chartres, then to Paris. Here he took part in two celebrated controversies in which he upheld Bossuet's views, the other relating to monastic studies in which he sided with Mabillon against the Abdé de Rançon. His last years were saddened by painful infirmities and his death came after a series of apoplectic attacks.

Pierre Nicole was a distinguished writer and a vigorous controversialist and, together with Pascual, contributed much to the formation of French prose. As a controversialist, he too frequently placed his talent at the service of a sect; however, many are of the opinion that he did not wholly share the errors of the majority of the Jansenists. At any rate, we generally find in him only a mitigated expression of those errors clothed in great reserve. On the other hand, he started the resistance fund known as "la bateau Perrette" (See Jansenism). Nicerson (Mémoires, XXIX, Paris, 1783) enumerates no less than eighty-eight of his works, several of which were, however, very short. The principal works of Nicole relating either to Protestantism or Jansenism are: "Les imaginaires et les visions" or "Lettre à l'imagination" and, more particularly, of that of the Jansenists (Liège, 1667); "La perpétuité de la foi catholique touchant l'Eucharistie", published under Arnaud's name, but the first three volumes of which (Paris, 1686-87) are by the fourth and fifth (Paris, 1711-13) by the Abbé Renuaudot; "Précédés légitimes contre les Calvinistes" (Paris, 1671); "La défense de l'Église" (Cologne, 1689), being a reply to the "Défense de la Réformation" written by the minister, Claude, against the "Préjugés légitimes"; "Essai de morale" (Paris, 1671-78); "Les prétendus Réformés convaincus de schisme" (Mortefontaine, 1684); "De l'unité de l'Église" (Paris, 1690); "Réfutation du nouveau système de M. Jurieu" (Paris, 1687), a condensed and decisive criticism of the theory of the "fundamental articles"; "Réfutation des principales erreurs des Quisquistes" (Paris, 1688); "Instructions théologiques et morales sur les sacrements" (Paris, 1706); "Sur le Symbole" (Paris, 1706), "sur l'Oraison dominicale, la Salutation angélique, la Sainte Messe et les autres prières de l'Église" (Paris, 1706); "sur le premier commandement du Mémolus" (Paris, 1709); "Traité de la grâce générale" (Paris, 1715), containing all that Nicole had written at different times on grace; "Traité de l'usage" (Paris, 1720).

Nicole, Diocese of (Nicoleta), in the Province of Quebec, Canada, suffragan of Quebec. It comprises the counties of Nicole, Yannake, Arthabaska, Drummond, and a small part of Shefford and Bajet. The see takes its name from the town of Nicole (populated in 1615), situated on the south bank of the St. Lawrence, opposite Trois-Rivières.

It was erected into a bishopric on 11 July, 1885, by separation from the Diocese of Trois-Rivières, the first occupant of the see being Mgr Elphège Gravel. He was born on 12 October, 1838, at Saint-Antoine-de-Richelieu, Quebec; consecrated at Rome on 2 August, 1855, and died, 28 January, 1904. His successor, Mgr Joseph-Perron, the present occupant of the see, was born at St-David, Quebec, on 10 January, 1857; educated at the seminary of Nicole and the Canadian College, Rome; ordained, 29 June, 1882. Having ministered two years in the cathedral of St. Hyacinthe and taught for many years in the seminary of Nicole, first as professor of literature, and then of theology, he was named coadjutor to Mgr Gravel and consecrated titular Bishop of Tubuna, 27 December, 1909; and succeeded as Bishop of Nicole, 28 January, 1904. The seminary of Nicole was founded in October, 1803, and affiliated to the Laval University of Quebec, in 1835; it contains over 320 students, a grand seminary, likewise affiliated to the University of Laval; was established at Nicole, 22 February, 1908.

The religious in the diocese are as follows: Sœurs de l'Assomption de la Sainte-Vierge, teachers, founded at St-Grégoire (Nicole) in 1853, have eighteen houses in the diocese; Sœurs Grises (de Nicole), hospitaliers, three houses; Congrégation de Notre-Dame (de Montréal), teachers, at Arthabaska, and Victoriaville; Sœurs de la Providence de Bienheureuse Vierge Marie, teachers, at St-David and Drummondville; Sœurs Grises de la Croix (de Ottawa), teachers and nurses, with academy and school of housekeeping at St-François-Xavier, at St-François, and at Valcourt (Abenaki Indian village); Religieuses hospitalières de St-Joseph (de Montreal), hospitaliers, at Arthabaska; Sœurs du Précieux-Sang, and Sœurs de la Sainte-Famille at Nicole. The Frères des Chrétiens have schools at Nicole, Arthabaska, La Baie, and St-Grégoire; the Frères de la Charité are at Drummondville; and the Frères du Sacré-Cœur teach at Arthabaska, and NICOMEDES, Saint, martyr of unknown era, whose feast is observed 15 September. The Roman Martyrology and the historical Martyrologies of Bede and his imitators place the feast on this date. The Gregorian Sacramentary contains under the same date the orations for his Mass. The name does not appear in the three oldest and most important MSS. of the "Martyrologium Hieronymianum," but was inserted in later recensions ("Martyrologium Hieronymianum," ed. De Rossi-Duchesne, in Acta SS., Nov., II, 121). The saint is without doubt a martyr of the Roman Church. He was buried in a catacomb on the Via Nomentana near the gate of that name. Three seventh century Itineraries make explicit reference to his grave, and Pope Adrian I restored the church built over it (De Rossi, "Roma Sotterranea," I, 173-79). A titular church of Rome, mentioned in the fifth century, was dedicated to him (titulus S. Nicomedis). Nothing is known of the circumstances of his death. The legend of the martyrdom of Sta. Nerea and Achilles introduces him as a presbyter and places his death at the end of the first century. Other recensions of the martyrdom of St. Nicomedes ascribe the sentence of death to the Emperor Maximiianus (beginning of the fourth century).

Nicomedia, titular see of Bithynia Prima, founded by King Zipetes. About 264 a. c. his son Nicodemos dedicated the city anew, gave it his name, made it his capital, and adorned it with magnificent monuments. At his court the vanquished Hannibal sought refuge. When Bithynia became a Roman province Nicomedia remained its capital. Pliny the Younger mentions, in his letters to Trajan, several public edifices of the city—a senate house, an aqueduct which he had built, a forum, the temple of Cybele, etc. He also proposed to join the Black Sea with the Sea of Marmora by a canal which should follow the river Sangarius and empty the waters of the Lake of Sabandjik into the Gulf of Acastus. A fire then almost destroyed the town. From Nicomedia, perhaps, he wrote to Trajan his famous letter concerning the Christians. Under Marcus Aurelius, Dionysius, Bishop of Corinth, addressed a letter to his community warning them against the Marcionites (Eusebius; "Hist. Eccl.", IV, xxiii). Bishop Evxenides, who opposed the sect of the Ophites (P. L., IIII, 592), seems to have lived at the same time. Nicomedia was the favourite residence of Dioecletian, who built there his hippodrome, a mint, and an arsenal. In 303 the edict of the tenth persecution caused rivers of blood to flow through the empire, especially in Nicomedia, where the Bishop Anthimus and about four thousand Christians were martyred. The city was then half Christian, the palace itself being filled with them. In 303, in the vast plain east of Nicomedia, Dioecletian renounced the empire in favour of Galerius. In 311 the Emperor Gallus, a priest of Antioch, delivered a discourse in the presence of the judge before he was executed. Other martyrs of the city are numbered by hundreds. Nicomedia suffered greatly during a devastating invasion from an invasion of the Goths and from an earthquake (24 Aug., 365), which overthrew all the public and private monuments; fire completed the catastrophe. The city was rebuilt, on a smaller scale. In the reign of Justinian new public buildings were erected, which were destroyed in the following century by the Shah Chosroes. Pope Constantine I visited the city in 711. In 1073 John Comnenus was there proclaimed emperor and shortly afterward was compelled to abdicate. In 1298 it was captured by the Sultan Orkhan, who restored its ramparts, parts of which are still preserved.

Le Quien (Ortia Christi., I, 581-98) has drawn up a list of fifty metropolitan, which may easily be completed, for Nicomedia has never ceased to be a metropolitan see. Some Latin archbishops are also mentioned by Le Quien (III, 1017) and by Eubel (Hierarchia Catholica medii evi, I, 381). As early as the eighth century the metropolitan See of Nicomedia had eight suffragan sees which disappeared by degrees. Among its bishops, apart from those already mentioned, were: the three Arians, Eusebius, Eudoxius, and Demophilus, who exchanged their see for that of Constantinople; St. Theophylactus, martyred by the Iconoclasts in the ninth century; George, a great preacher and a friend of Photius; Philotheus Bryennoius, the present titular, who discovered and published Σδριν του οικησιου. To-day Nicomedia is called Ismid, the chief town of a sanjak directly dependent on Constantinople. It has about 25,000 inhabitants, who are very poor, for the German von Haidar Pacha has completely ruined its commerce. Since 1891 the Augustinians of the Assumption have a mission and school, and the Oblates of the Assumption have a school and a dispensary. The number of Chinese about 250 in the region of the mission, seventy of them living in the city. The Armenian Catholic parish numbers 120.

Nicopisl, a titular see, suffragan of Sebastia, in Armenia Prima. Founded by Pompey after his decisive victory over Mithridates, it was inhabited by veterans of his army and by members of the neighbouring peasantry, and was gradually and gradually filled by beautiful, well-watered plain lying at the base of a thickly-wooded mountain. All the Roman highways intersecting that portion of the country and leading to Comana, Polemonium, Nicaeara, Sebastia, etc., radiated from Nicopolis which, even in the time of Strabo (XII, iii, 28), boasted quite a large population. Given to Polemon by Anthony, in 36 a. d., Nicopolis was governed from a. d. 54, by Aristobulus of Chalcedon and definitively annexed to the Roman Empire by Nero, a. d. 64. It then became the metropolis of Lesser Armenia and the seat of the provincial diet which elected the Armeniarch. Besides the altar of the Augusti, it raised temples to 26 gods. Nicanor, and to Victory. Christianity reached Nicopolis at an early date and, under Liciinus, about 319, forty-five of the city's inhabitants were martyred; the Church venerates them on 10 July. St. Basil (Cassian, XXXII, 968) calls the priests of Nicopolis the sons of conference, martyrs, and their church (P. G., XXXII, 534) the mother of that of Colonia. About 472, St. John the Silent, who had sold his worldly goods, erected a church there to the Blessed Virgin.

In 499 Nicopolis was destroyed by an earthquake, none save the bishop and his two secretaries escaping death (Bull. Acad. de Belgique, 1905, 377). This disaster was irreparable, and although Justinian rebuilt the walls and erected a monastery in memory of the Forty-five Martyrs (Procopius, "De Aedificiis", III, 4), Nicopolis never regained its former splendour. Under Heraclius it was captured by Chosroes the first time ("Ecclesiarch of Heraclius", tr. Macler, p. 62) and then removed was only a mediocre see, a simple see and a suffragan of Sebastia in Lesser Armenia, remaining such at least until the eleventh century, as may be seen from the various "Notitiae episcopatum". To-day the site of ancient Nicopolis is occupied by the Armenian village of Pirkh, which has a population of 200 families and is near the city of Enderes, in the sanjak of Kara-Izmir and the vilayet of Sivas. Notable among the eight bishops mentioned by Le Quien is St. Gregory who, in the eleventh century, resigned his episcopal and retired to Pithiviers in France. The Church venerates him on 14 March.

Nicopolis, Diocese of (Nicopolitana), in Bulgaria. The city of Nicoplis (Thrace or Moeisia), situated at the junction of the Istrus with the Danube, was built by Trajan in commemoration of his victory over the Dacians (Amianus Marcellinus, XXXI, 5; Jornsóns, "De rebus gestis", ed. 21). Ptolemy (III, x, 7) places it in Thrace and Hierocles in Moeisia near the Hemus or Balkans. In the "Ethos" of pseudo-Epiphanius (Gelser, "Ungedruckte Texte der Notitie episcopatum", 238), Nicopolis figures as an autocephalous archbishopric about 640, and then disappears from the episcopal lists, owing to the fact that the country fell into the hands of the Bulgarians. Le Quien (Oriens christianus, I, 1233) has preserved the names of two ancient bishops: Marcellus in 458, and Amantius in 518. A list of the Latin titulars (1584-1413) may be found in Eubel (Hierarchia catholica medii evi, 385). The city is chiefly noted for the defeat of the French and Hungarian armies (26 September, 1396) which made the Turks masters of the Balkan peninsula.
Nicopoli, a titular see and metropolis in ancient Epirus. Augustus founded the city (n. c. 31) on a promontory in the Gulf of Ambracia, in commemoration of his victory over Anthony and Cleopatra at Actium. At Nicopolis the emperor instituted the famous quinquennial Actium games in honour of Apollo. The city was peopled chiefly by settlers from the neighbouring municipia, of which it was the head (Strabo III, xii, 3; VII, vii, 6; X, ii, 2). According to Pliny the Elder (IV, 2) it was a free city. St. Paul intended going there (Tit., iii, 12) and it is possible that even then it numbered some Christians among its population; Origen sojourned there for a while (Origen, "Hist. ccc., VI, 16). Laid waste by the Goths at the beginning of the fifth century (Procopius, "Bell. got.," IV, 22), restored by Justinian (Ibn., "De Edificio," IV, 4), in the sixth century it was still the capital of Epirus (Hieron., "Synecesis" Hiss., ed. Burchardt, 651, 4). The province of ancient Epirus of which Nicopolis was the metropolis, constituted a portion of the western patriarchate, directly subject to the jurisdiction of the pope; but, about 732, Leo the Byzantine incorporated it into the Patriarchate of Constantinople. Of the eleven metropolitans mentioned by Le Quien (Oriens christianus, II, 133-38) the most celebrated was Alecion who, early in the sixth century, opposed the Monophysite policy of Emperor Anastasius. The last known of these bishops was Anastasius, who attended the Ecumenical Council in 787, and soon afterwards, owing to the decadence into which Nicopolis fell, the metropolitan see was transferred to Naupactus which subsequently figured in the Notitiae episcopatuum. Quite extensive ruins of Nicopolis are found three miles to the north of Preveza and are called Palai-Prevesa.

Nicovia, a city of the Province of Catania, in Sicily, situated at a height of about 2800 feet above the level of the sea. In its neighbourhood are salt mines and sulphur springs. The town is believed to stand on the site of the ancient Corto, which was destroyed by the Arabs. It has a fine cathedral, with a magnificent portal and paintings by Velasquez. Santa Maria Maggiore, also, is a beautiful church. The episcopal see was created in 896, prelate being M. Cajetan M. Averna, Nicovia was the birthplace of the Blessed Felix of Nicovia, a Capuchin lay brother. Within the diocese is the ancient city of Trionia, which was an episcopal see from 1087 to 1090. Nicovia is a suffragan of Messina, from the territory of Nicovia was taken; it has 23 parishes, with 60,250 inhabitants, 4 religious houses of men, and 5 of women, and 3 schools for girls.

Nicosia, Titular Archdiocese, in the Province of Cyprus. It is now agreed (Oberhummer, "Aus Cypern" in "Zeitschrift der Gesellschaft für Erdkunde," 1890, 212-14), that Ledra, Leucotheon, Leopolis, Leucosia, Leucipa, Leucopia, and Nicopolis, at least the same episcopal see. Ledra is first mentioned by Sozomenus (H. E., I, 11) in connexion with its bishop, St. Triphylus, who lived under Constantine and whom St. Jerome (De scriptoribus ecclesiasticis) pronounced the most eloquent of his time. Mention is made also of one of his disciples, St. Diomedes, venerated on 28 October. Under the name of Leucosia the city appears in the first time in the sixth century, at the "Synodeum" of Hierocles (ed. Burchardt, 707-8). It was certainly subsequent to the eighth century that Leucosia or Nicovia replaced Constantia as the metropolis of Cyprus, for at the Ecumenical Council of 787 one Constantine signed as Bishop of Constantia; in any case at the conquest of the island in 1191 by Richard Cœur de Lion Nicovia was the capital. At that time Cyprus was sold to the Templars who established themselves in the castle of Nicovia, but not being able to overcome the hostility of the people of the city, massacred the majority of the inhabitants and sold Cyprus to Guy de Lusignan, who founded a dynasty there, of which there were fourteen titulars, and did much towards the prosperity of the capital. Nicovia was then made a Latin metropolitan see with three suffragans, Paphos, Limassol, and Fabriga. The Greeks who had previously the same city as fourteen titulars were obliged to be content with four bishops bearing the same titles as the Latins but residing in different towns. The list of thirty-one Latin archbishops from 1196 to 1502 may be seen in Eubel, "Hierarchia catholica medii aevi," I, 362; II, 224. Quarrels between Greeks and Latins were frequent and prolonged, especially at Nicovia, where the two councils of 1313-60 ended in bloodshed; but in spite of everything the island prospered. There were many beautiful churches in the possession of the Dominicans, Franciscans, Augustinians, Carmelites, Benedictines, and Carthusians. Other churches belonged to the Greeks, Armenians, Jacobites, Maronites, Nestorians etc. In 1480 Cyprus fell under the dominion of Venice and on 9 November, 1570, Nicovia fell into the power of the Turks, who committed atrocious cruelties. Nor was this the last time, for on 5 July, 1821, during the revolt of the Greeks in the Ottoman Empire, they strangled many of the people of Nicovia, among them the four Greek bishops of the island. Since 4 June, 1878, Cyprus has been under the dominion of England. Previously Nicovia was the residence of the Mutasarrif of the sandjak which depended on the vilayet of the Archipelago. Since the Turkish occupation of 1571 Nicovia has been the permanent residence of the Greek archbishop who governs the autonomous church of Cyprus. The city has 13,000 inhabitants. The Franciscans administer the Catholic mission which is dependent on the Latin Patriarchate of Jerusalem and has three priories. The Sisters of St. Joseph have a school for girls.

Nicemerg y Otín, Juan Eusebio, noted theologian and polygraphist, b. of German parents at Madrid, 1595; d. there, 1658. Having studied the classics at the Court, he went to Alcalá for the sciences and from there to Salamanca for canon law, where he entered the Society of Jesus in 1614, much against the wishes of his father who finally obliged him to leave the novitiate of Villagarcia. He remained firm in his resolution and was permitted to return to Madrid to finish his probation. He studied Greek and Hebrew at the Colegio de Huete, arts and theology at Alcalá, and was ordained in 1623, making his profession in 1633. At the Colegio Imperial of Madrid he taught humanities and natural history for seven years, and Sacred Scripture for three. As a director of souls he was much sought, being appointed by royal command confessor to the Duchess of Mantua, granddaughter of Philip II. Remarkable for his exemplary life, he attained the heights of prayer to which he aspired, he was an indefatigable worker, and one of the most prolific writers of his time. Seventy-three printed and eleven manuscript works are attributed to him; of these, twenty-four at least are in Latin. Many of his works are distinguished for their erudition, those in Spanish being characterized according to Capmany, by nobility and purity of diction, terse, well-knit phrases, forcible metaphors, and vivid imagery, certain defects mar his style, at times inelegant and marked by a certain disregard for the rules of grammar and a too pronounced use of antithesis, parenthasism, and other awkward words. Lack of critical faculty often detracts from the learning. The Spanish Academy includes his name in the “Diccionario de Autoridades.” His principal works are: (1) De Aprecio et Estima de la Divina Verbum et Sacro Evangelio (Madrid, 1638), editions of which have been issued at Saragossa, Barcelona, Seville, Majorca, also a second edition of the Madrid edition; it has been translated into Italian, French, Latin, German, Pannonyan, and condensed into English (New York, 1806, 1814); (2) “De la Diferencia entre lo Temporal y Eterno” (Madrid, 1640), of which there are fifty-four Spanish editions, and translations into Latin, Arabic, Italian, French, German, Flemish, and English (1572, 1824, 1834); Portuguese, Mexican, Guaranian, Chiquito, Panayanaya; (3) “Opera Parthenica” (Lyons, 1659), in which he defends the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin, basing it upon new, although not always absolutely reliable, documents; (4) “Historia naturale maxime peregrina Libris XVI, distincta” (Antwerp, 1635); (5) “De la aicione y amor de Jesú...” (Madrid, 1628); five Spanish editions and translations into Latin, Arabic, German, Flemish, French, Italian, Portuguese, and an English translation of the first edition (1649, 1880); one edition of the (sixth) Spanish text, “spirituales y filosóficas” (Madrid, 1651, fol. 3 vols.), and one of (7) “Obras Christianas” (Madrid, 1668, fol. 2 vols.). These books are still extant. It was customary in many of the Spanish churches to read selections from these books every Sunday.

most eminent theologians and preachers of the latter half of the fifteenth century. He was a keen disciple of St. Thomas, zealous for the integrity of his teachings and adhering strictly to the traditions of his school. In his few theological works he limits himself almost entirely to the discussion of abstract questions of logic and psychology. He devoted most of his time to preaching to the Jews. He sought to spread their language and became familiar with their literature at Salamanca and Montpellier by associating with Jewish children and attending the lectures of the rabbis. At Ratisbon, Worms, and Frankfort-on-the-Main he preached in German, Latin, and Hebrew, frequently challenging the rabbis to a disputation. He wrote two anti-Jewish works, one in Latin, "Tractatus contra Perfidos Judaeos" (Eeseling, 1475), which is probably the earliest printed anti-Jewish work, and in which he severely attacked the Jews and the Talmud. The other, written in German, is entitled "Stern des Messias" (Eeseling, 1477). Reuchlin in his "Augenspiegel" declared them absurd. Both works are furnished with appendices giving the Hebrew alphabet in Hebrew and Latin type, rules of grammar and for reading Hebrew, the Desenclave in Hebrew, some Messianic texts from the Old Testament, etc. They are among the earliest specimens of Hebrew printing in Germany, and the first attempt at Hebrew grammar in that country by a Christian scholar. They were afterwards published separately as "Commentarii primarum Hebraicorum elementa" (Aldert, 1704). Peter Teuto, O.P. (Quéstif, I, 855), and Peter Eyestettenus (Eck, Chrysopassus Cent. XXIX) are most probably to be identified with Peter Nigris.

Niger, Upper and Lower, a colony of British East Africa extending from the Gulf of Guinea to Lake Chad (from 4° 30' to 7° N. lat., and from 5° 30' to 8° 30' E. long.), is bounded on the north and west by French Sudan, on the south-west by the English colony of Lagos, on the south by the Atlantic, on the east by German Camerun. It derives its name from the River Niger, flowing through it. The Niger, French from its source in the Guinean Sudan to the frontier of Sierra Leone, enters Nigeria, enters the Niger Inland Sea, and then runs northwards. Above Ilo, receives the Sokoto River at Gomba, and the Benue at Lokodin, the chief tributaries in English territory. Though the establishment of the English dates only from 1879, numerous explorers had long before reconnoitred the river and the neighbouring country. Among the most famous were Mungo Park (1795–1805), Clapperton (1822), Reynolds (1825), Lander, Barth, Mago, and recently the French officers Galliéni, Mizon, Hourst, and Levent. In 1879, on the initiative of Sir George Goldie, the English societies established in the region purchased all the French and foreign trading stations. In 1885, the Niger and in 1885 obtained a royal charter which constituted them the "Royal Company of the Niger". The Royal Company developed rapidly and acquired immense territories, often at the cost of bloodshed. The monopoly of navigation which it claimed to exercise, contrary to the stipulations of the General Act of Berlin, its opposition to the undertakings of France and Germany, its encroachments on neighbouring territories, aroused so much alarm that finally brought about the revocation of its privileges (1 Jan., 1900). It then became a simple commercial company with enormous territorial possessions; the conquered lands, reunited to the old Protectorate of the Niger, organized in 1884, constituted the British colony of Nigeria. France, however, retained two colonies at Badjibo-Arenberg and at Forcados; navigation was free to all.

Politically Nigeria is divided into two provinces, Southern or Lower Nigeria, Northern or Upper Nigeria, separated by the plateau of Ida. Each division is governed by a high commissioner named directly by the Crown. Northern Nigeria with an area of over 123,400 square miles is as yet only partly settled, and has nine constituencies, the ancient capital, Gebha, is now replaced by Wushashi on the Kaduna. The chief cities are Lokodja, Ilo, Yola, Gando, Sokoto, Kano, etc. Kano, situated two hundred miles to the north, is a remarkable city and one of the largest markets of the whole world. For more than a thousand years the metropolis of East Africa, Kano contains about fifty thousand inhabitants, is surrounded by walls built of hardened clay from twenty to thirty ft. high and fifteen miles in circumference. Every year more than two million natives go to Kano to exchange their agricultural products or their merchandise. The chief articles of commerce are camels, cattle, ivory, sugar, ostrich feathers, and kola nuts. Kano is also a great industrial centre, renowned for its hides and its cotton materials; sorghum and many kinds of vegetables and corns are cultivated. The natives are very good workmen, especially in the cultivation of the fields. Although nominally subject to England, some chiefs, or sultans, have remained almost independent, for instance those of Sokoto and Nupe. English money, however, has circulated everywhere and three-penny pieces are very popular. Northern Nigeria has a population of about fifteen million inhabitants, divided into several tribes, each speaking its own tongue, the chief of which are the Yoruba, the Hausa, the Nupe, and the Igbira. English is the official language of the administration.

Constantly pressing to the south, Islam has penetrated as far as the markets of the Lower Niger, and carries on a vigorous proselytism, aided by the representatives of the English Government. Musulman chief and instructors are often appointed for the fethists, but the population is powerful, and English Protestant missions have unsuccessfully endeavoured to gain a foothold. Catholic missionaries explored a portion of these same regions as early as 1853, but only now have they attained permanent establishments. The country is divided into two prefectures Apostolic; that of the Upper Niger is confined to the Society of African Missions of Lyons (1884), and that of the Lower Niger to the Fathers of the Holy Ghost (1899). The first comprises all the territory west of the Niger from Forcados and north of the Benue to Yola. Its limits were only definitively constituted by the decrees of 15 January and 10 May, 1894. The prefect Apostolic resides at Lokodja. The mission is chiefly developed in the more accessible part of Southern Nigeria, where Islam is still almost a stranger. Its chief ports, besides Lokodja, are Assaba, Ila, Ibelele, Ibi, Idu, etc. The twenty missionaries are assisted by the Religious of the Queen of the Apostles (Lyons) in 1910 there were about 1500 Catholics and an equal number of catechumens. The Prefecture Apostolic of the Lower Niger comprises all the country east between the Niger, the Benue, and the western frontier of German Camerun. Less extensive than that of the Upper Niger, its population is much more dense, almost wholly fetishistic, and even cannibal. Towns of five, ten, and twenty thousand inhabitants are not rare; the population is chiefly agricultural, cultivating the banana and the yam. In the delta and on Cross River the palm oil harvest is the object of an active commerce. Several tribes are crowded into these fertile districts; the Ibo, Nri, Munchis, Ibibio, Iban, Ibeno, Efik, Akwa, Aro, etc. Their religion is fetishism, with ridiculous and cruel practices often admitting of human sacrifice, exacted by the ju-ju (a corruption of the native word ekgwu), a fetish which is supposed to contain the spirit of an ancestor; but purer religious elements are found beneath all these superstitions, belief in God, the survival of the soul, distinction between good and evil, etc.

The Mussulmans are located in important centres such as the market of Onitsha. Moreover, wherever the English Government employs Haussa as militiamen, the latter carry on an active propaganda, and where they are a movement towards Islam is discernible. This is the case at Calabar, Lagos, Freetown, and numerous points in the interior and on the coast. English Protestant missions have long since penetrated into this country and have expended, not without results, enormous sums for propaganda. Native churches with pastors and bishops have even been organized on the Niger, constituting what is called the native pastorate. At Calabar the United Presbyterian Church dates from 1846, strongly established throughout the country. In 1855 the Catholic missionaries of Gabon established themselves at Onitsha, the centre of the Ibo country and a city of twenty thousand inhabitants. Several native kings, among them the King of Onitsha, have been converted, numerous schools have been organized, towns and villages everywhere have sent missionaries, including them, for catechists. Until 1903 no establishment could be made at Calabar, the seat of the Government and the most important commercial centre of Southern Nigeria, but once founded the Catholic mission became very popular, adherents came in crowds, the schools were filled to overflowing. There is need of labourers and resources for the immense harvest. The Fathers of the Holy Ghost are seconded in these efforts by the Sisters of St. Joseph of Cluny. The progress of evangelization seems to necessitate in the near future the division of the mission into two prefectures, one of which will have its centre at Onitsha, the other at Calabar.

A. LE ROY.

Nihilism.—The term was first used by Turennev in his novel, "Fathers and Sons" (in "Rусский Вестник", Feb., 1862); a Nihilist is one who bows to no authority and accepts no doctrine, however widespread, that is not supported by proof. The nihilist theory was formulated by Chernyshevskij in his novel "Pest delat'" (What shall be done, 1862-64), which forecasts a new social order constructed on the ruins of the old. But essentially, Nihilism was a reaction against the abuses of Russian absolutism; it originated with the first secret political society in Russia founded by Pestel (1817), and its first effort was the political revolt of the Decembrists (14 Dec., 1825). Nicholas I crushed the uprising, sent its leaders to the scaffold and one hundred and sixteen participants to Siberia. The spread (1830) of certain philosophical doctrines (Hegel, Saint-Simon, Fourier) brought numerous recruits to Nihilism, especially in the universities; and, in many of the cities, societies were organized to combat absolutism and introduce constitutional government.

Theoretical Nihilism.—Its apostles were Alexander Herzen (1812-70) and Michael Bakunin (1814-76), both of noble birth. The former, arrested (1832) as a partisan of liberal ideas, was imprisoned for eight months, deported, pardoned (1840), resided in Moscow till 1847 when he migrated to London and there founded (1857) the weekly periodical, "Kolokol" (Bell), and later "The Golden Star". The "Kolokol" published Russian political secrets and denunciations of the Government; and, printing the police, managed to get into Russia to spread revolutionary ideas. Herzen, inspired by Hegel and Feuerbach, proclaimed the destruction of the existing order; but he did not advo-ate violent measures. Hence his younger followers weared of him; and on the other hand his defense of the Poles during the insurrection of 1863 alienated many of his Russian sympathizers. The "Kolebka" went out of existence in 1868 and Herzen died two years later. Bakunin was extreme in his revolutionary theories. In the first number of "L'Alliance Internationale de la Democratie Socialiste" founded by him in 1869, he openly professed Nihilism for the abolition of marriage, property, and of all social and religious institutions. His advice, given in his "Revolutionary Catechism", was: "Be severe to yourself and severe to others. Suppress the sentiments of relationship, friendship, love, and gratitude. Have only one pleasure, one joy, one reward—the triumph of the revolution. Night and day, have only one thought, the destruction of everything without pity. Be ready to die and ready to kill any one who opposes the triumph of your revolt." Bakunin thus opened the way to nihilistic terrorism.

PROPAGANDA (1867–77).—It began with the formation (1861–62) of secret societies, the members of which devoted their lives and fortunes to the dissemination of revolutionary ideas. Many of these agitators, educated at Zurich, Switzerland, returned to Russia and gave Nihilism the support of an influential minority. Prominent among them were Sergeï N. Něščev, master of a parochial school in St. Petersburg, who was in constant communication with nihilist centers in Germany, and Sergueï G. Tovalin who established thirteen associations in Cernigor. These societies took their names from their founders—"the Malkovcův, Lavristů, Bakunists, etc. They enrolled seminarists, university students, and working classes. Among the working men the propaganda was conducted in part through free schools. The promoters engaged in humble trades as weavers, blacksmiths, and carpenters, and in their shops inculcated nihilist doctrine. The peasantry was reached by writings, speeches, schools, and personal intercourse. Even the nobles shared in this work, e.g., Prince Peter Kraspotkin, who, under the pseudonym of Borodin, held conferences with workingmen. As secondary centres, taverns and shops served as meeting-places, depositories of prohibited books, and, in case of need, as places of refuge. Though without a central organization the movement spread throughout Russia, notably in the region of the Volga and in that of the Donieper where it gained adherents among the Cossacks. The women in particular displayed energy and self-sacrifice in their zeal for the cause. Many of them were high committed acts of imprudence and some belonged to the nobility or higher classes, e.g., Natalia Arnfeld, Barbara Batuškova, Sofia von Hersfeld, Sofia Pevrovajza. They co-operated more especially through the schools.

The propaganda of the press was at first conducted from foreign ports: London, Geneva, Zurich. In this latter city there were two printing-offices, established in 1873, where the students published the works of Bakunin and of Lavrov. The first secret printing-office in Russia, founded at St. Petersburg in 1861, published four numbers of the Velikoruss. At the same time there came to Russia, from London, copies of the "Proclamation to the New Generation" (Kmelodomu pokolstaju), and "Young Russia" (Molodaja Rosija), which was published in the following year. In 1862, another secret printing-office, established at Moscow, published the first number of the "Proclamation to the People" (17 December, 1862), written by Ogarev. In 1862, another secret press at St. Petersburg published revolutionary proclamations for officers of the army; and in 1863, these were published in the same city a few copies of the daily papers, "Sloboda" (Liberty) and "Zemlia i Volja" (The Earth and Liberty); the latter continued to be published in 1878 and 1879, under the editorship, at first, of Marco Natanov, and later of the student, Alexander Mihailov, one of the ablest organizers of Nihilism. In 1866, a student of Kasan, Eptipodn, published two numbers of the "Podpolnoe Slovo" (The Underground Word), followed by the "Sovremennost" (The Contemporary). The "Kolodoma" (The National Interest), which was published (1868–70), to disseminate the ideas of Bakunin. Two numbers of the "Narodnaja Rae-prava" (The Tribunal of Reason) were published in 1870, at St. Petersburg and in Moscow. In 1873, appeared the "Vpered" (Forward!), one of the most esteemed periodicals of Nihilism, having salient socialist tendencies. A volume of it appeared each year. In 1875–76, there was connected with the "Vpered", a small bi-monthly supplement, which was under the direction of Lavrov until 1876, when it passed under the editorship of Smirnov, and went out of existence in the same year. It attacked theological and religious ideas, proclaiming the equality of rights, freedom of association, and justice for the proletariat. At Geneva, in 1875 and 1876, the "Rabotnik" (The Workman) was published, which was edited in the style of the people; the "Nabat" (The Ton) appeared in 1875, directed by Tchaev; the "Narodnaja Volja" (The Will of the People), in 1879, and the "Cernyi Pereidel", in 1890, were published in St. Petersburg. There was no fixed time of publication, and their contents consisted, more especially, of proclamations, letters from revolutionists, and at times, of sentences of the Executive Committees. These printing offices also produced books and pamphlets in Russian translations of the works of Lassalle, Marx, Proudhon, and Büchner. A government stenographer, Myškin, in 1870, established a printing-office, through which several of Lassalle's works were published; while many pamphlets were published by the Zemšša i Volja Committee and by the Free Russian Printing-Office. Some of the pamphlets were published under titles like those of the books for children, for example, "Dečka Egor" (Grandaughter Egor), "Mitiuska", Stories for the Workingmen, and others, in which the exploitation of the people was depicted, and the immunity of capitalists assailed. Again, some publications were printed in popular, as well as in cultured, language; and, in order to allure the peasants, these pamphlets appeared at times, under such titles as "The Satiate and the Hungry", "How Our Country Is No Longer the Same", "The Rose", and many others. But all this propaganda, which required considerable energy and sacrifice, did not produce satisfactory results. Nihilism did not penetrate the masses; its enthusiastic apostles committed acts of imprudence and some brought upon the ferocious reprisals of the Government; the peasants had not faith in the preachings of those teachers, whom, at times, they regarded as government spies, and whom, at times, they denounced. The books and pamphlets that were distributed among the country people often fell into the hands of the činomski (government employees), or of the popes. Very few of these peasants knew how to read. Accordingly, Nihilism had true adherents only among students of the universities and higher schools, and among the middle classes. The peasants and workmen did not understand its ideals of destruction and of social revolution. In 1868 the "Nihilist Terrorism.—Propaganda of ideas was soon followed by violence: 4 April, 1866, Tzar Alexander II narrowly escaped the shot fired by Demetrius Karakov, and in consequence took severe measures (rescript of 23 May, 1866), that included the suppression of the newspapers, the closing of the universities and the press objects of special vigilance. To avoid detection and spying, the nihilists formed a Central Executive Committee whose sentences of death were executed by 'punishers'. Sub-committees of five to ten members were also organized and statutes (12 articles) drawn up. The applicant for admission was required to consecrate his life to the cause, swear fidelity of family and friendship, and observe absolute secrecy. Disobeidi-ence to the head of the association was punishable with death. The Government, in turn, enacted stringent laws against secret societies and brought hundreds before the tribunals. A notorious instance was the trial at St. Petersburg in October, 1877, of 193 persons: 94 were condemned to 20 years of penal servitude. Another sensational trial (April, 1878) was that of Vera Sasaullo, who had attempted to murder General Freyv, chief of police of St. Petersburg. Her acquittal was frantically applauded and she found a refuge in Switzerland. Among the deeds of violence committed by Nihilists may be mentioned the assassination of General Mesenev (4 Aug., 1878) and Prince Krapotkin (1879). These events were followed by new repression of the part of the Government and by numerous executions. The Nihilists, however, continued their work, held a congress at Lipeck in 1879, and (26 Aug.) condemned Alexander II to death. An attempt to wreck the train on which the Tsar was returning to St. Petersburg proved abortive. Another attack on his life was made by Halturin, 5 Feb., 1880. He was slain on 1 March, 1881, by a bomb, thrown by Grishinskij. Six conspirators, among them Sofiia Perovskaia, were tried and executed. On 14 March, the Zemlia i Volja society issued a proclamation inciting the peasants to rise, while the Executive Committee wrote to Alexander III denouncing the abuses of the bureaucracy and demanding political amnesty, national representation, and civil liberty.

The reign of Alexander III was guided by the dictates of a reaction, due in great measure to the counsels of Constantine Polivanov, procurator general of the Holy Synod. And Nihilism, which seemed to reach its apogee in the death of Alexander II, saw its eclipse. Its theories were too radical to gain proselytes among the people. Its assaults were repeated: on 20 March, 1882, General Strelnikov was assassinated at Odessa; and Colonel Sudeckin on the 28th of December, 1883; in 1887, an attempt against the life of the Tsar was unsuccessful; in 1890, a conspiracy against the Tsar was discovered at Paris; but these crimes were the work of the revolution in Russia, rather than of the Nihilists. The crimes that redounded the soil of Russia with blood in constitutional times, and not of the revolution of 1867-68. But the Nihilism, that, as a doctrinal system, proclaimed the destruction of the old Russia, to establish the foundations of a new Russia, may be said to have disappeared; it became fused with Anarchism and Socialism, and therefore, the history of the crimes that were multiplied from 1905 on are a chapter in the history of political upheavals in Russia, and not in the history of Nihilism.

Nihilus, Barthold, convert and controversialist, b. at Holtorf in Hanover, 7 February, 1590 (according to other sources in 1583 or 1589, at Wolpe in Bruns-} wick); d. at Erfurt, 10 May, 1657. He came from a poor Protestant family, obtained his early education at Verden and Goslar, and from 1607 studied philosophy and medicine at the University of Helmstedt, where, on account of his poverty, he was the famulus of Cornelius Martini, professor of philosophy. Having become master of philosophy in 1612, his inclinations then led him to study Protestant theology. Contentions among the professors at Helmstedt made further stay there unpleasant, and when two students of noble family went in 1616 to the University of Jena, he accompanied them as preceptor. Later he became instructor of the young prince of Saxe-Weimar, among whom was the subsequently famous Bernard of Saxe-Weimar. The inability of the Protestant theologians to agree upon vital questions caused him first to doubt and then to renounce Protestantism. He then entered the House of Proselites, and in 1627 provost of the monastery of the Osterzicans at Althaldensleben near Magdeburg, two years later he became abbot of the monastery of the Premonstratensians, from which he was expelled after the battle of Breitenfeld in 1631. He fled to Hildesheim, where he became canon of the church of the Holy Cross, thence to Holland where he came into close relation with Gerhard Johann Vossius. In 1645 Nihilus was called to Münster by the papal nuncio, Fabio Chigi (later Alexander VII), then in Münster attending the Westphalian Peace Congress. A few years later he was induced to come to Mayence by Johann Philipp von Schönborn, Archbishop of Mayence, at whose request he went to Ingolstadt in 1654 to obtain information regarding the West-Priester-Institut of Bartholomew Holzhausen, and to report to the archbishop. Schönborn, in 1655, appointed him his personal agent and tutor of the boys of Saxony and Thuringia, with residence in Erfurt, where he died.

After his conversion Nihilus had sent to the Helmstedt professors, Calixtus and Honejsch, a letter in which he presented his reasons for embracing Catholicism; his chief motive was that the Church needs a living, supreme judge to explain the Bible and to settle disputes and difficulties. Calixtus attacked him first in his lectures and later in his writings, whence originated a bitter controversy between Nihilus and the Helmstedt professors. The most important of Nihilus' numerous writings are: (1) "Ars nova, dicto S. Scriptura unico lucenti e Pontifici plurimos in partibus Lutheranorum, detecta non nihil et suggesta Theologiae Helmstetensibis, Georgio Calixtio praesertim et Conrado Honejse" (Hildesheim, 1633); (2) "Apologia pro arte nova contra contra Nihilismum"; (3) "Hypodigma, quo dilutur nonnulla contra Catholicos disputata, quae in Breviario et veteri catino tracato de analyselo" (Cologne, 1648). Assisted by his friend Leo Allatius (q. v.) he devoted considerable time to researches pertaining to the "Communio" and the "Missa praestantissima of the Greeks, and also took charge of the editing and publishing of several works of Allatius, some of which—as the "De Ecclesie occidentali et orientali perpetua consensione" (Cologne, 1648) and "Symmietsa..." a nun and he entered the Solovetski monastery on the White Sea, according to Orthodox custom, changing his name to Nikon. In accordance also with a common custom he next became a hermit on an island and near by, dependent on the monastery. But a disagreement about the alleged misuse of some alms caused him to break with the Solovetski monks and join the Kojoeskerski community in the same island bourough, of which he became abbot in 1643. Later he made a great impression on the emperor, Alexis, who made him Archimandrite of the Novospaski Laura at Moscow in 1646, and in 1649 Metropolitan of Novgorod. Here he intended to so distinguish himself by his many good works, and succeeded in putting down a dangerous revolt in 1650. Meanwhile he was in constant correspondence with the Tsar, at whose court he spent part of each year. Already during this time he began to prepare for a revision of the Slavonic Bible and Service books. In 1652 the Patriarch of Moscow died and Nikon was appointed his successor.

As head of the Church of Russia Nikon set about many important reforms. One of the first questions that engaged his attention was the reunion of the Ruthenians (Little Russians) with the Orthodox Church. When Poland held Little Russia, the Synod of Brest (1596) had brought about union between its inhabitants and Rome. Under Alexis, however, the tide turned; many Ruthenians arose against Poland and united with Russia. As a result of the Synod of Brest, it was decreed that the Russians were able without much difficulty to undo the work of the Synod of Brest, and to bring the Metropolitan of Kiev with the majority of his clergy back to the Orthodox Church. This increased the extent of the Russian patriarch's jurisdiction. Nikon was able to entitle himself patriarch of Great, Little, and White Russia. During the reign of Alexis, Nikon built the Trinity Lavra of St. Sergius, made after the model of the Anastasia and called "New Jerusalem," is numbered among the famous Laura of Russia.

The chief event of Nikon's reign was the reform of the service books. The Bible and books used in church in Russia are translated from Greek into old Slavonic. But gradually many mistranslations and corruptions of the text had crept in. There were also details of ritual in which the Russian Church had forensen the custom of Constantinople. Nikon's work was to restore all these points to exact conformity with the Greek original. This reform had been discussed before his time. In the sixteenth century the Greeks had reproached the Russians for their alterations, but a Russian synod in 1551 had sanctioned them. In Nikon's time there was more intercourse with Greeks than ever before, and in this way he conceived the necessity of restoring purer forms. While Metropolitan of Novgorod he caused a committee of scholars to discuss the question, in spite of the patriarch Joseph. In 1650 a Russian theologian was sent to Constantinople to inquire about various doubtful points. One detail that made much trouble was that the Russians had learned to make the sign of the cross with two fingers instead of three, as the Greeks did. As soon as he became patriarch, Nikon published an order introducing some of these reforms, which immediately called forth angry opposition. In 1654 and 1655 he summoned Synods which continued the work. Makarios, Patriarch of Antioch, who came to Russia at that time was able to help, and there was continual correspondence with the Patriarch of Constantinople. At last, with the approval of the Greek patriarchs, Nikon published the reformed service books and made laws insisting on conformity with Greek custom in all points of ritual (1655-1658). A new Synod in 1656 confirmed this, excommunicating every one who made the sign of the cross except with three fingers, and forbade the rebaptising of Latin-con-
This is no doubt true. There are sufficient indications that Alexis’s quarrel with Nikon was based on jealousy. Nikon wanted to be both a Russian and a Latinized Russian, and this independence was concerned, naturally, with ecclesiastical matters. Some writers have thought that the root of the whole matter was that he became associated with the Latinizer, that he wanted to bring about reunion with Rome and saw in that reunion the only safe protection for the Church against the secular government. It has even been said that he became a Catholic (though he left evidence to the contrary). The theory is not impossible. The Synod of Brest the idea of reunion was in the air; Nikon had had much to do with Ruthenians; he may at last have been partly convinced by them. And one of the accusations against him at his trial was that of Latinizing. A story is told of his conversion by a miracle worked by Saint Joseph, the great martyr for the union. In any case the real reason of Nikon’s fall remains one of the difficulties of Russia history. He was undoubtedly the greatest bishop Russia has yet produced. A few ascetical works of no special importance were written by him.

Niles, Nikolas, b. 21 June, 1828, of a wealthy peasant family of Nihle, Lauenburg, Hanover, Germany; died at Innsbruck, Tyrol, Austria, 31 January, 1907. After completing his gymnasium studies brilliantly, he went to Rome where from 1847 to 1853, as a student of the Collegium Germanicum, he laid the foundation of his ascetic life and, as a pupil of the Gregorian University, under the guidance of distinguished scholars (Balleri, Franselin, Passaglia, Perrone, Patrizi, Schradin, Tarquini), prepared the way for his subsequent scholarly career.

When he left Rome in 1853, he took with him, in addition to the double doctorate of theology and canon law, two mementoes which lasted throughout his life: his grey hair and a disease of the heart, the result of the terrors he had experienced in Rome in the revolutionary year 1848-9. From 1853 to 1858 he laboured in his own country as chaplain and parish priest, and during this time made his first literary attempts. In March, 1858, he entered the Austrian Province of the Society of Jesus and, in the autumn of 1859, was summoned by his superiors to Innsbruck to fill the chair of canon law in the theological faculty, which Emperor Francis Joseph I had shortly before entrusted to the Austrian Jesuits. Niles lectured throughout his life—after 1898 usually to the North American theologians, to whom he gave special instructions on canonical conditions in their country, for which task no one was better qualified than he. His “Commentaria in Concilium Baltimores tertium” (1884-90) and his short essay, “Trillari potest”, gained him a wide reputation.

His literary achievements, in the fields of canon law, ascetics, and liturgy were abundant and fruitful. Martin Blum enumerates in his by no means complete bibliography fifty-seven works, of which the two principal are: "De rationibus famae Cordis Jesu et purissimi Cordis Mariae libri quatuor" (2 vols., 5th ed., Innsbruck, 1885) and "Kalendarium manuale utriusque Ecclesiae orientalis et occidentalis" (2 vols., 2nd ed., Innsbruck, 1889). Through the latter work he became widely known in the world of scholars. In particular Protestants and Orthodox Russians expressed themselves in terms of While St. John Chrysostom was patriarch, before his first exile (398-403), he directed Nilus in the study of Scripture and in works of piety (Nikephoros Kalistos, "Hist. Eccl." XIV, 53, 54). About the year 410 (Tillemont, " Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire des ecclésiastiques," tome X, p. 177), N. and Theodulos, perhaps 404 (Leo Allatius, "De Nilus," 11-14), Nilus left his wife and one son and took the name of Theodulos, with him to Mount Sinai to be a monk. They lived there till about the year 410 (Tillemont, ib., p. 405) when they were accused of having murdered the monastery prisoner. The Saracens intended to sacrifice them to their gods, but eventually sold him as a slave, so that he came into the possession of the Bishop of Eleusa in Palestine. The Bishop received Theodulos among his clergy and made him door-keeper of the church. Meanwhile Nilus, having left his monastery to find his son, at last met him at Eleusa. The bishop then ordained them both priests and allowed them to return to Sinai. The mother and the other son had also embraced the religious life in Egypt. St. Nilus was certainly alive till the year 430. It is uncertain how soon after that he died. Some writers believe him to have lived to 451 (Leo Allatius, op. cit., 8-14). The Byzantine Monologue for his feast (12 November) supposes this. On the other hand, none of his works mentions the Council of Ephesus (431) and he seems to know nothing of the Nestorian troubles; so we have no evidence of his life later than about 430.

From his monastery at Sinai Nilus was a well-known person throughout the Eastern Church; by his writings and correspondence he played an important part in the history of his time. He was known as a theologian, Biblical scholar and ascetic writer, so people of all kinds, from the emperor down, wrote to consult him. His numerous works, including a multitude of letters, consist of denunciations of heresy, panegyrics, abuses of discipline and crimes, of rules and principles of asceticism, especially maxims about the religious life. He warns and threatens people in high places, abbots and bishops, governors and princes, even the emperor himself, without fear. He kept up a correspondence with Gaius, a leader of the Goths, endeavoring to convert him from Arianism (Book I of his letters, nos. 70, 79, 114, 115, 116, 205, 206, 256); he denounced vigorously the persecution of St. John Chrysostom both to the Emperor Arcadius (ib., II, 265; III, 279) and to his courtiers (ib., II, 194). Nilus must be counted as one of the leading ascetic writers of the fifth century. His feast is kept on 12 November in the Byzantine Calendar; he is commemorated also in the Roman martyrology of that date. The Armenians remember him, with other Egyptian fathers, on the Thursday after the third Sunday of their Advent (Niles, "Kalendarium Manuale", Innsbruck, 1897, 9, 624).

The writings of St. Nilus of Sinai were first edited by Possinus (Paris, 1639); in 1673 Suares published a supplement at Rome; his letters were collected by Possinus (Paris, 1667), a larger collection was made by Leo Allatius (Rome, 1668). All these editions are used in P. G., LXXIX. The works are divided by Fessler-Jungmann into four classes:—(1) Works about virtues and vices in general:—"Peristepria" (P. G., LXXIX, 811-908), a treatise addressed to a monk Agathos; "On Prayer" (προσευχή, ib., 1165-1200); "Of the eight spirits of wickedness" (πειραμάτων του δαιμόνιου, ib., 1453-64); "Of the vice of sloth" (ορθογίαι του ἀργοῦ καλός, ib., 1140-44); "Of various bad thoughts" (πειραμάτων θεωρῆμα λογισμός, ib., 1200-1234); "On the word of the Gospel of Luke," xxii, 36 (ib., 1265-1280), (2) Works about the monastic life:—Concerning the slaughter of monks on Mount Sinai, in seven parts, telling the story of the author's life at Sinai, the invasion of the Saracens, captivity of his son, etc. (ib., 590-694); Concerning Albiana, Nilius the Younger, of Rosano, in Calabria; b. in 910; d. 27 December, 1005. For a time he lived married (or lived unlawfully; he had a daughter. Sickness brought about his conversion, however, and from that time he became a monk and a propagator of the rule of St. Basil in Italy. He was known for his saintly life, his virtues, and theological learning. For a time he lived as a hermit, later he spent certain periods of his life at various monasteries which he either founded or restored. He was for some time at Monte Cassino, and again at the Alexius monastery at Rome. When Gregory V (966–999) was driven out of Rome, Nilus opposed the usurpation of Philogates (John) of Piacenza as anti-pope. Later when Philogates was tortured and mutilated he reproached Gregory and the Emperor Otto III (993–1002) for this crime. Nilus’ chief work was the foundation of the famous Greek monastery of Grottaferrata, near Frascati, of which he was the first abbot. He spent the end of his life partly there and partly in a hermitage at Velleuca near Gaeta. His feast is kept on 26 September, both in the Byzantine Calendar and the Roman martyrology.

(3) “Admonitions” (Ἀρεταί) or “Chapter” (ἐπιμνημόνευμα), about 200 precepts drawn up short maxims (ib., 1239–82). These are probably made by his disciples from his discourses. (4) “Letzte”—Punicus— died 435, Attilius 1061 letters, divided into four books (P. G., LXXIX, 81–585). Many are not complete, several overlap, or are not really letters but excerpts from Nilus’ works; some are spurious. Feissel-Jungmann divides them into classes, as dogmatic, exegetical, moral, and ascetic. Certain works wrongly attributed to Nilus are named in Feissel-Jungmann, pp. 125–36.

Nimbus (Lat., related to Nebula, νέμβα, properly vapour, cloud), in art and archaeology signifies a shining light implying great dignity. Closely related are the halo, glory, aureole.

In nature.—All such symbols originate in natural phenomena, scientifically accounted for in textbooks on physics (Müller-Peter, “Lehrbuch der kosmischen Physik”); Penner, “Meteorologische Optik”). There are circular phenomena of light in drops or bubbles of water and in ice crystals which by the refraction or light reveal in great or less degree the spectral colours. Of the accompanying phenomena the horizontal and vertical diameters, the “column of light”, may be mentioned. The curious rings of light or colour similar to the above, which often form themselves around the iris of the eye even in candle light, are more gorgeous on the mountain mist (Pilatus, Rigi, and Brocken), if the beholder has the sun behind him; they surround his shadow as it is projected upon the cloud. The dew drops in a meadow can produce an appearance of light around a shadow, without, however, forming distinct circles. Occasionally one even sees the planet Venus veiled by a disc of light. The phenomena of discs and broad rings are more usual in the sun and moon. The Babylonians studied them diligently (Kugler, “Sternkunde und Sterndienst in Babylon”, i, 1). The terminology of these phenomena is vague: the disc itself is called “anathelia” and the ring around it “the moon halo”. A more usual name is “aureole” which in a restricted sense means an oval or elliptical ray of light like a medallion. If the brightness is merely a luminous glow with or without defined ring, circle, or ellipse, it is usually spoken of as a “glory”. The types in nature in which rays or beams of light with or without colour challenge attention, suggested the symbolic use of the nimbus to denote high dignity or power. It is thus that Divine characteristics and the loftiest types of humanity were denoted by the nimbus.

In Ptolemy, this symbol of light is chiefly used in the form of rays and flames or a diffused glow. Holy Writ presents the best example; God is Light. The Son of God, the Brightness of His Father’s glory (Heb., 1, 3). An emerald light surrounds God and His throne (Apoc., iv, 3) and the Son of Man shines to the prophet a flame of fire (Apoc., i, 14 sq.). So also He appeared in His Transfiguration on Tabor. On Sinai, God appeared in a cloud which at once concealed and revealed Him (Ex., xxv, 16 sq.) and even Moses was shown with a marvellous light in the presence of God (Ex., xxxiv, 29 sq.). Such descriptions may have influenced Christian artists to distinguish God and the saints by means of a halo, especially around the head. They were also familiar with the descriptions of the classical poets whose gods appeared veiled by a cloud; e. g. according to Virgil, divinity appears in “nimbo circumspecta, succincta, quasi agricolis” (bathed in light and shining through a cloud).

In art.—In the plastic arts (painting and sculpture) the symbolism of the nimbus was early in use among the pagans who determined its form. In the monuments of Hellenic and Roman art, the heads of the gods, heroes, and other distinguished persons are often found with a disc-shaped halo, a circle of light, or a rayed-fillet. They are, therefore, associated especially with gods and creatures of light such as the Phœnicis. The disc of light is likewise used in the Pompeian wall paintings to typify gods and demi-gods only, but later, in profane art it was extended to cherubus or even simple personifications and as a reminder that the figures so depicted are not human. In the miniatures of the oldest Virgil manuscripts all the great personages wear a nimbus (Beisée, “Vatikanische Miniaturen”). The curious style of the Syrian kings having themselves represented with a rayed crown to indicate the status of demi-gods, spread throughout the East and the West. In Rome the halo was first used only for deified emperors as a sign of celestial bliss, but afterwards living rulers also were given the rayed crown, and after the third century, although not first by Constantine, the simple rayed nimbus. Under Constantine the rayed crown appears only in exceptional cases on the coin, and was first adopted emblematically by Julian the Apostate. Henceforth the nimbus appears without rays, as the emperors now wished themselves considered worldly and of greater force, but no longer as divine or of the ancient, divine class. In early Christian art, the rayed nimbus, as well as the rayless disc were adopted in accordance with tradition. The sun and the Phœnicis received, as in pagan art, a wreath on a nimbus, also the sun and moon. The latter was reserved not only for emperors but for men of genius and personifications of all kinds, although both in ecclesiastical and profane art, this emblem was usually omitted in ideal figures. In other cases the influence of ancient art tradition must not be denied.

The Middle Ages scarcely recognized such influence, and were satisfied to refer to Holy Writ as an example for wreath and crown or shield shaped discs as marks of honour to holy personages. Durandus writes: "Ric omnes sancti pinguntur coronati quasi dicuntur. Filiae Jerusalem, venite et videte martyres cum corona quibus coronavit eas Dominus. Et in Libro Sapientiae: Just ut secipiunt regnum dei et diademia de manu Domini. Corona autem hulmussi deipinguatur in forma scuti rotundae, quia sancti Dei protectione divina fruuntur, unde venit gratulabundum: Domine ut coronasti tunc tuas sanctissimae templae vestrae. Thence all the saints are depicted, crowned, as if they would say: O Daughters of Jerusalem, come and see the martyrs with the crowns with which the Lord has crowned them and in the Book of Wisdom: Just shall receive a kingdom of glory, and a crown of beauty at the hands of the Lord. And a crown of this kind is shown in the form of a round shield, because they enjoy the divine protection of the Holy God, whence they sing rejoicing: O Lord. Thou hast crowned us as with a shield of Thy good-Will."

(Rationale divin. offic. I, 3, 19, sqq.) Furthermore the Middle Ages are almost exclusively accredited with the extension of symbolism inasmuch as they traced, sometimes fictitiously, allusions to Christian truths in existing symbols, of which they sought no other origin. Durandus adds to the passage quoted above, the sentence containing a mention of the Christ, signifying redemption through the Cross, and the square nimbus which was occasionally combined with it in living persons, to typify the four cardinal virtues. Judging by the monumental, however, the square nimbus appears to be only a variant of the round halo used to preserve a distinction and thus guard against placing living persons on a par with the saints. The ideas of the cardinal virtues, the firmness of a squared stone, or the imperfection of a square figure as contrasted with a round one was merely a later development. In the cross nimbus the assumed form of the nimbus, not a crown, (Miguel, "De fr. L.") or to be conceded historical; but that this cross is a "signum Christi crucifixi" Durandus probably interprets correctly.

Form and Colour.—The form of the symbol was first definitely determined by Gregory the Great, who (about 600) permitted himself to be painted with a square nimbus. Johannes Diaconus in his life of the pope, gives the reason, "circa verum tabulum, quod litudinem, quod viventis insignis est, preferens, non coronam" (bearing around his head the likeness of a square, which is the sign for a living person, and not a crowned.) (Miguel, "De fr. L.") to have already been customary to use the round nimbus for saints. In any event the few extant examples from the following centuries show that, almost without exception, only the living, principally ecclesiastics, but also the laity and even women and children, were represented with a square nimbus. The aureole, that is the halo which surrounds an entire figure, naturally takes the shape of an oval, though it is used for a bust, it readily resumes the circular form. The radiation of light from a centre is essential and we must recognize the circle of light of the sun-god in ancient art as one of the prototypes of the aureole. The medallion form was for a long time common to the portraits of the Romans for the Imagens clipesae. The gradations of colour in the aureole reveal the influence of Apoc., iv, 3, where a rainbow was round about the throne of God. Indeed, in very early times the aureole was only used in representations of God as the Dove or Hand, or of Christ when the divinity was to be emphatically expressed.

In early Christian times (as now) the round nimbus was by far the most usual designation of Christ and the saints. The broad circle is often replaced by the ring of light or a coloured disc, especially on fabrics and miniatures. In pictures without colour the nimbus is shown by a ring, a wreath, or a raised circlet, often by a disc in relief. In the aureole blue indicates celestial glory, and it is used in the nimbus to fill in the surface, as are yellow, grey, and other colours while the margins are defined in different tints. In many haloes the inner part is white. In mosaics, since the fifth and sixth centuries, blue has been replaced by gold. From this period also, the frescoes show a corresponding yellow, as seen for instance, in paintings in the catacombs. Gold or yellow prevails in miniatures, but there is a great deal of variety in illustrated books. Blue as a symbol of heaven has the preference, but gold, which later became the rule, gives a more obvious impression of light. The explanation of the cross nimbus variety is obvious. Since the sixth century it has characterised Christ and the Lamb of God, but occasionally it is given to the other Persons of the Trinity. In connexion with it, in the fourth and fifth centuries, there was a monogram nimbus. The cross and the monogram of Christ were beside or above the head of Christ and the Lamb. In the fifth century they were brought to the upper edge of the nimbus and finally both were concentrically combined with it. In more recent times the monogram and the monogram nimbus have become more rare. The letters A and M for Christ and Mary, very often for monograms and frequently accompanied the nimbus.

DEVELOPMENT.—In order to understand the nimbus and its history, it is necessary to trace it through the different branches of art. The frescoes in the catacombs have a peculiar significance inasmuch as they determine the period when the nimbus was admitted into Christian art. The numerous figures lacking this symbol (Christ, Mary, and the Apostles) show that before Constantine, representations of specifically Christian character were not influenced by art traditions. Only pictures of the sun, the seasons, and a few ornamental heads carry the nimbus. The single exception is found in a figure over the well-known “Ship in a Storm” of one of the Sacrament chapels. But it is to be observed that in this case we are in the presence of children of Light of God, but merely with a personification of heavenly aid, which marked a transition from personifications to direct representations of holy personages. The figure seems to be copy pictures of the sun god.

On the other hand, several pictures of Christ in the catacombs, dating from the fourth century, indicate the period when the nimbus was first used in the way familiar to us. Besides the Roman catacombs, others, especially that of El Baghaouat in the great oasis of the Libyan desert, must be taken into account. For the period succeeding Constantine, mosaics furnish important evidence that they present not only very numerous and usually definite examples of the nimbus, but have a more official character and give intelligent portrayals of religious axioms. Although allowance must be made for later restorations, a constant development is apparent in this field. The treatment of the nimbus, in the illuminating and illustrating of books, was influenced by the caprices of the individual artist and the tradition of different schools. In mosaics and embroidery, the most extant use was made of the nimbus, and a rich colour scheme was developed, to which these technical arts are by nature adapted. Unfortunately the examples which have been preserved are only imperfectly known and the dates are often difficult to determine.

Sculpture presents little opportunity for the use of the nimbus. In some few instances, indeed, the nimbus is painted on ivory or wood carvings, but more often we find it engraved or raised in relief. Figures with this emblem are rare. On the sarcophagi we find that Christ and the Lamb (apart from the sun) alone appear with a circle or disc, the Apostles and Madonna in ivory neither Mary nor Christ is so distinguished. In the course of centuries the Christian idea that God, according to Holy Scripture the Source of Light and Divine things, must always be given a halo, became more pronounced. This applied to the three Divine Persons and their emblems, as the Cross, Lamb, Dove, Eye, and Hand; and since, according to Scripture, saints are children of Light (Luke, xvi, 8; John, xii, 36), as such they should share the honour. Preference was shown for the garland or crown (corona et gloria corona) of Christ which was also bestowed by God as a reward upon the saints, either spiritually in this life or in the Kingdom of Heaven (Ps, xx, 4; Heb, ii, 7 sq.). Garlands and crowns of glory are frequently mentioned in Holy Writ (I Peter, v, 4; Apoc, iv, 4, etc.). The nimbus also takes the form of a shield to emphasize the idea of Divine protection (Ps, v, 13). A truly classic authority for the explanation of the nimbus may be found in Wis., v, 17: the Just shall receive a kingdom of glory, and a crown of beauty at the hands of the Lord; for with His right hand He will carry them up, and with His hoar nimbus He will defend them. (In Greek, "Holds the shield over them"). Whereas in pagan art, the rayless nimbus signified neither holiness nor Divine protection, but merely majesty and power, a. and A for Mary, were more and more definitely made the emblem of such virtue and grace, which, emanating from God, extends over the saints only. Urban VIII formally prohibited giving the nimbus to persons who were not beatified. Since the eighteenth century the word “halo” has been incorporated into the German language. In Western countries John the Baptist is the only saint of the Old Testament who is given a halo, doubtless because before his time the grace of Christ had not yet been bestowed in its fullness.

We have already found that the aureole may be considered exclusively a device of Christian art, especially as it was first carried a nimbus at first for the Blessed Virgin, and then extended only to the Blessed Virgin. Instead of simple beams it often consists of pointed flames or is shaded off into the colours of the rainbow. This form, as well as the simple nimbus, by the change in the circumstances, may be transposed into a garland of rays or a glory. A glory illuminating the sun’s rays was very popular for the monstrances; in other respects the lunula suggests the nimbus 8, the shape of a figure 8. God the Father is typified in later pictures by an equilateral triangle, or two interlaced triangles, also by a hexagon to suggest the Trinity. If there is no circle around the cross nimbus, the three visible arms of the cross give the same effect. Occasionally the mandorla is found composed of seven doves (type of the Seven Gifts of the Holy Ghost), or of angels. The latter are used in large pictures of the Last Judgment or heaven, forming the inscription of the “glories” of Italian domes. In painting, haloes of cloud are sometimes used for delicate angel heads, as in Raphael’s works. Angels also form a nimbus around the head of the Mother of God. The Mother of God is also given the twelve stars of Apoc., xii, 1. Saint John Nepomucene has five or seven stars because of the great light which hovered over his body when he was drowned in the Moldau by order of King Wenceslaus. Artists have developed many varieties of the nimbus and aureole. Since the Renaissance it has been fashioned more and more lightly and delicately and sometimes entirely omitted, as the artists thought they could suggest the characteristics of the personage by the painting. It is true that the nimbus is not intrinsically a part of the figure and at times even appears heavy and intrusive. A distinguishing symbol may not, however, be readily dispensed with and with the omission of the nimbus images of the saints have often degenerated into mere genre pictures and worldly types. A delicate circle of light shining or floating over the head does not lessen the artistic impression, and even if the characteristic of Christ or the Madonna is sufficiently indicated in the drawing, yet it must be conceded that the nimbus, like a crown, not only characterises and differentiates a figure but distinguishes and exalts it as well.

NIMES, DIocese of (Nemausensis), suffragan of Avignon, comprises the civil Department of Gard. By the Concordat of 1801 its territory was united with the Diocese of Avignon. It was re-established as a separate diocese in 1821, and a Brief of 27 April, 1877, granted to its bishops the right to hold Alais and Uzès, their episcopal style, these two dioceses being now combined with that of Nîmes.

That Nîmes (Nemausus) was an important city in Roman antiquity is shown by the admirable Maison Carée, the remains of a superb amphitheatre, and the Pont du Gard, four and a half leagues from the city.
Late and rather contradictory traditions attribute the foundation of the Church of Nîmes either to Celsius, the man "who was blind from his birth" of the Gospel, or to St. Honestus, the apostle of Navarre, said to have been sent to southern France by St.
Peter, with St. Saturninus (Sermio), the apostle of Toulouse. The true apostle of Nîmes was St. Baudilus, his martyrdom is placed by some at the end of the third century, and, with less reason, by others at the end of the fourth. Many writers affirm that a certain St. Felix, martyred by the Vandals about 418, was Bishop of Nîmes, but Duchesne questions this.
There was a see at Nîmes as early as 396, for in that year a synodical letter was sent by a Council of Nîmes to the bishops of Gaul. The first bishop whose date is positively known is Sedatus, present at the Council of Agen in 506. Other noteworthy bishops are: St. John (about 511; before 528); St. Remesarius (633-40); Bertrand de Languedoc (1280-1324), faithful to Boniface VIII, and for that reason driven from his see for a year by Philip the Fair; Cardinal Guillaume d'Es-toutville (1441-49); Cardinal Guillaume Briconet (1498-1514); the famous pulpit orator Fichet (1607-1710); the distinguished physician Plantier (1655-75).
whose pastoral letter (1873) called forth a protest from Bismarck; the preacher Besson (1875-88). Urban II, coming to France to preach the crusade, consecrated the cathedral of Nîmes in 1099 and presided over a council. Alexander III visited Nîmes in 1162. Clemont IV (1265-88), born at Saint Gilles, in this diocese, granted the monastery of that town numerous favours.
St. Louis, who embarked at Aigues-Mortes for his first crusades, surrounded Nîmes with walls. In 1305, Clement V passed through the city on his way to Lyons to be crowned. In consequence of disputes and the refusal of the city to sell its privileges to the papal household, Innocent VI laid an interdict on Nîmes in 1358.
The diocese was greatly disturbed by the Religious Wars: on 29 Sept., 1557, five years before the Massacre of St.
Bartholomew, the Protestants of Nîmes, actuated by fanaticism, perpetrated the massacre of Catholics known in French history as the Michelduc. Louis XIII at Nîmes issued the decree of religious pacification known as the Peace of Nîmes.

The first Bishop of Uzès historically known is Constantius, present at the Council of Vaison in 442.
Other bishops were St. Firminus (541-53) and St. Ferréal (553-81). In the sixteenth century, Bishop Jean de Baudus (1531-60) became a Calvinist. The celebrated missionary Bridaine (1701-67) was a native of the Diocese of Uzès. This little city was for seventy days the enforced residence of Cardinal Pacca, arch of Bologna and confessor of the Czech King Esther (1812). The town of Pont Saint-Esprit, on the Rhône, owes its names to a bridge built there between 1265 and 1309 with the proceeds of a general collection made by the monks.

About 570, Sigebert, King of Austrasia, created a see at Arastium (Alais), taking fifteen parishes from the Diocese of Nîmes. In the eighth century, when Septi-mania was annexed to the Frankish Empire, the Diocese of Alais was suppressed and its territory returned to the Diocese of Nîmes. At the request of Louis XIV, the see was again created at Alais by Innocent XII,
in 1694. The future Cardinal de Bessus, Bossuet's biograper, was Bishop of Alais from 1784 to 1790. After the Edict of Nantes, Alais was one of the places de surêté given to the Huguenots (see HUGUENOTS, History). Louis XIII took back the town in 1629, and the Convention of Alais, signed 29 June of that year, suppressed the political privileges of the Protestants.
The chief pilgrimages of the present Diocese of Nîmes are: Notre Dame de Grâce, Rochefort, dating from Charlemagne, and commemorating a victory over the Saracens. Louis XIV and his mother, Anne of Austria, established here a foundation for perpetual Masses. Notre Dame de Grâce, Laval, in the vicinity of Alais, dating from not later than 900. Notre Dame de Bon Secours de Prémécomte, Fontaine-ès, since 887.
Our Lady of Bonheur, founded 1045 on the mountain of l'Angout in the vicinity of Valleraugue. Notre Dame de Belvès, a shrine of the eleventh century, on Mont Andrev. Notre Dame de Vauvert, whether the converted Albigneses were sent, often visited by St. Louis, Clement V, and Francis I. The shrine of St. Vérode, a hermit who died Archbishop of Avignon, and of the martyr St. Baudilius, at Tréas Fontaines and at Vaissain near Nîmes. The following Saints are especially venerated in the present Diocese of Nîmes: St. Castor, Bishop of Apt (fourth to fifth century), a native of Nîmes; the priest St. Theodotus, martyr, patron saint of the town of Uzès; the Athénian St. Giles (Egidius, sixth cent.), living as a recluse near Uzès when he was accidentally wounded by King Childebert, later abbot of the monastery built by Chil-deric in repairation for this accident, venerated also in England; Blessed Peter of Luxemburg who made a sojourn in the diocese, at Villeneuve-lez-Avignon (1309-37).

Prior to the Associations Law of 1901 the diocese had Augustinians of the Assumption (a congregation which originated in the city of Nîmes). Carthusians, Trappists, Jesuits, Missionaries of the Company of Mary, Franciscan Fathers, Marist, Lasarets, Sulpicians, and various orders of teaching brothers. The Oblates of the Assumption, for teaching and foreign missions, also founded here, and the Besançon Sisters of Charity, teachers and nurses, have their mother houses at Nîmes. At the beginning of the century the religious congregations conducted in this diocese: 3 crochets, 53 day nurseries, 6 boys' orphanages, 20 girls' orphanages, 1 employment agency for females, 1 house of rest for penitent women, 6 houses of mercy, 20 hospitals or asylums, 11 houses of visiting nurses, 3 houses of retreat, 1 home for incurables. In 1903 the Diocese of Nîmes contained 420,506 inhabitants, 45 parish churches, 200 parochial churches, 85 vicariates subordinated to the State.

Niânian, SAINT (Niñas, Ninus, Dinà, Rìngàn, Rìngèn), bishop and confessor, date of birth unknown; d. about 432; the first Apostle of Christianity in Scot- land. The earliest account of him is in Bede (Histoire des Ecles., III, 4): "the southern Picts received the true faith by the preaching of Bishop Ninias, a most rever- end and holy man of the British nation, who had been regularly instructed at Rome in the faith and mysteries of the truth; whose episcopal see, named after St. Martin the Bishop, and famous for a church dedicated to him (wherein Ninias himself and many other saints rest in the body), is now in the possession of the Eng- lish. The place belongs to the province of the Bernicians and is commonly called the White House [Candida Casa], because he there built a church of stone, which was not usual amongst the Britons". The fact given in this passage forms practically all we know of St. Ninian's life and work.

The most important later life, compiled in the twelfth century by St. Aelred, professes to give a de- tail account founded on Bede and also on a "Libellus de vita et miraculis cius" (sc. Niniani) "barbarice scriptum", but the legendary element is largely evi- dent. He states, however, that while engaged in building his church at Candida Casa, Ninian heard of the death of St. Martin and decided to dedicate the building to him. Now St. Martin died about 397, so that the mission of Ninian to the southern Picts must have begun towards the end of the fourth century. St. Ninian founded at Whithorn a monastery which became famous as a school of monasticism within a century of his death; his work among the southern Picts seems to have had but a short-lived success. St. Patrick, in his epistle to Coroticus, terms the Picts "apostates", and references to Ninian's converts hav- ing abandoned Christianity are found in the lives of Sts. Columba and Kentigern. The body of St. Ninian was buried in the church at Whithorn (Whitburn) (Wigtown), but no relics are now known to exist. The "Clogrinny", or bell of St. Rìngàn, of very rough workmanship, is in the Antiquarian Museum at Edinburgh.

Nirschl, Joseph, theologian and writer, b. at Durchfurth, Lower Bavaria, 24 February, 1822; d. at Würzburg, 17 January, 1904. He was ordained in 1851 and graduated as doctor of theology in 1854 at Munich. He was appointed teacher of Christology at Passau in 1855 and in 1862 professor of church history and patrology. In 1879 he became professor of church history at Würzburg, and was appointed dean of the cathedral in 1892. Of his numerous works, mostly on patrology, the most important are: "Lehrbuch der Patrologie und Patristik" (3 vols., Mainz, 1881-5); "Ursprung und Wesen des Bösen nach der Lehre des hl. Augustinus" (Ratisbon, 1854); "Das Dogma der unbefleckten Empfängnis Maria" (Ratisbon, 1855); "Todesjahre des hl. Ignatius von Antiochien" (Passau, 1869); "Die Theologie des hl. Ignatius von Antiochien" (Passau, 1880, and Mainz, 1880); Das Haus und Grab der hl. Jungfrau Maria (Mainz, 1900). He translated into German the letters and the martyrdom of St. Ignatius of Antioch (Kempten, 1870) and the Catechises of St. Cyril of Jerusalem (Kempten, 1871). He defended the genuineness of pseudo-Dionysius and of the apocryphal letter of King Abgar of Edessa to Jesus.

MICHAEL O'TT.

Nisibis, titular Archidiocese of Mesopotamia, situated on the Mydonus at the foot of Mt. Masius. It is so old that its original name is unknown. In any case it is not the Achad (Aced) of Genesis, x, 10, as has been asserted. When the Greeks came to Mesopo- tamia with Alexander they called Antiochonia, a town, of unknown name, which name it appears for the first time on the occasion of the march of Antiochus against the Molon (Polybius, V, 51). Subsequently the subject of constant disputes between the Romans and the Parthians, it was captured by Lucullus after a long siege from the brother of Tigranes (Dion Cassius, XXXV, 6, 7); and by Trajan in 115, which won for him the name of Parthicus (ibid., LXVIII, 23). In 207, by the treaty with Narses, the province of Nisibis was acquired by the Roman Empire; in 383 it was ceded to the Persians on the defeat of Julian the Apostate. The See of Nisibis was founded in 500 by Babo (d. 506). His successors, the celebrated St. James, defended the city by his prayers during the siege of Sapor II. At the time of its cession to the Persians, Nisibis was a Christian centre important enough to become the ecclesiastical metropolis of the Province of Bel-Araby. In 410 it had six suffragan sees and as early as the middle of the fifth century was the most important episcopal see of the Persian Church after Seleucia-Ctesiphon. A great many of its Nestorians or Jacobite titulars are mentioned in Chro- donia ('Synodicon orientale', Paris, 1902, 678) and Le Quin (Orients chrst., II, 995, 1195-1204) and several of them, e. g. Barsunum, Ose, Narses, Jeuseyab, Aedeb-Jesus, etc., acquired deserved celebrity in the world of letters. Near Nisibis on 25 June, 1839, Ibrahim Pasha, son of Mehmet Ali, Viceroy of Egypt, won a great victory over the troops of Mahmoud II. To-day Nisib is a town of 3,000 inhabitants in the sandjeg of Orfa and the vilayet of Aleppo. Its oil is considered very fine.

The first theological school of Nisibis, founded at the introduction of Christianity into the town, was closed when the province was ceded to the Persians and became a centre of Nestorianism.
Archbishop Cyrus in 489 closed it and expelled masters and pupils, who withdrew to Nisibis. They were welcomed by Barsamas, a former pupil of Edessa. The school was reopened at Nisibis under the direction of Naas, called the harp of the Holy Ghost.

The latter dictated the statues of the new school. Those which have been discovered and published belong to Osee, the successor of Barsamas in the See of Nisibis, and bear the date 496; they must be substantially the same as those of 489. In 500 they were again modified.

The school, a sort of Catholic university, was established in a monastery and directed by a superior called Raphon, a title also given to the founder Narse; Abraham, his nephew and successor.

Through its connections with the House of God, its position of authority, and the education and training of its students, Nisibis was a center of theological and ecclesiastical education.

The regularity of his conduct, his family standing, and the support of Mme de Maintenon induced Louis XIV to make him Archbishop of Paris, 19 August, 1695. At Paris he was very popular. Metropolitans of the eleventh century, composed his celebrated catalogue of ecclesiastical writers. The disorders and dissensions, which arose in the sixth century, and the school of Nisibis, favoured the development of many of its rivals, especially that of Seleucia; however, it did not really begin to decline until after the foundation of the School of Bagdad (832).

Among its literary authorities, the most prominent were those of the founder Narse; Abraham, his nephew and successor; and of the other members of his family, who were the particular objects of his care.

Inspired by customs prevalent in France than by the prescriptions of the Council of Trent, he caused the Breviary, Missal, and other liturgical books of Paris already published by his predecessor de Harlay, to be reprinted.

To these he added the Rituale, the Cremone, and a collection of canons for the use of his Church.
propositions constituting the essence of Jansenism, but he always inclined, both in dogma and morals, to opinions savouring of Jansenism; he favoured its partisans and was ever hostile to the Jesuits and the adversaries of the Jansenists. Shortly before his elevation to the See of Paris he had approved (June, 1696) the "Rêflexions morales" of Père Quensel, an Oratorian already known for his ardent attachment to Jansenism and destined soon to be its leader. He earnestly recommended it to his priests. This approbation was the source of all the cardinal's troubles.

Believing themselves thenceforth certain of his sympathy the Jansenists, q de Noailles' elevation to the See of Paris, published a posthumous work of de Barros (q. v.), entitled "Explication de la foi", really the explanation and defence of the Jansenistic doctrine of grace already condemned by Rome. de Noailles condemned the book (20 August, 1696), at least in the first part, and postponed it to the contradictory attitudes of the Bishop of Châlons, who approved Quensel, and the Archbishop of Paris, who condemned de Barros. An anonymous pamphlet published under the title "Problème chésulistique", placed side by side twenty-nine identical propositions which had been approved in the Quensel's work and condemned in de Barros'. Parliament condemned the lampoon to be burned six months later. It was put on the Index (2 June, 1699) and proscribed by the Holy Office.

The controversies occasioned by the publication of the "Cae de Conscience" and Quensel's "Rêflexions morales" (for which see JANENITUS, in Vol. VIII, 291-2) involved de Noailles deeply in the Jansenist quarrel. In spite of repeated papal decisions of the Holy See, the cardinal, for many years, would not accept the Bull "Unigenitus". Finally he yielded in May, 1723, and on 11 October following published the unconditioned acceptance of the Bull. He afterwards retracted various writings, which seemed to cast doubt on the sincerity of his submission; he restored to the Jesuits the faculties of which he had deprived them three years before. He died two months later, aged 78, regarded by all with respect and esteem. His weak and uncertain character caused him to offend everybody. He made the Jesuits, and especially the adversaries of the Bull "Unigenitus". He lacked discernment in the choice of his confidants; he bore a great name, and played an important part in his time, but lacked many qualities of a great bishop. His works—diocesan ordinances and parochial instructions—are mostly collected in the "Symodicon ecclesiae Parisiensis" (Paris, 1777).

Nobili, Robert de', b. at Montepulcianio, Tuscan, September 7, 1650; d. at Mylapore, Madras, September 16, 1696. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1657, at Naples, and after a brilliant course of studies sailed for the Indian mission in October, 1664, arriving at Goa, 20 May, 1665. After a short stay at Cochín and the Fishery Coast, he was sent in November, 1665, to Madura to study Tamil. Within a year he had acquired a complete mastery of Tamil, Telugu, and Sanskrit. In his zeal to convert the Brahmins he adopted their mode of life and so had to cut himself off completely from intercourse with his fellow missionaries. He worked in Madura, Mysore, and the Karnatic till old age and almost complete blindness compelled him to retire to Mylapore. (For an account of his missionary methods see Malabar Rites.) De' Nobili translated into Sanskrit or composed therein many prayers and several longer works, especially an abridgment of Christian Doctrine and a life of Our Lady, in Sanskrit verse. Nearly all these lost his imprisonment in Madura (1659-41). His principal work in Tamil is his "Larger Catechism", in four books, printed after his death (partly reprinted, Trichinopoly, 1891-1906). It is a course of moral instruction adapted to the needs of the country. In addition he wrote: "A Treatise on the Eternal Life", "A Dialogue on the Faith", "A Disproof of Transmigration", "A Manual of Rules of Perfection", numerous hymns and, several instructions not as President: two small catechisms still in actual use, "The Science of the Soul", and many prayers. He translated into Telugu several of his Tamil works, among them the two small catechisms. In Tamil and Telugu he enriched the vocabulary with appropriate Christian terms.

St. pseudo-Veda seems to have been written in imitation of the "Catechisms still in actual use, "The Science of the Soul", and many prayers. Nobles, Daniel, physician, b. 14 Jan., 1810; d. at Manchester, 12 Jan., 1855. He was the son of Mary Dewhurst and Edward Noble of Preston, a descendant of an old Yorkshire Catholic family. Apprenticed to a Preston surgeon named Thomas Moore, he was in time admitted a member of the Royal College of Surgeons and a licentiate of Apothecaries Hall. In 1834 he began to practise in Manchester, and soon showed the special interest in mental diseases which afterwards distingushed his career. In the following year he published his first work, "An Essay of the Means, physical and moral, of estimating Human Character", the tendency of which is indicated by the fact that he is described as "a President of the Manchester Leprosy: the study of Insanity" (London, 1850-53); "Three Lectures on the Correlation of Psychology and Physioogy" (London, 1854); "The Human Mind in its relations with the Brain and Nervous System" (London, 1858); "On certain popular fallacies concerning the production of epidemic diseases" (Manchester, 1852-53); "On the fluctuations in the death-rate" (Manchester, 1863); "Evanscott Protestantism and Naascent Atheism, the modern religious problem" (London, 1877); "On the causes of sanitary reform" (Manchester, 1876). Nocera's contributions to various medical journals, the best known of which was a paper called "Mesmerism True—Mesmerism False", which was translated into German and Dutch.

Nocera, Diocese of (Nucerinensis), in Puglia, Umbria, Italy, near the sources of the Tina, famous for its mineral waters, especially the Fonte Angielta. According to a legend, the first Bishop of Nocera was St. Crispoldus, a disciple of the Apostles, but his Germanic name renders this doubtful; more credibly is the tradition of the martyrdom of SS. Felix, Constance, and Felicissimus. The Bishops Felix, to whom Pope Innocent addressed a letter in 402, and Ceclius Laurentius, the competitor of Pope Symmachus (468), were not Umbrian prelates, but bishops of Nocera, near Naples (Savo, "Ggv. Cart."
(1), 1897). The first authentic Bishop was Liutardus (824); other prelates were Blessed Rinaldo d'Antignano (1258) and Blessed Filippo Oderisi (1266), monks of Fonte Avellana; Blessed Alessandro Vincenzo, O.M. (1363); Antonio Bolognini (1438) restored the cathedral; Varino Favorino (1514), a noted humanist; Gerolamo Maunelli (1545), founder of the seminary; Mario Battaglini (1590), diocesan historian; Francesco Luigi Pierianni (1600), exiled in 1809 because he refused the oath of allegiance to Napoleon. It is immediately dependent on Rome, with 82 parishes; 59,731 inhabitants; 7 religious houses of men and 6 of women.

Nocera dei Pagani (of the Pagans), Diocese of (Nucerini Paganorum), in Salerno, Italy, at the foot of Mt. Alburno, on the Sarno River; it is the Nucerium Alfarina of the Nvurknimm coins, captured by Fabius Maximus in the Samnite War (307), and sacked by Hannibal (217). The appellation 'of the pagans' dates probably from the ninth century, because of a Saracen colony established there with the connivance of the Dukes of Naples. In 1132 King Roger nearly destroyed the town because it took part with Innocent II, and in 1382 Charles of Durazzo besieged it. Urban VI. Nocera is the birthplace of Hugo de Pagani (Payus), one of the founders of the Teutonic Knights. Ludovico, Bishop of Tolosa, a son of Charles II of Anjou; Tommaso de Acerno, historian of Urban VI; and the painter Francesco Solimena. St. Alphonse Liguori founded his order there. At Nocera is the sanctuary of Mater Domini, which contains the tomb of Charles I of Anjou; the ancient church was rebuilt in the eleventh century, and given to some hermits; Urban VIII gave it to the Basilians, and when these were driven away in 1809 and 1829, it came into the hands of the Franciscans. Among its bishops were St. Priscus, the first bishop, not St. Priscus of Nola; and Ceclius Laurentius, competitor of Symmachus (498). In 1260 the assassination of the bishop caused the suppression of the diocese, but Urban VI restored it in 1386. Later bishops were Giovanni Cerretani (1498), a jurist; the historian Paul Jovius (1528), succeeded by his nephew Julius and his great-nephew Paul, who rebuilt the episcopal palace; Simone Lunardo (1602), diocesan historian. United to the See of Cava in 1818, it was re-established in 1824. A suffragan of Salerno, it has 28 parishes; 60,350 inhabitants; 4 religious houses of men, and 11 of women; a school for boys, and 5 girls.

Nocturns (Nocturn or Noctura), a very old term applied to night Offices. Tertullian speaks of nocturnal gatherings (Ad. Uxur., IV, iv); St. Cyprian, of the nocturnal hours, "nulla sint horis nocturnis precum damna, nulls orationum pigra et ignava dispersa" (De orat., xvi). In the life of Melania the Younger is found the expression "nocturna hora", "nocturna temporis" (De mort., Bolland, vol. viii, 1886, pp. 49 sq.). In these passages the term signifies night prayer in general, and seems synonymous with the word vigil. It is not accurate, then, to assume that the present division of Matins into three Nocturns represents three distinct Offices recited during the night in the early ages of the Church. Durandus of Mende (Rationale, III, n. 17) and others who follow him assert that the early Christians rose thrice in the night to pray; hence the present division into three Nocturns (cf. Beleth, Ruperti, and other authors cited in the bibliography). Some early Christian writers speak of three vigils in the night, as Methodius or St. Jerome (Methodius, "Symposion", V, ii, in P. G., XVII, 100); but the first was evening prayer, or prayer at nightfall, corresponding practically to our Vespers or Complies; the second, midnight prayer, specifically called Vigil; the third at dawn, corresponding to the Office of Lauds. As a matter of fact the Office of the Vigils, and consequently of the Nocturns, was a single Office, recited without interruption at midnight. All the old authorities to this effect (Homiliae, Matins; Vigil) testify to this. Moreover, it does not seem practical to assume that anyone, considering the length of the Office in those days, could have risen to pray at three different times during the night, besides joining in the two Offices of Evendeite and dawn.

If it is not yet possible to assign exactly the date of the origin of the three Nocturns, or to account for the significance of the division, some more or less probable conjectures may be made. In the earliest period there was as yet no question of a division in the Vigils. The oldest Vigil, in as far as they signify an Office, comprised certain psalms, chanted or sung either as responses or as antiphons, intermingled with prayers recited aloud, or interrupted by a few moments' meditation and readings from the Old or the New Testament. On certain days the Vigil included the celebration of Mass.

It was during the second period, probably in the fourth century, that to break the monotony of this long night prayer the custom of dividing it into three parts was introduced. Clemens Alexamenos, Bishop of Hierapolis, in his Church in the Province of Pamphylia, mentions three divisions of this Office (De cœnob. inst., III, VIII, in P. L., CLXII, 144). We have here, we think, the origin of the Nocturns; or at least it is the earliest mention of them we possess. In the "Peregrinatio ad loca sancta", the Office of the Vigils, either for week-days or for Sundays, is an uninterrupted one, and shows no evidence of any division (cf. Cabrol, "Étude sur La Peregrinatio Sylvie", Paris, 1895, pp. 37 and 53). A little later St. Benedict speaks with greater detail of this division of the Vigils into two Nocturns for ordinary days, and three for Sundays and feast-days with six psalms and lessons for the first two Nocturns, three canticles and lessons for the third: this is exactly the structure of the Nocturns in the Benedictine Office to-day, and practically in the Roman Office (Regula, ix, x, xi). The very expression "Nocturna hora" signifies the night Offices, recited by him twice (xvi, xvi). He also uses the term Nocturna hæra in speaking of the Office of the Vigils. The proof which E. Warren tries to draw from the "Antiphonary of Bangor" to show that the Celtic Church, according to a custom older than the Benedictino-Roman practice, there were three separate Nocturns or Vigils, is based on a confusion of the three Offices, "Initium noctis", "Nocturna", and "Matutina", which are not the three that correspond to the Office of Evendeite, of the Vigil, and of Lauds (cf. The Tablet, 16 Dec., 1893, p. 972; Bäumer-Biron, in, ra, I, 263, 264).
The division of the Vigils into two or three Nocturns in the Roman Church dates back at least to the fifth century. We may conjecture that St. Benedict, who, in the composition of the monastic cursus, followed the arrangement of the Roman Office so closely, must have been inspired equally by the Roman customs in the composition of his Office. Whatever doubt there may be as to priority, it is certain that the Roman system bears a strong analogy to that of the Nocturns in the Benedictine Office at the present day, and the differences subsisting are almost entirely the result of transformations or additions, which the Roman Office has been subjected to in the course of time. On Sundays and feast-days there are three Nocturns, as in the Benedictine Office. Each Nocturn comprises three psalms, and the first Nocturn of Sunday has three groups of four psalms each. The feasts of the dead only one Nocturn consisting of twelve psalms; each Nocturn has, as usual, three lessons. For the variations which have occurred in the course of time in the composition of the Nocturns, and for the different usages see Matins. These different usages are recorded by Dom Martin. For the terms, "Nocturnales Libri," "Nocturna," see Du Cange, "Glos- sarium Inflamme Latinatis," s. v., v.v.

Noe [Heb. נوء (Noah), "rest"; Gr. ὅνα; Lat. Noè], the ninth patriarch of the Sethite line, grandson of Mathusala and son of Lamech, who with his family was saved from the Deluge and thus became the second person of the human race after Adam. The name Noé was given to him because of his father's expectation regarding him. "This same", said Lamech on naming him, "shall comfort us from the works and labours of our hands on [or more correctly "from", i.e. which come from] the earth, which the Lord hath cursed." Most commentators consider Lamech's words as the expression of a hope, or as a prophecy, that the child would in some way be instrumental in removing the curse pronounced against Adam (Gen., iii, 17 sqq.). Others rather fancifully see in them a reference to Noe's future discovery of wine which cheers the heart of man. Again, with greater probability, take them as expressing merely a natural hope on the part of Lamech that his son would become the support and comfort of his parents, and enable them to enjoy rest and peace in their later years. Amid the general corruption which resulted from the marriages "of the sons of God" with "the daughters of men" (Gen., vi, 2 sqq.), that is of the Sethites with Canaanite women, "Noé was a just and perfect man in his generations" and "walked with God" (vi, 9). Hence, when God decreed to destroy men from the face of the earth, he "found grace before the Lord." According to the common interpretation of Gen., vi, 3, Noé first received divine warning of the impending destruction one hundred and twenty years before it occurred, and therefore when he was four hundred and eighty years old (Heb. 11, 5); he does not, however, receive at this time any details as to the nature of the catastrophe. After he reached the age of five hundred years three sons, Sem, Cham, and Japheth, were born to him (vi, 10). These had grown to manhood and had taken wives, when Noé was informed of God's intention to destroy men by a flood, and received directions to build an ark in which he and his wife, his sons and their wives, and representatives, male and female, of the various kinds of animals and birds, were to be saved (vi, 13-21). How long before the Deluge this revelation was imparted to him, it is impossible to say; it can hardly have been more than seventy-five years (cf. vii, 11), and probably was considerably less.

Noé had announced the impending judgment and had exhorted to repentance (II Pet., ii, 5), but no heed was given to his word. Three months later (Mat., xxiv, 37 sqq.; Luke xvi, 26, 27; I Pet., iii, 20), and when the time arrived, no one except Noé's immediate family found refuge in the ark. Seven days before the waters began to cover the earth, Noé was commanded to enter the ark with his wife and his three sons and their wives, and to take with him seven pairs of all clean, and two pairs of all unclean animals and birds (vii, 1-4). It has been objected that, even though the most liberal value is allowed for the cubit, the ark would have been too small to lodge at least two pairs of every species of animal and bird. But there can be no difficulty if, as is now generally admitted, the Deluge was not geographically universal (see Deluge; Arc). After leaving the ark Noé built an altar, and taking of all clean animals and birds, offered holocausts upon it. God accepted the sacrifice, and made a covenant with Noé, and through him with all mankind, that He would not again destroy the earth or destroy man by another deluge. The rainbow would for all times be a sign and a reminder of this covenant. He further renewed the blessing which He had pronounced on Adam (Gen., i, 28), and confirmed it on all dominion over animals which He had granted to man. In virtue of this dominion man may use animals for food, but the flesh may not be eaten with the blood (viii, 20-ix, 17). Noé now gave himself to agriculture, and planted a vineyard. Being unacquainted with the effects of fermented grape-juice, he drank of it too freely and was made drunk. Cham found his father lying naked in his tent, and made a jest of his condition before his brothers (viii, 21). But Noé recovered him with a mantle. On hearing of the occurrence Noé cursed Canaan, as Cham's heir, and blessed Sem and Japheth. He lived three hundred and fifty years after the Deluge, and died at the age of nine hundred and fifty years (ix, 20-29).

In the later books of Scripture Noé is represented as the model of the just man (Eccles., xiv, 17; Ezek., xiv, 14, 20), and as an exemplar of faith (Heb., xi, 7). In the Fathers and tradition he is considered as the type and figure of the Saviour, because through him the human race was saved from destruction and reconciled with God (Eccles., xiv, 17, 18). Moreover, the ark which built the ark, the only means of salvation from the Deluge, so Christ established the Church, the only means of salvation in the spiritual order.

The Babylonian account of the Deluge in many points closely resembles that of the Bible. Four cuneiform recensions of it have been discovered, of which, however, three are only short fragments. The complete story is found in the Gilgamesh Epic (Tablet xi) discovered by G. Smith among the ruins of the library of Assurbanipal in 1872. Another version is given by Berosus. In the Gilgamesh poem the hero of the story is Ut-napishtim (or Šît-napišti, as some read it), surnamed Ut-napishtim "the very clever"; in two of the fragments he is simply styled Atra-basis, which name is also found in Berosus under the Greek form Xissuthros. The story in brief is as follows: A council of the gods having decreed the destruction of mankind, the god Ea warns Ut-napishtim, and bids him build a ship in which to save himself and the seed of all kinds of life. Ut-napishtim builds the ship (of which, according to one version, Ea traces the plan on the ground), and places in it his family, his dependents, artisans, and domestic as well as wild animals, after which he shuts the door. The storm lasts six days; on the seventh the flood begins to subside. The ship steered by the helman Dumuzi lands on Mt. Niṣr. After seven days Ut-napishtim sends forth a dove and a swallow, which, finding no resting-place for their feet return to the ark, and then a raven, which feeds on dead bodies and does not return. On leaving the ship, Ut-napisitim offers a sacrifice to the gods, who smell the ghastly odour and gather like flies over the sacrifice. He and his wife are then admitted among the gods. The story as given by Berossus comes down from the Babylonian poetic tradition. The textual evidence for the Biblical account is derived from the Babylonian. But the differences are so many and so significant that this view must be pronounced untenable. The Scriptural story is a parallel and independent form of a common tradition.

Nogaret, Guillaume de, b. about the middle of the thirteenth century at St. Felix-en-Lauragais; d. 1314; he was one of the chief counsellors of Philip the Fair, of France (1285-1314), said to be descended from an Albigenian family and was a protégé of the lawyer, Pierre Flotte. He studied law, winning a doctorate and professorship, and was appointed, in 1294, royal judge of the seneschal’s court of Beaucarne. In 1299 the title of knight was conferred on him by Philip the Fair. Imbued, from his study of Roman law, with the doctrine of the absolute supremacy of the king, no scruple restrained Nogaret when the royal power was in question, and his influence was apparent in the struggle between Philip and Boniface VIII. In 1300 Philip, who had aspired to the Holy See to ex-solve his alliance with Albert of Austria, usurper of the Empire. Nogaret, according to his own account, remonstrated with the pope, who replied in vigorous language. After the death of Pierre Flotte at the battle of Courtrai (1302), Nogaret became chief adviser and evil genius of the king. On the publication of the Bull “Unam Sanctam” he was charged with directing the conflict against the Holy See (Feb-uary, 1303). At the Assembly of the Louvre (2 March, 1303), he bitterly attacked the pope, and later, allying himself with the pope’s Italian enemies (the Florentine banker, Musciatto de Frangini, and Stefano Colonna, the head of the Chiavelli party), he surprised Boniface in his palace at Anagni and arrested him after subjecting him to outrageous treatment (7 September). But the insurgents released the Pope, whose death (11 October) saved Nogaret from severe retribution. Early in 1304, at Languedoc, he explained his actions to the king, and received considerable property as recompense. Philip even sent him with an embassy to the new pope, Benedict XI, who refused to absolve him from the excommunication he had incurred. Clement V, however, ab-soved him in 1311.

Nogaret played a decisive part in the trial of the Templars. On 22 September, 1307, at Mauluisson, Philip made him keeper of the seal and the same day the Royal Council issued a warrant for the arrest of the Templars, which was executed on 12 October; Nogaret himself arrested the Knights of the Temple in Paris and drew up the proclamation justifying the crime. It was he who directed all the measures that ended in the execution of Jacques de Molai and the principal Templars (1314). The same year Nogaret became a prisoner in England. In drawing up the documents by which he sought to ruin his Adversaries, undertook to justify the condemnation of the Templars by announcing the plans for a new crusade, the expenses of which were to be defrayed by the confiscated goods of the Order. In this Latin document, addressed to Clement V, the author attributes the failure of the crusades to the Templars and declares that Philip the Fair could only have been saved successfully, provided that he obtained the help of all the Christian princes to secure the funds required for the expedition; all the property of the Templars that should be given to the King, all treasures left for the crusades and all the benefits in Christendom should be taxed. The other military orders, the abbey, the churches should retain only the property necessary for their support, the surplus should be given for the Crusade. If he ton not take them seriously, it was probably intended as a solemn hoax. Nogaret’s influence may be seen in the trial for sorcery against Guichard, bishop of Troyes (1308). A jealous but unscrupulous royal partisan, a fierce and bitter enemy, Nogaret died before Philip the Fair, at the time when the regime he had devoted himself to establishing was beginning to be attacked on all sides.

Nola, Diocese of (NOLANA), suffragan of Naples. The city of Nola in the Italian Province of Caserta, in Campania, is said to have been founded by the Etruscans or by Chalcideans from Cumæ. On the most ancient coins it is called Cumae Nolana. In the Napoleonic War (311 B.C.) the town was taken by the Romans in the Punic War it was twice besieged by Hannibal (215 and 214), and on both occasions splendidly defended by Marcellus. In the time of the Wars of the Roses, the latter took Nola, in 90 B.C., but, notwithstanding their brilliant defence of the city, it was retaken from them in the year 89, and its recapture put an end to that war. The city was sacked by Spartacus, for which reason Augustus and Vespasian sent colonies there. In A.D. 410 it was sacked by Alaric, in 455 by the Vandals, in 806 and again in 904 by the Saracens. From the time of Charles I of Anjou to the middle of the fifteenth century, Nola was a feudal state. In the town of the Orea battle of Nola (1459) is famous for the clever stratagem by which John of Anjou defeated Alfonso of Aragon. Nola furnished a considerable portion of the antiquities in the museum of Naples, especially beautiful Greek vases. In the seminary there is a collection of ancient inscriptions, among which are some Oscan tablets. The ruins of an amphitheatre and other ancient remains are yet to be seen in this city, where the Emperor Augustus, who died there, had a famous temple. Nola was the birthplace of Giordano Bruno, of Luigi Tasso, the philosopher and poet, of the sculptor Giovanni Meridio, whose work is well represented in the cathedral, and of the physician Ambrogeo.

The ancient Christian memories of Nola are connected with the neighbouring Cimitile, the name of which recalls the site of an ancient cemetery. There is the basilica of St. Felix, the martyr, built, and poetically described by St. Paulinus, bishop of the city, who shows that no sanctuary, after the tombs of the Holy Apostles Peter and Paul, was visited by so many pilgrims as came to this church. Nola was between the middle of the second century and the middle of the third, was the first Bishop of Nola. The city has several other martyrs, among them, Sts. Reparatus, Faustulus, and Acacius, companions of St. Januarius, besides St. Felix, confessor. Other bishops of Nola were St. Martinus (about the year 300); St. Francis, who died in 328, and, according to Mommesin, in 252; St. Quadvuldeus, who died in 387 and was succeeded by St. Paulinus. The body of the last-named saint was taken to Benevento in 839, and in the year 1000 was given to Otho III by the people of Benevento in exchange for the body of St. Bartholomew; in 1562 it was restored to Naples, and in 1601 the archbishop St. Adeodatus flourished at Nola; his metrical epistle has been preserved. In 148 Joannes Talio, Orthodox Patriarch of Alexandria, having been thrown from his horse by a Nolitan, was made Bishop of Nola. It was St. Paulinus III (c. 503) who became a slave to free a widow's son; his heroic deed was afterwards attributed to St. Paulinus I. Bishop Lupicinus (736) re-erected the Gothic cathedral, which was finished by Bishop Gian Antonio Boccarelli (1469). Antonio Scarampi (1549) founded the seminary and introduced the reforms of the Council of Trent. Fabrizio Gallo (1685) founded several charitable institutions; G. B. Lancellotti (1615-56), who was Apostolic nuncio to Poland from 1622 to 1627, did much for the diocese; Francis M. Carafa (1704), a Theatine, was named Bishop of Nola in the 18th century. Traiano Caracciolo (1738) constructed the new seminary. The diocese is a suffragan of Naples; it has 86 parishes, with 200,000 inhabitants, 9 religious houses of men, 19 of women, several educational establishments and asylums, and four monthly and bi-monthly periodicals.
NOLA

Nola, Giovanni Mariano da, sculptor and architect, b., it is said, of a leather merchant named Giuseppe, at Nola, near Naples, 1488; d. 1558 (?). He studied under Agnolo Aniello Fiore and then went to Rome, being attracted by the fame of Michelangelo. His chief works were at studia buildings. On his return to Naples he was employed in churches, palaces, and piazzas. Among his works may be mentioned the monument of Galeazzo Pandone in S. Domenico (1514); the tombs of the three youthes Jacopo, Ascanio, and Sigismondo (who died of poison) in their family church of S. Severino (1516); various sculptures in the church of Monte Oliveto (1524), notably a fine group of the Mother and Child with infant St. John and, in the choir, tombs of Alphonse II and Guerrero Orilla; in the church of S. Chiara, the simple and touching recumbent figure of the girl Antonia Gandino (1530). Outside of Italy the noble monument of the Spanish Duke of Cardona (about 1532) in the Franciscan church of Belpuch is among the best known. The decorations made by Nola for the reception of Emperor Charles V in Naples (1535) are still to be seen on the Porta Capuana. In 1537 he carved a beautiful standing Madonna and two Saints for the church of S. Domenico Maggiore. In 1553 the Spanish viceroy, Peter of Toledo, caused him to erect the mausoleum to himself and his wife in the church of S. Giacomo degli Spagnuoli. Further works of Nola’s, also in Naples, are the Pietà and tomb of a child, Andrea Cenara, in the church of S. Severino; a Madonna della Misericordia, S. Pietro ad Aram, an altar-piece at S. Aniello, representing the Mother and Child seated on a crescent moon; and a fine set of wooden bas-reliefs depicting the life of Christ, in the sacristy of the Annunziata. Nola is one of the most justly lauded representatives of a rather poor school of Renaissance sculpture in Naples.

He went later to Paris to prepare for the priesthood. In 1728 he received the deaconship and applied immediately for permission to preach. Soon love of science became uppermost and together with Dufay and Roli, Bishop of Nola, his metrical epistle has been preserved. In 1484 Joannes Talio, Orthodox Patriarch of Alexandria, having been thrown from his horse by a Nolitan, was made Bishop of Nola. Nominalism, Realism, Conceptualism. These terms are used to designate the theories that have been proposed as solutions of one of the most important questions in philosophy, often referred to as the problem of universals, which, while it was a favourite subject for discussion in ancient times, and especially in the Middle Ages, is still prominent in modern and contemporary philosophy. We propose to discuss in this article: I. The Nature of the Problem and the Suggested Solutions; II. The Principal Historic Forms of Nominalism, Realism, and Conceptualism; III. The Claims of Moderate Realism.

I. The Problem and the Suggested Solutions. The problem of universals is the problem of the correspondence of our intellectual concepts to things existing outside our intellect. Whereas external objects are determinate, individual, formally exclusive of all multiplicity, our concepts or mental representations offer us the realities independent of all particular determination; they are abstract and universal. The question, therefore, is to discover to what extent the concepts of the mind correspond to the things they represent; how the flower we conceive represents the flower existing in nature; in a word, whether our ideas are faithful and have an objective reality. Possible solutions of the problem have been offered. It is necessary to describe them carefully, as writers do not always use the terms in the same sense.
A. Exaggerated Realism holds that there are universal concepts in the mind and universal things in nature. There is, therefore, a strict parallelism between the being in nature and the being in thought, since the external object is clothed with the same character of universality that we discover in the concept. This is a simple solution, but one that runs counter to the dictates of common sense.

B. Nominalism. Exaggerated Realism invents a world of reality corresponding exactly to the attributes of the world of thought. Nominalism, on the contrary, models the concept on the external object, which it holds to be individual and particular. Nominalism consequently denies the existence of abstract and universal concepts, and refuses to admit that the intellect has the power of engendering them. What are called general ideas are only names, mere verbal designations, serving as labels for a collection of things or a series of particular events. Hence the term Nominalism. Neither Exaggerated Realism nor Nominalism finds any difficulty in establishing a correspondence between the thing in thought and the thing existing in nature, since, in different ways, they both postulate perfect harmony between the two. The real difficulty appears when we assign the attributes to the thing in nature and to the thing in thought; if we hold that the one is individual and the other universal. An antinomy then arises between the world of reality and the world as represented in the mind, and we are led to inquire how the general notion of flower conceived by the mind is applicable to the particular and determinate flowers of nature.

C. Conceptualism admits the existence within us of abstract and universal concepts (whereas its name indicates), but it holds that we do not know whether or not the mental objects have any foundation outside our minds or whether in nature the individual objects possess determinate and exactly the same attributes as we conceive as realized in each of them. The concepts have an ideal value; they have no real value, or at least we do not know whether they have a real value.

D. Modern Realism finally, declares that there are universal concepts representing faithfully realities that are not universal. "How can there be harmony between the former and the latter? The latter are particular, but we have the power of representing them to ourselves the abstract type when the intellect considers it reflectively and contrasts it with the particular subject in which it is realized or capable of being realized, is attributable indubitably to any and all of them. This application of the abstract type to the individuals is its universality" (Mercier, "Critériologie," Louvain, 1906, p. 345).

II. THE PRINCIPAL HISTORICAL FORMS OF NOMINALISM, REALISM, AND CONCEPTUALISM.—A. In Greek Philosophy.—The conciliation of the one and the many, the changing and the permanent, was a favourite problem with the Greeks; it leads to the problem of universals. The typical affirmation of Exaggerated Realism, the most outspoken ever made, appears in Plato's philosophy; the real must possess the attributes of necessity, universality, unity, and immutability which we have found in our intellectual representations. And as the sensible world contains only the contingent, the particular, the unstable, it follows that the real exists outside and above the sensible world. Plato calls it the idea. The idea is absolutely stable and exists by itself (ἔρως ἕκας, ἀναμικτή ἀκίνητος ἔμφασις) isolated (αὐτογονή) from the phenomenal world, distinct from the Divine and the human intellect. Following logically the deductive principle of his Realm, Plato makes an ideas-entity correspond to each of our abstract representations. Not only natural species (man, horse) but artificial products (bed), not only substances (man) but properties (white, just), relations (double, triple), and even negations and nothingness have a corresponding idea in the supersensible world. "What makes one and one two, is a participation of the dyad (δύα), and what makes one one is a participation of the monad (μόνον)" (Phaedo, 25a).

The exaggerated Realism of Plato, investing the real being with the attributes of the being in thought, is the principal doctrine of his metaphysics. Aristotle broke away from these exaggerated views of his master and formulated the main doctrines of Moderate Realism. The real is not, as Plato says, some vague entity of which the sensible world is only the shadow; it dwells in the midst of the sensible world. Individual substance (this horse, this man) alone has reality; it alone can exist. The universal is not a thing in itself; it is immanent in individuals and is multiplied in all the representatives of a class. As to the form of universality of our concepts (man, just), it is a product of our subjective consideration. The objects of our generic and specific representations can certainly be called substances (ἄρτια), when they designate the fundamental (μέγα) in unity" (Phaedo, 25a). These are ἄρτια (second substances), and by that Aristotle means precisely that this attribute of universal representation, which belongs to the substance (thing in itself), is the outcome of our subjective elaboration. This theorem of Aristotle, which completes the metaphysics of Heraclitus (denial of the permanent) by means of that of Parmenides (denial of change), is the antithesis of Platonism, and may be considered one of the finest pronouncements of Peripateticism. It was through this wise doctrine that the Stagirite exercised his ascendency over all later thought.

After Aristotle Greek philosophy formulated a third answer to the problem of universals. Conceptualism. This solution appears in the teaching of the Platonists, which, as is known, was adopted by Aristotle among the three original systems of the great philosophical age of the Greeks. Sensation is the principle of all knowledge, and thought is only a collective sensation. Zenon compared sensation to an open hand with the fingers separated; experience or multiple sensation to the open hand with the fingers bent; the general concept born of experience to the closed fist. Now, concepts, reduced to general sensations, have as their core the real and external thing reached by the senses (γνώσει), but the λόγος or the reality conceived; whether this has any real value we do not know. The Aristotelian School adopted Aristotelian Realism, but the need for it was subordinated to the Platonic theory of ideas which they transformed into an emanationistic and monistic conception of the universe.

B. In the Philosophy of the Middle Ages.—For a long time it was thought that the problem of universals monopolized the attention of the philosophers of the Middle Ages, and that the dispute of the Nominalists and Realists absorbed all their energies. In reality that question, although prominent in the Middle Ages, was far from being the only one dealt with by these philosophers.

(1) From the commencement of the Middle Ages till the end of the 12th century. — It is impossible to classify the philosophers of the beginning of the Middle Ages exactly as Nominalists, Moderate and Exaggerated Realists, or Conceptualists. And the reason is that the problem of the Universal is very complex. It not merely involves the metaphysics of the individual and of the universal, but also raises important questions in ideology—questions about the genesis and validity of ideas. But the whole subject, unskilled in such delicate matters, did not perceive these various aspects of the problem. It did not grow up spontaneously in the Middle Ages; it was bequeathed in a text of Porphyry's "Isagoge," a text that seemed simple and innocent, though somewhat obscure, but one which force of circumstances made the necessary starting-point of the earliest medieval speculations about the Universals.

Porphyry divides the problem into three parts: (1) Do genera and species exist outside the mind and are they the same in the human mind, in the mind of an angel, and in the mind of God? (2) If they exist outside the mind, are they contained in the mind or consist in the mind? (3) Do genera and species consist in the mind, or do they exist outside the mind?

"Mox de generibus et speciebus illud quidem sive substanstiae a nobis necessarijs intellectus posita sinta, sive substanstiae corporalis sint an incorporalis, et utrum species sensibiles an incorporeus sensibiles est et circa hac substantia, dicere recusabo." Historically, the first of those questions was discussed prior to the others: the latter could have arisen only in the event of denying an exclusively subjective character to universal realities. Now the first question was whether genera and species are objective realities or not; sive substanstiae sive in intellectus posita sinta? In other words, the sole point in debate was the absolute reality of the universals: is their relation to the understanding, was not in question. The text from Porphyry, apart from the solutions he elsewhere proposed, is an inadequate statement of the question; for it takes account only of the objective aspect and neglects the psychological standpoint which alone can give the key to the true solution. Moreover, Porphyry, after proposing his interrogations in the "laagoge", refuses to offer an answer ("dicere recusabo"). Boethius, in his two commentaries, gives replies that are vague and scarcely consistent. In the second commentary, which is the more important one, he holds that genera and species are both substantia and intellect (1st question), the similarity of things being the basis (subjectum) both of their individuality in nature and their universality in the human mind; that genera and species are incorporeal not by nature but by abstraction (2nd question), and that they exist both inside and outside the things of sense (3rd question).

This was not sufficiently clear for beginners, though we can see in it the basis of the Aristotelian solution of the problem. The early Scholastics faced the problem as proposed by Porphyry: limiting the controversy to genera and species, and its solutions to the alternatives suggested by the first question: Do the objects of the concepts (i.e., genera and species) exist in nature (substantia), or are they mere abstractions (nuda intellecta)? Are they, or are they not, things? Those who replied in the affirmative got the title of Realists; the others that of Nominalists or Nominalists. The former, or the Realists, more numerous in the early Middle Ages (Frigidus, Rémy d'Auxerre, and John Scotus Erganus in the ninth century, Gerbert and Odo of Tournai in the tenth, and William of Champeaux in the twelfth) attribute to each genus and each species a universal essence (substantia), to which all the subordinate individuals are tributary.

The Nominalists, who should be called rather the anti-Realists, assert on the contrary that the individual alone exists, and that the universals are not things real in the universal state, in nature, or substantia. And as they adopt the alternative of Porphyry, they conclude that the universals are nuda intellecta (that is, purely intellectual representations).

Rosenberg, who had made a study of the Middle Ages, thought that Roscelin of Compiègne did not go beyond these energetic protests against Realism, and that he is not a Nominalist in the exact sense we have attributed to the word above, for we have to depend on others for an expression of his views, as there is extant no text of his which would justify us in saying that he denied the intellect the power of forming general concepts, distinct in their nature from sensation. Indeed, it is difficult to comprehend how Nominalism could exist at all in the Middle Ages, as it is possible only in a sensist philosophy that denies all natural distinction between sensation and the intellectual concept. Furthermore there is little evidence of Sensism in the Middle Ages, and, as Sensism and Scholasticism are so mutually exclusive, the different anti-Realist systems anterior to the thirteenth century are in fact only more or less imperfect forms of the Moderate Realism towards which the efforts of men were tending, phases through which the same ideas passed in its organic evolution. These stages are numerous, and several have been studied in recent monographs (e.g. the doctrine of Gauthier de Mortagne, Indifferentism, and the theory of the collection). The decisive stage is marked by Abélard (1079-1142), who points out clearly the rôle of abstraction, and how we represent to ourselves elements common to different things, capable of realization in an indefinite number of individuals of the same species, while the individual alone exists. From that to Moderate Realism there is but a step; it was sufficient to show that a real form and substance was assigned to the abstract representation of the individual thing. It is impossible to say who was the first in the twelfth century to develop the theory in its entirety. Moderate Realism appears fully in the writings of John of Salisbury.

C. From the Thirteenth Century.—In the thirteenth century all the great Scholastics solved the problem of the universals by the theory of Moderate Realism (Thomas Aquinas, Bonaventure, Duns Scotus), and were in accord with Averroes and Avicenna, the great Arab commentators of Aristotle, whose works had recently passed into the universities by means of commentaries. St. Thomas formulates the doctrine of Moderate Realism in precise language, and for that reason alone we can give the name of Thomistic Realism to this doctrine (see below). With William of Champeaux and the Terminist School appear the strictly conceptual solutions of the problem. The abstract and universal concept is a sign (signum), also called a term (terminus; hence the name Terminist School), given to the system, but it has no real value, for the abstract and the universal do not exist in any way in nature and have no fundamentum outside the mind. The universal concept (intention secundae) has as its object internal representations, formed by the understanding, and nothing external corresponding can be attributed. The rôle of the universals is to serve as a label, to hold the place (supponere) in the mind of the multitude of things to which it can be attributed. Once the concept was fixed, the conceptualism would be frankly subjectivist, if, together with the abstract concept, he did not admit within us intuitive concepts which reach the individual thing, as it exists in nature.

D. In Modern and Contemporary Philosophy.—We find an unequivocal affirmation of Nominalism in Positivism. For Hume, Stuart Mill, Spencer, and Taine there is strictly speaking no universal concept. The notion, to which we lend universality, is only a collection of individual perceptions, a collective sensation, "un nom compris" (Taine), "a term in habitual association with many other particulars" (Hume), "un savoir potentiel emmagasiné" (Ribot). The problem of the correspondence of the concept to reality is thus at once solved, or rather it is suppressed and replaced by the psychological question: What is the origin of the illusion that induces us to attribute a distinct nature to the general concept, though the latter is only an elaborated sensation? Kant distinctly affirms the existence within us of abstract and general notions and the distinction between them and sensations, but these doctrines are joined with a characteristic Phenomenalism which constitutes the most original form of modern Conceptualism. Universal and necessary representations have no contact with external things, since they are produced exclusively by the structural functions (a priori forms) of our mind. Time and space, in which we frame all sensible impressions, cannot be obtained from experience, which is individual and contingent: they are things which arise from our mental organization. Consequently, we have no warrant for establishing a real correspondence between the world of our ideas and the world of reality. Science, which is only an elaboration of the data of sense in accordance with other structural determinations of the mind (the categories), becomes a subjective poem, which has a value only for us and not for a worldduration. A modern form of Platonism, which identifies the objects of universal ideas with the Divine ideas or the archetypes on which the world was fashioned. As to Moderate Realism, it remains the doctrine of all those who have returned to Aristotelianism or adopted the neo-Scholastic philosophy.

III. THE CHARS OF MODERATE REALISM.—This system recognizes the characteristics of external objects (particularity) with those of our intellectual representations (universality), and explains why science, though made up of abstractions, is the true sense for the world of reality. To understand this it suffices to grasp the real meaning of abstraction. When the mind apprehends the essence of a thing (quod est), the external object is perceived with the particular notes which attach to it in nature (esse in singularibus), and it is not yet marked with the attribute of generality which reflexion will bestow on it (esse in intellectu). The abstract reality is apprehended with perfect indifference as regards both the individual state and the universal state within: abstrahit ab utroque esse, secundum qua naturas lapidum, cucujusque alius naturae quantum ad ea tamen quae per se comportant illi naturae (St. Thomas, “Quodlibeta”, Q. i, a. 1). Now, what is thus conceived in the absolute state (absolutum considerando) is nothing else than the reality incarnate in any given individual: in truth, the reality, represented in my concept of man, is in Socrates or in Plato. There is nothing in the abstract concept that is not applicable to every individual: if the abstract concept is inadequate, because it does not contain the singular notes of each being, it is none the less faithful, or at least its abstract character does not prevent it from corresponding accurately to the object existing in nature. It is the universal form of the concept, a moment’s consideration shows that it is subsequent to the abstraction and is the fruit of reflexion: “ratio speciei acutissime naturae humanae”. Whence it follows that the universality of the concept as such is the work purely of the intellect: “unde intellectus est qui facit universalitatem in rebus” (St. Thomas, “De ente et essentia”, iv).

Concerning Nominalism, Conceptualism, and Exaggerated Realism, a few general considerations must suffice. Nominalism, which is irreconcilable with a Scholastic philosophy and for that very reason with Scholasticism as we all, presupposes the ideological theory that the abstract concept does not differ essentially from sensation, of which it is only a transformation. The Nominalism of Hume, Stuart Mill, Spencer, Huxley, and Taine is of no greater value than the idea of a real and continuing mental operation—the simple reproduction of sensible or empirical representations with abstraction properly so called and sensible analogy with the process of universalization. The Aristotelians recognize both of these mental operations, but they distinguish carefully between them. As to Kant, all the bonds that might connect the concept with the external world are destroyed in his Phenomenalism. Kant is unable to explain why one and the same sensible impression starts or sets in operation now this, now that category; his a priori forms are unintelligible according to his own principles, since they are beyond experience. Moreover, he confuses real time and space, which alone are general and without limit. For in truth we do not create wholesale the object of our knowledge, but we beg it within us under the causal influence of the object that reveals itself to us. Ontologism, which is akin to Platonic Realism, arbitrarily identifies the ideal types in our intellect, which come to us from the sensible world by means of abstraction, with the ideal types containing the essence of God. Now, when we form our first abstract ideas we do not yet know God. We are so ignorant of Him that we must employ these first ideas to prove a posteriori His existence. Ontologism has lived its life, and our age so enamoured of observation and experiment will scarcely return to the dreams of Plato.

Nomination.—The various methods of designating persons for ecclesiastical benefices or offices have been described under BENEFICIAL INSTITUTION, CANONICAL. All these methods are more or less included in the ordinary sense of the term nomination; but in its strict canonical sense, nomination is defined as the designation of a person for an ecclesiastical benefice or office made by the competent civil authority and conferring on the person named the right to be canonically instituted by the ecclesiastical superior. It follows the rules of pastoral presentation, being based on the same grounds as the right of patronage, viz. the endowment of churches or benefices by kings, princes, or communities. Its method of action is designed to keep the prerogatives of the two powers clearly separated, and to prevent any one intervention of the civil power taking effect in the free choice of a fit person, the spiritual jurisdiction being reserved intact to the ecclesiastical superior, who alone can give canonical institution. At the present time appointments to benefices by right of nomination, especially to bishoprics, is generally settled by negotiation and previous understanding between the two powers. Under the old regime the nominated person himself applied for canonical institution; the superior made inquiry as to the applicant and, unless the inquiry disclosed unworthiness or unfitness, granted canonical institution according to the customary forms—most often by consistorial preconization. Whatever procedure may be followed, the person named by the civil power has no spiritual jurisdiction until he has been canonically instituted; and if he should dare to intrude in the administration of the diocese under another title than the one by nomination by the secular authority, not only would all his acts be null and void, but he, and with him those who should have consented to his acts, would incur excommunication and other penalties; moreover would forfeit the right resulting from his nomination (Const. "Romanus pontifex", 28 Aug., 1873, and the texts there cited. Cf. EXCOMMUNICATION, vol. V, p. 801, col. 1).

The most important application of the right of nomi-
Nonantola, a former Benedictine monastery and prelature nullius, six miles north-east of Modena, founded in 752 by St. Anselm, Duke of Friuli, and richly endowed by the Aistulfans, King of the Lombards, in 926. Stephen II appointed Anselm its first abbot, and presented the relics of St. Sylvester to the abbey, named in consequence S. Sylvester de Nonantula. After the death of Aistulf (766), Anselm was banished to Monte Cassino by the new King, Desiderius, but was restored by Charlemagne after seven years. In 883 it was chosen as the place of a conference between Charles the Fat and Marinus I. ‘Up to 1035 it was an imperial monastery, and its discipline often suffered severely on account of imperial interference in the election of abbots. In the beginning of the Conflict of Investitures it sided with the emperor, until forced to submit to the pope by Mathilda of Tuscany in 1083. It finally declared itself openly for the pope in 1111. In that year the famous monk Placidus of Nonantola wrote his “De honore Ecclesiae,” one of the most able and important defences of the papal position that were written during the Conflict of Investitures. It is printed in Pez, “Thesaurus Anecdot. noviss.” (Augsburg, 1721), II, ii, 73 sq. The decline of the monastery began in 1410, when it came under the jurisdiction of commendatory abbots. In 1514 it came into the possession of the Cistercians, but continued to decline until it was finally suppressed by Clement XIII in 1708. Pius VII restored it 23 Jan., 1821, with the proviso that the prelates that the prelates thereto be nominated should belong to the Archbishop of Modena. In 1909 the exempt district comprised 42,980 inhabitants, 31 parishes, 91 churches and chapels, 62 secular priests and three religious congregations for women. The monastery itself was appropriated by the Italian Government in 1866.

Nonconformists, a name which, in its most general acceptation, denotes those refusing to conform with the authorized formularies and rites of the Established Church of England. The application of the term has varied somewhat with the successive phases of Anglican history. When the monarchy of Elizabeth to the middle of the seventeenth century it had not come into use as the name of a religious party, but the word “conform,” and the appellatives “conforming” and “non-conforming,” were becoming more and more common expressions to designate those members of the Puritan party who, disapproving of certain of the Anglican rites (namely, the use of the surplice, of the sign of the cross at baptism, of the ring in marriage, of the attitude of kneeling at the reception of the sacrament) and of the episcopal order of Church government, either resigned themselves to these usages because enjoined, or stood out against them at all costs. However from 1622 when the Fourth Act of Uniformity had the effect of ejecting from their benefices, acquired during the Commonwealth, a large number of ministers of Puritan proclivities, and of constraining them to ordain themselves as separatist sects, the term “Nonconformist” crystallized into the technical name for such sects.

History—The history of this cleavage in the ranks of English Protestantism goes back to the reign of Mary Tudor, when the Protestant leaders who were victorious under Edward VI retired to Frankfort, Zurich, and other Protestant centres on the continent, and quarreled among themselves, some inclining to the more moderate Lutheran or Zwinglian positions, others developing into uncompromising Calvinists. When the accession of Elizabeth attracted them back to England, the Calvinist section, which soon acquired the nickname of Puritans, was, at first, by far the stronger and the largest in numbers and the most in favour with the majority of the Protestant laity. Elizabeth, however, who had very little personal religion, preferred an episcopal to a presbyterian system, more at home with monarchism, and besides she had some taste for the ornate in public worship. Accordingly she caused the religious settlement, destined to last into our own times, to be made on the basis of episcopacy, with the retention of the principal forms of ritual so specified; and her favour was bespoken for prelates like Parker, who were prepared to aid her in carrying out this programme. For those who held Puritan views she had a natural dislike, to which at times gave forcible expression, but on the whole she saw the expediency of showing them some consideration, lest she should lose their support in her campaign against Catholicism.

These were the determining factors of the initial situation, out of which the subsequent history of English Protestantism has grown by a natural development. The result during Elizabeth’s reign was a state of oscillation between phases of repression and phases of indulgence, in meeting the persistent endeavours of the Puritans to make their own ideas dominant in the national Church. In 1559 the third Act of Uniformity was passed by which the practice of the Prayer Book was enjoined under severe penalties on all ministering as clergy in the country. In 1566, feeling that some concession to the strength of the Puritan opposition was necessary, Archbishop Parker, on an understanding with the queen, published certain Advertisements addressed to the clergy, requiring them to conform at least as regards wearing the surplice, kneeling at communion, using the font for baptism, and covering the communion table with a proper cloth. These Advertisements were partially enforced in some dioceses, and led to some deprivations, but that their effect was small is clear from the boldness with which the Puritans took up a more advanced position a few years later, and demanded the substitution of a presbyterian régime. This was the demand of Thomas Cartwright in his “Admonitions,” published in 1572, and followed in 1580 by his Book of Discipline, in which he collaborated with Thomas Travers. In this latter book he pronounced an ingenious theory of classes, or boards of clergy for each district, to which the episcopal powers should be transferred, to be exercised by them on presbyterian principles, to the bishops being reserved only the purely mechanical ceremony of ordination. So great was the influence of the text, as it were, to try that they were able to introduce for a time this strange system in one or two places.

In 1588 the Marprelate tracts were published, and by the violence of their language against the queen and the bishops stirred up the queen to take drastic measures. Perry and Udal, authors of the tracts, were tried and executed, and Cartwright was imprisoned; whilst in 1683 an act was passed inflicting the punishment of imprisonment, to be followed by exile in case of a second offence, on all who refused to attend the parish church, or held separatist meetings. This caused a division in the party; as many, though secretly retaining their faith, persisted in outward conformity to the laws of their benefices, whilst the extremists of the party left the country and settled in Holland. There they were for a time called Brownists, after one who had been their leader in separation, but later they took the name of Independents, as indicating their peculiar theory of the governmental independence of each separate congregation. From these Brownists came the "Pilgrim Fathers" who, on 6 December, 1620, sailed from Plymouth in the "Mayflower", and settled in New England.

With the death of Elizabeth the hopes of the Puritans revived. Their system of doctrine and government was dominant in Scotland, and they hoped that the Scottish King James might be induced to extend it to England. So they met him on his way to London with their Millenary Petition, so called though the signatures numbered only about eight hundred. In this document they were prudent enough not to raise the question of episcopal government, but contented themselves for the time with a request that the ritual customs which they disliked might be discontinued in the State Church. James promised them a conference which met the next year at Hampton Court to consider their grievances, and in which they were represented by four of their leaders. These had some short encounters with the bishops and Anglican divines, but, whilst the Puritans were set more on domination than toleration, the king was wholly on the side of the Anglicans, who in this hour of their triumph took no notice of the conference. The result was to prove abortive, and the very same year Archbishop Bancroft, with the king's sanction, carried through Convocation and at once enforced the canons known as those of 1604. The purpose of this campaign was to restore the use of the rites in question, which, in defiance of the existing law, the Puritan incumbents had succeeded in putting down in a great number of parishes. This result was effected to the extent for the time, but a quarter of a century later, when Laud began his campaign for the restoration of decency and order, in other words, for the enforcement of the customs to which the Puritans objected, he was met by an opposition so widespread and deep-rooted that, though ultimately it had lasting results, the immediate effect was to bring about his own fall and contribute largely to the outbreak of the Rebellion, the authors of which were approximately co-extensive with the Puritan party.

During the Civil War and the Commonwealth the Puritan mobs wrecked the churches, the bishops were imprisoned and the primates beheaded, the supremacy over the Church was transferred from the Crown to the Parliament, the Solemn League and Covenant was accepted for the whole nation, and the Westminster Assembly, set up entirely by Puritans, was appointed as a permanent committee for the reform of the Church. Next the Anglican clergy were turned out of their benefices to make way for Puritans, in whose behalf the Presbyterian form of government was introduced by Parliament. But though this was the authorised settlement, it was found impossible to check the vagaries of individual opinion. A religious frenzy seized the country, and sects holding the most extravagant views sprang up and built themselves conventicles. There was licence for all, save for popery and prematurity, which were now persecuted with equal severity. When Cromwell attained to power a struggle set in between the Parliament, which was predominantly Presbyterian, and the army, which was predominantly Independent. The disgust of all sober minds with the resulting pandemonium had much to do with creating the desire for the Restoration, and when this was accomplished in 1660 measures were at once taken to undo the work of the interregnum. The bishops were restored to their sees, and the vacancies filled. The Savoy Conference with the precedents of the Hampton Court Conference of 1604, but proved similarly abortive. The Convocation in 1662 revised the Prayer Book in an anti-Puritan direction, and the Declaration of Breda notwithstanding, it was at once enforced. All holding benefices in the country were to use this revised Prayer Book on and after the Feast of St. Bartholomew of that year. It was through this crisis that the term Nonconformist obtained its technical meaning. When the feast came round a large number who refused to conform were evicted. It is in dispute between Nonconformist and Anglican writers how many these were, and what were their characters: the Nonconformist writers (see Calamy, "Life of Baxter") maintain that they exceeded 2000, while Kennedy and others reduce that number considerably, contending that in the majority of cases the hardship was not so great. It must also be acknowledged that the victims were suffering only what they, in the days of their power, had inflicted on their opponents, for many of whom the ejection of the Puritans meant a return to their own. The fact that they organized themselves outside the Established Church under the name of Nonconformists, naturally made them the more offensive to the authorities of Church and State. In 1661 the Corporation Act incapacitated from holding office in any corporation all who did not first qualify by taking the sacrament according to the Anglican rite. This Act inflicted the gravest penalties on all who took part in any private religious service at which more than five persons, in addition to the family, were present; in 1665 the Five Mile Act made liable to imprisonment any Nonconformist minister who, not having taken an oath of non-resistance, came within five miles of a town without obtaining leave; and in 1673 the scope of the Corporation Act was extended by the Test Act.

In 1672 Charles II attempted to mitigate the lot of the Nonconformists by publishing a Declaration of Indulgence in which he used in their favour the dispensing power, still then recognized as vested in the Crown. But Parliament, meeting the next year, forced him to withdraw this Declaration, and in return passed the Test Act, which extended the scope of the Corporation Act. James II, though despotist and tactless in his methods like all the Stuarts, was, whatever prejudiced historians have said to the contrary, a serious believer in religious toleration for all, and was, in fact, the first who sought to impress that ideal on the legislation of his country. By his two Declarations of Indulgence, in 1687-88, he dispensed Nonconformists just as much as Catholics from their conscientious scruples, and made no objection to their conforming to a form of worship at variance with the Established Church, and addressed a letter to the clergy of his kingdom, in which he expressed his assurance of his union with them. This promise was, however, only imperfectly carried out by the Toleration Act of 1689, which permitted the free exercise of their religion to all who had not professed, but did not relieve them of their civil disabilities. Some, accordingly, of their number practised what was called Occasional Conformity, that is, received the Anglican sacrament just once so as to qualify. This caused much controversy and led eventually in 1710 to the Occasional Conformity Act, which was devised to check it. This Act was repealed in 1718, but many of the Nonconformists themselves disapproved of the provisions on conformity, and they often resorted to and caused grave scandals, which those resorted to it cannot be fairly taken as representatives of their sects. The Test Act was not repealed till 1828, the year before the Catholic Emancipation Act was passed; the Catholics and the Nonconformists combined their forces to obtain both objects.

Although by the passing of the Toleration Act of 1828 the condition of the Nonconformists was so much ameliorated, they lingered in the eighteenth century into the prevailing religious torpor, and seemed to be on the verge of extinction. They were rescued from this state by the outbreak of the great revival, and the effect of the evangelical movement was to arouse the existing Dissenting sects to a new vigour, and in adding another which exceeded them all in numbers and enthusiasm.

Present Condition.—At the present day the Nonconformists in England, the only country to which this name with its implications applies, are very numerous and constitute a powerful religious, social, and political influence. They have effectually resisted the taking of a religious census by the State. The Census Department, it is impossible to ascertain their numbers accurately, for their own statistics are suspected of exaggeration. According to Mr. Howard Williams, the census returns (as given in the Daily Mail "Year Book of the Churches" for 1908), the Baptists then reckoned 405,755 communicants, the Congregationalists 459,985, and the various denominations of Methodists 1,174,402—to which figures are to be added those of the highly indeterminate number of adherents who are not accepted as communicants. It will be seen from this list that the Methodists are by far the largest of these three principal denominations, but they are nonetheless the most subdivided. It will be noticed, too, that the Presbyterians, once so numerous in the country, have no place among the larger sects. The Methodists and Presbyterians, commonly called Quakers, are allotted 17,767 communicants by Evans. Besides these there are innumerable smaller sects, of which the Plymouth Brethren and the Swedenborgians are the most conspicuous. (For the separate denominations and their special articles, see especially CONJUNCTION; CONFIRMATION; METHODISM; METHODIST; FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF.)

None. This subject will be treated under the following heads: I. Origin of None; II. None from the Fourth to the Seventh Century; III. None in the Roman and Other Liturgies from the Seventh Century; IV. Meaning and Symbolism of None.

I. Origin of None.—According to an ancient Greek and Roman custom, the day was, like the night, divided into four parts, each of three hours. As the last hour of each division gave its name to the respective quarter of the day, the third division (from 12 to about 3) was called None (Lat. nona, nona, ninth). For this explanation, which is the only probable one, see Franciscus, "De tempor. horar. canonice," Rome, 1571, xxii; Bona, "De divina psalmodia," III (see also MATINS and VIOLETS). This division of the day was in vogue also among the Jews, from the Church it was borrowed (see Jerome, "In Daniel," vii, 10). The following texts, moreover, favour this view: "Now Peter and John went up into the temple at the ninth hour of prayer" (Acts, iii, 1); "And Cornelius said: Four days ago, unto this hour, I was praying in my house, at the ninth hour, and behold a man stood before me" (Acts, x, 30); "Peter went up to the higher parts of the house to pray, about the sixth hour" (Acts, x, 9). The most ancient testimony refers to this custom of Terce, Sext, and None, for instance Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, the Canons of Hippolytus, and even the "Athanasiana" (v. 556). The last-mentioned presided prayer thrice each day, without, however, fixing the hours (Διδυξατι τὰ ἤνα ἄθως, n. viii).

Clement of Alexandria and likewise Tertullian, as early as the end of the second century, expressly mention the hours of Terce, Sext, and None, as specially set apart for prayer (Clement, "Strom.," VII, vii, in F. G., IX, 453-8). Tertullian says explicitly that we must always pray in the four time prescribed for prayer; he adds, nevertheless, these significant words: "As regards the time, there should be no lax observation of certain hours—I mean of those common hours which have been marked the divisions of the day, the third, the sixth, the ninth, and which we may observe in Scripture to be more solemn than the rest" ("De Oratone," xxiii, xxxv, in P. L., i, 1191-3).

Clement and Tertullian in these passages refer only to private prayer at these hours. The Canons of Hippolytus also speak of Terce, Sext, and None, as suitable hours for private prayer, on the second station days. Wednesday and Friday, when the faithful assembled in the church, and perhaps on Sundays, these hours were recited successively in public (can. xx, xxv). St. Cyprian mentions the same hours as having been observed under the Old Law, and adds reasons for the Christians observing them also ("De Oratone," xxxiv in P. L., IV, 541). In the fourth century there is evidence to show that the practice had become obligatory, at least for the monks (see the text of the Apostolic Constitutions, St. Ephraem, St. Basil, the author of the "De virginitate" in Baumer-Biron, op. cit. in bibliography, pp. 116, 121, 123, 129, 186). The prayer of Prime, at six o'clock in the morning, was not added till a later date, but Vespers goes back to the earliest days. The texts we have cited give no information as to what these prayers consisted of. Evidence has been contained in the same elements as all vespers and prayers of that time—psalms recited or chanted, canticles or hymns, either privately composed or drawn from Holy Writ, and litanies or prayers properly so called.

II. None from the Fourth to the Seventh Century.—The eighteenth canon of the Council of Laodicea (between 343 and 381) orders that the same prayers be always said at None and Vespers. But it is not clear what meaning is to be attached to the words λατρευτικὰ τῶν στάσεων, used in the canon. It is likely that reference is made to the famous litanies, in which prayer was offered for the catechumens, sinners, the faithful, and generally for all the wants of the Church. Sommen (in a passage, however, which is not considered very authentic) speaks of three psalms which the monks recited at None. In any case, this number became traditional at an early date (Sommèn, "Hist. eccl.," III, iv, and P. L., XLVII, 1073). Pierre-Camille Biron, op. cit., I, 136). Three psalms were recited at Terce, six at Sext, and nine at None, as Cassian informs us, though he remarks that the most common practice was to recite three psalms at each of these hours (Cassian, "De cenob. instit.," III, iv, in P. L., XLIX, 116). St. Ambrose speaks of three hours of prayer, and, if with many critics we attribute to him the three hymns "Jam surgit hora tertia," "Bis ternas horas explicas," and "Ter horas trinis solvitur," we shall have a new constitutive element of the Little Hours in the fourth century in the Church of Milan (Ambrose, "De virginitate", III, iv, in P. L., XVI, 229).

In the "Peregrinatio ad loca sancta" of Etherea (end of fourth century), there is a more detailed description of the Office of None. It resembles that of Sext, and is celebrated in the basilica of the Anastasis. It is composed of psalms and antiphons; then the bishop enters, with the grotto of the Resurrection, recites a prayer there, and blesses the faithful ("Peregrinatio", p. 46, of Abael, "Epitome sur la Peregrinatio Sylvie", 45). During Lent, None is celebrated in the church of Sion; on Sundays the office is not celebrated; it is omitted also on Holy Saturday, but on Good Friday it is celebrated with special solemnity (Peregrinatio, pp. 53, 66, etc.). But it is only in the succeeding age that we find a complete description of None, as of the other offices of the day.

III. NON E IN THE ROMAN AND OTHER LITURGIES FROM THE SEVENTH CENTURY.—In the Rule of St. Benedict the four Little Hours of the day (Prime to None) are conceived on the same plan, the formula being common. The office begins with Deus tuum adulatorium, like all the Hours; then follows a hymn, special to None; three psalms, which do not change (Ps. cxxv, cxxvi, cxxvii), except on Sundays and Mondays when they are replaced by three groups of eight verses from Ps. cxviii; then the capitulum, a versicle, the Kyrie, the Pater, the oratio, and the concluding prayers (Regula S. P. Benedicti, xvii). In the Roman Liturgy, the office of None is likewise constituted after the model of the Little Hours of the day; it is composed of the same elements as in the Rule of St. Benedict, with this difference, that, instead of the three psalms, cxxvii, the three groups of eight verses from Ps. cxviii are always recited. There is nothing else characteristic of this office in the liturgy. The hymn, which was added later, is the one already in use in the Benedictine Office—"Hic sumus Deus tamquam vox". In the monastic rules prior to the tenth century certain variations are found. Thus in the Rule of Lerins, as in that of St. Cassianus, six psalms are recited at None, as at Terce and Sext, with antiphon, hymn, and capitulum.

St. Aurelian follows the same tradition in his Rule "Ad virgines," but he imposes twelve psalms at each hour on the monks. St. Columbanus, St. Fridolin, and St. Isidore adopt the system of three psalms (cf. Martène, "De antiqu. monach. rit.", IV, 27). Like St. Benedict, most of these authors include hymns, the capitulum or short lesson, a versicle, and an oratio (cf. Martène, loc. cit.). In the ninth and tenth centuries we find some additions made to the Office of None, in particular litanies, collects, etc. (Martène, op. cit., IV, 28).

By MEANING AND SYMBOLISM OF NONE.—Among the ancient the hour of None was regarded as the close of the day's business and the time for the baths and supper (Martalin, "Epigrames," IV, vii; Horace, "Epistoles," I, vii, 70). At an early date mystical reasons for the division of the day were sought. St. Cyprian sees in the hours of Terce, Sext and None, which come after a lapse of three hours, an allusion to the Trinity. He adds that these hours already consecrated to prayer under the Old Dispensation, have been sanctified in the New Testament by the Acts of the Apostles—Terce by the descent of the Holy Ghost on the Apostles; Sext by the prayers of St. Peter, the reception of the Gentiles into the Church, or yet again by the crucifixion of Our Lord; None by the descent of Christ ("De oratione", xxxiv, in P. L., IV, 841). St. Basil merely recalls that it was at the ninth hour that the Apostles Peter and John were wont to go to the Temple to pray ("Regula fœsibus tract.", XXXVII, n. 3, in P. G., XXXI, 1013 sq.). Cassian, who adopts the Cyprian interpretation for Terce and Sext, sees in the Hour of None the descent of Christ into hell (De cenob. instit., III, iii). But, as a rule, it is the death of Christ that is commemorated at the Hour of None.

The writers of the Middle Ages have sought for other mystical explanations of the Hour of None. Amalarius (I, vi, viii) has given a very curious explanation, like the sun which sinks on the horizon at the Hour of None, man's spirit tends to lower itself also, he is more open to temptation, and it is the time the demon selects to try him. For the texts of the Fathers on this subject, it will suffice to refer the reader to the above-mentioned work of Cardinal Boni (c. ix). The same writers do not fail to remark that the number nine was considered an imperfect number, an incompleteness, a sort of number of mourning. Among the ancient the ninth day was the day of expiration and funeral services—noxem et sactum, the origin doubtless of the novenas for the dead.

As for the ninth hour, some persons believe that it is the hour at which our first parents were driven from the Garden of Paradise (Bonc, op. cit., i, 2). In conclusion, it is necessary to call attention to a practice which emphasized the Hour of None—it was the hour of fasting. At first, the hour of fasting was prolonged to Vespers, that is to say, food was taken only in the evening or at the end of the day. Mitigation of this rigorous practice was soon introduced. Tertullian's famous pamphlet "De jejunio", rolls at length on the necessity of fasting against the Pagans (i.e. after the model of the Little Hours of the day); it is composed of the same elements as in the Rule of St. Benedict, with this difference, that, instead of the three psalms, cxxvii, the three groups of eight verses from Ps. cxviii are always recited. There is nothing else characteristic of this office in the liturgy. The hymn, which was added later, is the one already in use in the Benedictine Office—"Hic sumus Deus tamquam vox". In the monastic rules prior to the tenth century certain variations are found. Thus in the Rule of Lerins, as in that of St. Cassianus, six psalms are recited at None, as at Terce and Sext, with antiphon, hymn, and capitulum.

St. Aurelian follows the same tradition in his Rule "Ad virgines," but he imposes twelve psalms at each hour on the monks. St. Columbanus, St. Fridolin, and St. Isidore adopt the system of three psalms (cf. Martène, "De antiqu. monach. rit.", IV, 27). Like St. Benedict, most of these authors include hymns, the capitulum or short lesson, a versicle, and an oratio (cf. Martène, loc. cit.). In the ninth and tenth centuries we find some additions made to the Office of None, in particular litanies, collects, etc. (Martène, op. cit., IV, 28).

F. CARBOL.

Non Expedit (It is not expedient).—Words with which the Holy See uses to denote a suspension of legislation against the policy of abstention from the polls in parliamentary elections. This policy was adopted after a period of uncertainty and of controversy which followed the promulgation of the Constitution of the Kingdom of Italy (1861), and which was intensified by laws hostile to the Church and, especially, to the religious orders (1865–66). To this uncertainty the Holy Penitentiary put an end by its decree of 20 February, 1688, in which, in the above words, it sanctioned the motto: "Neither elect nor elected". Until then there had been in the Italian Parliament a few eminent representatives of Catholic interests—Vito d’Ondes Reggio, Augusto Conti, Cesare Cantà, and others. The principal motive of this decree was that the oath taken by deputies might be interpreted as an approval of the spoliation of the Holy See, as Pius VI declared in an act of 11 October, 1774. A practical reason for it, also, was that, in view of the electoral law of that day, by which the electorate was reduced to 650,000, and as the Government manipulated the elections to suit its own purposes, it would have been hopeless to attempt to prevent the passage of anti-Catholic laws. On the other hand, the masses seemed unprepared for parliamentary government, and, as in the greater portion of Italy (Parma, Modena, Tuscany, the Pontifical States, and the Kingdom of Naples), nearly all sincere Catholics were partisans of the dispossessed princes, they were liable to be denounced as enemies of Italy; they would also have been at variance with the Catholics of Piedmont and of the provinces wrested from Austria, and this division would have further weakened the Catholic Parliamentary group.

As might be expected, this measure did not meet with universal approval; the so-called Moderates accused the Catholics of failing in their duty to society and to their country. In 1882, the suffrage having been extended, Leo XIII took into serious consideration the partial abolition of the restrictions established by the Non Esquisti, but nothing was actually done (cf. "Archiv für kathol. Kirchenrecht," 1904, p. 296). On the contrary, as many people came to the conclusion that the decree Non Esquisti was not intended to be absolute, but was only an admission made to apply upon one particular occasion, the Established Church of Sicily (30 Dec. 1883). In 1883, the bishops, in view of the election of one of the bishops, the bishops could ask for a suspension of the rule, and invite the Catholics to hold themselves in readiness to go to the polls. Non-Jurors, the name given to the Anglican Churchmen who in 1689 refused to take the oath of allegiance to William and Mary, and their successors under the Protestant Succession Act of that year. Their leaders on the episcopal bench (William Sanford, Bishop of St. Albans, and Bishops Francis Turner of Ely, William Lloyd of Norwich, Thomas White of Peterborough, William Thomas of Worcester, Thomas Ken of Bath and Wells, John Lake of Chester, and Thomas Cartwright of Chester) were required to take the oath before 1 August, under pain of suspension, to be followed, if it were not taken by 1 Feb., by total deprivation. Two of them died before the last date, their refusal, were deprived. Their example was followed by a multitude of the clergy and laity, the number of the former being estimated at about four hundred, conspicuous among whom were George Hickes, Dean of Worcester, Jeremy Collier, John Kettlewell, and Robert Nelson. A list of these Non-jurors is given in Hickes’s "Memoirs of Bishop Kettlewell," and one further completed in Overton’s "Non-jurors." The original Non-jurors were not friendly towards James II; indeed five of these bishops had been among the seven whose resistance to his Declaration of Indulgence earlier in the same year had contributed to the overthrow of the Whig government which it was their duty to preserve. Hence they felt, after some hesitation, that it was incumbent on them to consecrate others who should succeed them. The first who were thus consecrated, on 24 Feb., 1689, were George Hickes and John Wagstaff. On 29 May, 1731, the other Non-juror bishops being all dead, Hickes consecrated Jeremy Collier, Samuel Hales, and Nathaniel Spinkes. When James II died in 1701, a crisis arose for these separatists. Some of them then rejoined the ranks of their co-religionists, whilst others held out and continued to hold on the ground that their oath had been both to James and to his rightful heirs. These latter afterwards disagreed among themselves over the question of re-institution, and the death of Charles Edward in 1788 took away the raison d’être for the schism, but a few lingered on till the end of the eighteenth century. In Scotland in 1689 the whole body of bishops refused the oath and became Non-jurors, but the resulting situation was somewhat different. As soon as the Revolution broke out the Presbyterians ousted the Episcopalians and became the Established Church of Scotland (30 Dec. 1688). Non-jurors were left without rivals of their own communion, though they had at times to suffer penalties for celebrating unlawful worship. Their difficulties terminated in 1788, when, on the death of Charles Edward they saw no further reason for withholding the oath to George III.

SYDNEY F. SMITH.

Nonnae, Saint. See Gregory of Nazianzus, Saint.

Nonnotte, Claude-Adrien, controversialist; b. in Besançon, 29 July, 1711; d. there, 3 September, 1793. At nineteen he entered the Society of Jesus and preached at Amiens, Versailles, and Turin. He is chiefly known for his writings against Voltaire. When the latter began to issue his "Essais sur les mœurs" (1754), an attack on Christianity, Nonnotte published, anonymously, the "Examen critique ou Réfutation du livre des mœurs"; and when Voltaire finished his publication (1758), Nonnotte revised his book, which he published at Avignon (1762). He treated, simply, calmly, and dispassionately, all the historical and doctrinal errors contained in Voltaire’s work. Nonnotte’s work reached the sixth edition in 1774. Voltaire, exasperated, retorted in his "Éclaircissements historiques" and for twenty years continued to attack Nonnotte with sarcasm, insult, or calumny. Nevertheless Nonnotte’s publication continued to circulate, and was translated into Italian, German, Polish, and Portuguese. After the suppression of the Jesuits, Nonnotte withdrew to Besançon and in 1779 added a third volume to the "Erreurs de Voltaire", namely, "L’esprit de Voltaire dans ses écrits", for which it was impossible to obtain the approval of the Paris censor. Against the "Dictionnaire philosophique," in which Voltaire had recapitulated, under a popular form, all his attacks on Christianity, Nonnotte published the "Dictionnaire philosophique de la religion" (Avignon, 1779), in which he replied to all the objections then brought against religion. The work was translated into Italian and German. Towards the end of his life Nonnotte published "Les philosophes des trois premiers siècles" (Paris, 1780), in which he contrasted the ancient and the modern philosophers. The work was translated into German. He also wrote "Lettre à un ami sur les honnétetés littéraires" (Paris, 1786), and "Réponse aux Éclaircissements historiques et aux additions de Voltaire" (Paris, 1774). These publications obtained for their author a eulogistic Brief from Clement XIII (1778), and the congratulations of St. Alphonse Liguori, who declared that he had always at hand his "golden works" in which the chief truths of the Faith were defended with learning and propriety against the objections of Voltaire and his friends. Nonnotte was also the author of "L'emploi de l'argout" (Avignon, 1757), translated from Maffei; "Le gouvernement des païsisses" (posthumous, Paris, 1802). All were published under the title "Œuvres de Nonnotte" (Besançon, 1819), 4 vols. de la religion, XXV, des troubles de la France, les trois siècles de la littérature française (The Hague, 1781); SOMMEVIL, Bibli. de la C. de Jésus (Paris, 1894), V, 1803-7; IX, 722.

ANTOINE DEBERT.

Nonnus, of Panopolis in Upper Egypt (c. 400), the reputed author of two poems in hexameters, one, διονυσιακά, about the mysteries of Bacchus, and the other the "Paraphrase of the Fourth Gospel". Dräzeke proposes Apollinaris of Laodicaea (Theolog. Literaturzeitung, 1801, 232), and a fourteenth-century MS. suggests Ammonius as the author of the "Paraphrase", but the similarity of style makes it very probable that the two poems have the same author. Nonnus would then seem to have been a pagan when he wrote the first, and afterwards to have become a Christian. Nothing else is known of his life. The "Paraphrase" is not completely extant; 3750 lines of it, now divided into twenty-one chapters, are known. It has some importance as evidence of the text its author used, and has been studied as a source of textual criticism (Blass, "Evang. sec. loh. cum variis lectionis defectu," Leipzig, 1892; Janssen in "Texte und Untersuchung", XXIII, 4, Leipzig, 1903). Otherwise it has little interest or merit. It is merely a repetition of the Gospel, verse by verse, inflated with fantastic epithets and the addition of impossibly details. The "Paraphrase" was, and published by the Aldine Press in 1501. The edition of Heinsius (Leyden, 1627) is reprinted in P. G., XXIII, 749-1228. The best modern edition is by Scheidner: "Nonni Panopolitani paraphrasis e. evang. Ioaneti" (Leipzig, 1881).

ADRIAN FORTESCUE.

Norbert, Saint, b. at Xanten on the left bank of the Rhine, c. 1060; d. at Magdeburg, 6 June, 1134. His father, Heribert, Count of Gernpe, was related to the imperial house of Germany, and his mother, Hadwiga, was a descendant of the ancient house of Lorraine. A stately bearing, a penetrating intellect, a tender, Ordained subdeacon, Norbert was appointed to a canonry at Xanten. Soon after he was summoned to the Court of Frederick, Prince-Bishop of Constance, and later to that of Henry IV, Emperor of Germany, whose almoner he became. The Bishopric of Cambrai was offered to him, but refused. Norbert allowed himself to be so carried away by pleasure that nothing short of a miracle of grace could make him lead the life of an earnest cleric. One day, while riding to Vreden, a village near Xanten, he was overtaken by a storm. A thunderbolt fell at his horse's feet; the frightened animal threw its rider, and for nearly an hour he lay half disabled. Thus humbled, Norbert became a sincere penitent. Renouncing his appointment at Court, he retired to Xanten to lead a life of penance.

Understanding, however, that he stood in need of guidance, he placed himself under the direction of Cono, Abbot of Siegburg. In gratitude to Cono, Norbert founded the Abbey of Fürstenberg, endowed it with a portion of his property, and made it over to Cono and his Benedictine successors. Norbert was then in his thirty-fifth year. Feeling that he was called to the priesthood, he presented himself to the Bishop of Cologne, from whose hands he received Holy Orders. After a forty days' retreat at Siegburg Abbey, he celebrated his first Mass at Xanten and preached an earnest discourse on the transitory character of this world's pleasures and on man's duties towards God. The insight of some young clerics, one of whom even spat in his face, he bore with wonderful patience on that occasion. Norbert often went to Siegburg Abbey to confer with Cono, or to the cell of Ludolph, hermit-priest, or to the Abbey of Klosternebur near Rolduc. Accused as an innovator at the Council of Fribourg, he resigned all his ecclesiastical preferments, disposed of his estate, and gave all to the poor, reserving for himself only what was needed for the celebration of Holy Mass. Barefooted and begging his bread, he journeyed as far as St. Giles, in Languedoc, to confer with Pope Gelasius concerning his future life. Unable to keep Norbert at his court, Gelasius granted him faculties to preach wherever he judged proper. At Vence, Norbert met (March, 1119) Burchard, Bishop of Cambray, whose chaplain joined him in his apostolic journeys in France and Belgium. After the death of Pope Gelasius (20 January, 1119) Norbert wished to confer with his successor, Calixtus II, at the Council of Reims (Oct., 1119). The pope and Bartholomew, Bishop of Laon, requested Norbert to found a religious order, or the Diocese of Laon, so that his work might be perpetuated after his death. Norbert chose a lonely, marshy valley, shaped in the form of a cross, in the Forest of Coute, about ten miles from Laon, and named Prémontré. Hugh of Fosses, Everard of Cambray, Anthony of Nivelles, seven students of the celebrated school of Anselm, and Ralph at Laon were his first disciples. The young community at first lived in huts of wood and straw, arranged like a cross around the chapel of St. John the Baptist, but they soon built a larger church and a monastery for the religious who joined them in increasing numbers.

Going to Cologne to obtain relics for their church, Norbert discovered, through a vision, the spot where those of St. Ursula and her companions, of St. Gereon, and of other martyrs lay hidden.

Women also wished to become members of the new religious order. Blessed Ricewina, widow of Count Raymond of Castres, was St. Norbert's first spiritual daughter, and her example was followed by women of the best families of France and Germany. Soon after this, Norbert returned to Germany, and preached in Westphalia, when Godfrey, Count of Kappenberg, offered himself and gave three of his castles to be made into abbeys. On his return from Germany, Norbert was met by Theobald, Count of Champagne, who wished to become a member of the order; but Norbert insisted that God wished Theobald to marry and do good in the world. Theobald agreed to this, but begged Norbert to prescribe a rule for him. Norbert prescribed a few rules and invested Theobald with the white scapular of the order, and thus, in 1122, the Third Order of St. Norbert was instituted. The saint was soon requested by the Bishop of Cam-
NORTHERN

nial to go and combat the infamous heresies which Tanchelin had propagated, and which had their centre at Antwerp. As a result of his preaching the people of the Low Countries abjured their heresies, and many brought back to him the Sacred Species which they had stolen and profaned. In commemoration of this, St. Norbert has been proclaimed the Apostle of Antwerp, and the feast of his triumph over the Sacramental heresy is celebrated in the Arch-dioceze of Mechlin on 11 July.

The rapid growth of the Order was marvellous, and bishops contrived Norbert to found new houses in their dioceses. Floreffe, Viviers, St-Josse, Ardenne, Cuisy, Laon, Liège, Antwerp, Valerian, Kapellenberg and others were founded during the first five years of the order's existence. Through the order had already been approved by the pope's legates, Norbert, accompanied by three disciples, journeyed to Rome, in 1125, to obtain its confirmation by the new pope, Honorius II. The Bull of Confirmation is dated 27 February, 1126. Passing through Würzburg on his return to Prémontré, Norbert restored sight to a blind woman: the inhabitants were so full of admiration for him that they spoke of electing him successor to their bishop who had just died, but Norbert and his companions fled secretly. Soon after this, on his way to Ratisbon, he passed through Spier, where Lothair, King of the Romans, was holding a diet, the papal legate being present. Present himself from Magdeburg, and also came to solicit a successor to their late archbishop, Rudger.

The papal legate and Lothair used their authority, and urged Norbert to accept the vacant see. On taking possession of it, he was grievous to find that much property belonging to the Church and the poor had been usurped by powerful men, and that many of the clergy led scandalous lives. He succeeded in converting some of the transgressors, but others only became more obstinate, and three attempts were made on his life. He resisted Pietro di Leoni, who, as anti-pope, had assumed the name of Anacletus and had become a monk at Rome, exertiing himself at the Council of Reims to attach the German Emperor and the German bishops and princes more firmly to the cause of Pope Innocent II. Though his health was increasingly delicate, Norbert accompanied Lothair and his army to Rome to put the rightful pope on the Chair of St. Peter, and he resisted the pope's concession of the investiture to the emperor. Norbert, whose health was now more impaired, accompanied the Emperor Lothair back to Germany and for some time remained with him, asisting him as his chancellor and adviser. In March, 1134, Norbert had become so feeble that he had to be carried to Magdeburg where he died on the Wednesday after Pentecost. By order of the emperor, his body was laid at rest in the Norbertine Abbey of St. Mary, at Magdeburg. His tomb became glorious by the numerous miracles wrought there. The Bollandists say that there is no document to prove that he was canonized by Innocent III. His canonisation was by Gregory XIII in 1583, and his cultus was extended to the whole church by Clement X.

On 2 May, 1027, the saint's body was transferred from Magdeburg, then in the hands of Protetants, to the Abbey of Strahov, a suburb of Prague in Bohemia. The Chancery of Prague preserved the abjurations of six hundred Protestants who, on the day, or during the octave, of the translation, were received into the monastery. On that occasion the Archbishop of Prague, at the request of the civil and ecclesiastical authorities, proclaimed St. Norbert the Patron and Protector of Bohemia. (For history of the order, see PREMONSTRATENSIAN CANONS.)

the saint's first disciple and successor, of which numerous copies had been made. This belonged to the Abbey of Romenfort, near Coblenz, Via Norberti, auctore canonico praedicatorum Rosana abbatis, Rosana, is now in the British Museum. An abridgment of this by R. A. F. was printed in 1572; the whole MS. with viantes, was published by ABBOT VANDER STERRAE in 1569; again with comments and notes, by PALLADINO in Asia, 1570.

Then followed: VANDER STERRAE, Het leven van den H. Norbertus (Antwerp, 1562); ou Fac. Lebe des h. Norbert (Paris, 1567); CANELO, D'Homme apostolique en S. Norbert (Cahen, 1640); C. L. HUGO, La Vie de S. Norbert (Lugano, 1871); Historia del Gran Padre y Paimperos S. Norberto (Salamanca, 1750).

In 1568 a MS. Life of St. Norbert discovered in the Royal Library, Berlin, was published in PERN, Mon. Germ. Hist., differing in many particulars from the MS., mentioned above. The discoverer occasioned a great revival of interest in the saint, and there followed: TEMPOFF, De S. Norberto Ord. Praem. Condicio emblematica historia (Mülster, 1835); SCHOLZ, Vita S. Norberti (Breisach, 1839); WINTER, Die Prämonstratensia der 12. Jahrh.

(Berlin, 1885); ROEMERSDORF, Die ältesten Biographien des h. Norbert (Berlin, 1871); VERSTEEG, Leben des h. Norbert (Leipzig, 1881); MUNNICH, Die erste Papstwahl des Jahres 1138 (Münster, 1870). In the following five years, the publication of parts and other lately discovered documents have been used: GEURDEN, Life of St. Norbert (London, 1866); MADELEINE, Histoire de S. Norbert (Lille, 1886) (the fullest and best-written biography of the saint so far published); VAN DEN EYCK, Leenenschei

Norcia, Diocese of (Norbain), a city in Perugia,

Italy, often mentioned in Roman history. In the ninth century it was a republic. The Duke of Spoleto often contended with the pope for its possession; and, when, in 1433, the commune of Spoleto and Foligno declared war against Norcia, it was defended by the pope's general Cesarini. It was the birthplace of St. Benedict; the abbots St. Spes and St. Eutychius; the monk Florentius; and the physician Benedict Pegardiati. The chief industry is preserving meats. The first known bishop was Stephen (c. 405). From the ninth century, Norcia was in the Diocese of Spoleto, as it appears in the records, for some time in the time of St. Gregory the Great. The see was re-established in 1820, and its first bishop was Cajetan Bonani. Immediately dependent on Rome, it has 100 parishes; 28,000 inhabitants; 7 religious houses; 3 schools for girls.

Howard line in 1483, died in battle in 1485.

2. Thomas (1443–1524), son. Became duke in 1514.

4. Thomas (1536–1572), grandson. Succeeded in 1554. Beheaded in 1572.

5. Thomas (1523–1677), great-grandson.

Dukedom restored in 1660.

6. Henry (1629–1684), brother. Succeeded in 1677.

8. Thomas (1683–1732), nephew. Succeeded in 1701.

9. Edward (1685–1777), brother. Succeeded in 1732.

10. Charles (1720–1786), descendant of seventh duke. Succeeded in 1777.

Succeeded in 1815.

15. Henry Fitzalan (1847– ), son. Succeeded

in 1880.
THOMAS, THIRD DUKE, was the eldest son of Thomas Howard, the second duke, and Elizabeth, daughter of Sir F. Tilney of Aenthwaite Thorpe Hall, Norfolk. In 1495 he was married to Lady Anne, daughter of Edward IV. He fought as captain of the vanguard at Flodden Field in 1513. In 1514 he was created Earl of Surrey, and joined his father in opposing Woley's policy of depressing the old nobility. In 1520-21 he endeavoured to keep peace in Ireland; recalled, he took command of the English fleet against France, and successfully opposed the French in Scotland. In 1524 he became duke, and was appointed commissioner to treat for peace with France. With peace abroad came the burning question of Henry's divorce. Norfolk, uncle of Anne Boleyn, sided with the king and, as president of the privy council, hastened the cardinal's ruin. He became Henry's tool in dishonourable purposes and he acquired in his lust for the spiritual supremacy. With Cromwell, he obtained a grant of a portion of the possessions of the Priory of Lewes and other monastic spoils. He was created earl-marshall in 1533. In 1535 Norfolk was a leading judge in the trial of Sir Thomas More. In 1536 he disbanded the "Pilgrimage of Grace" with false assurances, but returned next year to do "dreadful execution". In 1537 he was impeached in chains, at York, before Rochester and Walworth, two Carthusians. Drastic measures were taken. He had marked his whole career as a military leader. He shared the King's zeal against the reformed church of Germany. In 1534 he had "staid purgatory" and was always in favour of the old orthodoxy, as far as he might be allowed to support it. In 1539, when the bishops could not agree concerning the practice of religion, Norfolk proposed the Six Articles to the Lords, theology thus becoming matter for the whole House. As an old man he served against a rising in Scotland, and in the French wars of 1544. In 1546 he was accused of high treason. Evidence, however, was not conclusive against him until Hertford, and other keen enemies, prevailed upon him, as a prisoner in the Tower, to sign his confession and throw himself on the King's mercy. A bill of attainder was passed in Parliament, and orders for his immediate execution would have been carried into effect had not Henry died on the previous evening. He remained a prisoner in the Tower the whole of Edward VI's reign but was released on Mary's accession, and restored to the dukedom in 1553.

His long experience as lord high steward and lieutenant-general made him useful to the queen, but he lost favour by his rashness and his failure to crush Wyatt's rebellion. See Gairdner, "Lollardy and the Reformation" (London, 1908); Gairdner, "Hist. of Engl. Church in XVth Century" (London, 1902); "Letters and Papers, Henry VIII", various volumes; Creighton, "Dict. of Nat. Biography", X (London, 1907), 341-342.

THOMAS, FOURTH DUKE, was the son of Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey and Frances Vere, daughter of John, Earl of Oxford. After the execution of his father in 1547 he was, by order of privy council, committed to the charge of his aunt, and foxed, "the martyrologist", was assigned as his tutor, probably to educate him in Protestant principles. In 1553, when Mary released his grandfather from prison, Bishop White of Lincoln became his tutor. Thomas succeeded his grandfather, as duke, in 1554, and became earl-marshall. He married, in 1556, Lady Mary Fitzalan, daughter of Henry, twelfth Earl of Arundel; in 1558, Margaret, daughter of Thomas Lord Audley of Walden; and, in 1567, Elizabeth, widow of Thomas Dacre of Gilasland, who had three daughters. By obtaining a grant of their wardship and intermarrying with them his own three sons, the issue of former marriages, he absorbed the great estates of the Arundel family. In 1558, he was again a widower, the only English duke, the wealthiest man in England, popular and ambitious. Elizabeth was eager to win one of Norfolk's position and he was given a part in the expulsion of the French troops from Scotland. With other commissioners, he was appointed to sit at York and inquire into the causes of the variance between Mary Stuart and her subjects. Circumstances at the beginning of 1569, combined to awaken the fears of English nobles, and Arundel, Pembroke, Leicester, and others saw the advantage to be gained by the marriage, first suggested by Maitland, between Norfolk and Mary; that when married she might be safely restored to the Scottish throne and be recognized as Elizabeth's successor. Protestant nobles, however, looked on the affair with suspicion, and Catholic lords in the north were impatient of long delay. But, even after the council had voted for the settlement of the English succession by Mary's marriage, an English noble, Norfolk proceeded with great caution, withdrew from court, aroused Elizabeth's suspicion and was committed to the Tower, in October, 1569. On his object submission to the queen and renunciation of all purpose of alliance with Mary, he was released in 1570. He did not keep his promise; he continued to correspond with the Queen of Scots, was found to be in negotiation with Ridolfi, and through him with Philip and the Catholic Powers abroad, concerning an invasion of England. He was arraigned for high treason in 1571. After eighteen weeks' confinement in the Tower, deprived of books, informed of the trial only on the previous evening, kept in ignorance of the charges until he heard the indictment at the bar, and refused the aid of counsel to suggest advice, on the evidence of letters and extorted confessions from others, he was condemned to death by the Earl of Shrewsbury, the Lord High Steward, and twenty-six peers as assessors (judges, all selected by the queen's ministers and many of them his known enemies). After some hesitation on the part of Elizabeth and a petition from Parliament, on 2 June, 1572, he was executed. His sympathy seemed to be always with the Catholic party, but his policy was two-faced, and he was a professed adherent of the Reformers. Circumstances made it expedient for him always to temporize. He seems to have been led on by the course of events and not to have realized the result of his actions. See State Trials (London, 1851), Proude, "Hist. of Eng., IV (London, 1866), XX; Labanoff, "Lettres, etc. de Marie Stuart" (1844), earlier ed. tr. (1842); Anderson, "Collections relating to Mary" (Edinburgh, 1727); Creighton in "Dict. of Nat. Biog.", X (London, 1908).

Henry, Sixth Duke, the second son of Henry Frederick Howard, third Earl of Arundel and Lady Elizabeth Stuart, was educated abroad, as a Catholic. In 1699 he went as ambassador extraordinary to Morocco. In 1677 he succeeded his brother as duke, having previously been made hereditary earlmarshal. During the Commonwealth and Protectorate he lived in total seclusion. In January, 1678, he took his seat in the House of Lords, but in August the development of the Titus Oates Plot was followed by an Act for disabling Catholics from sitting in either house of Parliament. He would not comply with the oath and, suspected of doubtful loyalty, withdrew to Bruges for three years. There he built a house attached to a Franciscan convent and enjoyed freedom of worship and scope for his munificence. He was a man of benevolent disposition and gave away the greater part of his splendid library, and grounds and rooms to the Royal Society, and the Arundelian marbles to Oxford University. Jealous of the family honour, he compounded a debt of £20,000 contracted by his grandfather. [See Evelyn, "Miscellanies Written," MSS. folia, 134, pp. 48-50.]

Henry, Seventh Duke, son of Henry, sixth duke, and Lady Anne Somerset, was at first a good Catholic and for four months held out against subscribing to the Act as a peer in the House of Lords. Afterwards he became a convert.

Thomas, Eighth Duke, was brought up a Catholic but perverted on succeeding to the dukedom.

Howard, Lord, did much to promote a more liberal treatment of Catholics by offering a home at Norfolk House to Frederick, Prince of Wales, and his wife at the time of the birth of their son, afterwards George III.

Charles, Tenth Duke, son of Charles Howard of Greytoste, Cumberland, and Mary Payard, was brought up a Catholic. Though he signed a petition for relief from the pressure of the penal laws, he led a very reformed life. In 1764 he published "Considerations of the Penal Laws against the Roman Catholics in England and the new-acquired colonies in America" and in 1768, "Thoughts, Essays, and Maxims, chiefly Political and Religious."

Charles, Eleventh Duke, educated at the English College at Douai, was a man of dissolute life and had conformed to the State religion by 1780.

Edward, Twelfth Duke, eldest son of Henry Howard of Glosop and Juliana, daughter of Sir William Molyneux of Willow, Nottinghamshire. In 1789 he married Elisabeth Bellasis, daughter of Henry, Earl of Fauconberg, but was divorced by Act of Parliament, in 1794. On the death of his third cousin, in 1815, he succeeded to the dukedom. Although a Catholic, he was allowed, by Act of Parliament in 1824, to exercise the hereditary office of earl-marshalse. After the Relief Bill of 1829 he was admitted to the full exercise of his ancestral privileges; he took his seat in the House of Lords, where he was a steady supporter of the Reform Bill, and in 1830 was nominated to a privy councilor. [See Gent. Mag., I (1842), 542.]

Henry Charles, Thirteenth Duke, only son of Bernard Edward and Elisabeth Bellasis. He was brought up a Catholic, but did not practise his religion. In 1814 he married Lady Charlotte Leveson-Gower, daughter of George, Duke of Sutherland, and in 1815 he became, as heir, Earl of Arundel and Surrey. In 1829, after the Catholic Emancipation Act, he took the oath and his seat in the House of Lords (the first Catholic since the Reformation). In 1841 he sat in the House of Lords. In politics he was a staunch member of the Whig party. In 1842 he succeeded his father as Duke of Norfolk. He died at Arundel in 1856. Canon Tierney was chaplain at the time of his death. [See London Times (19 Feb., 1856); Gent. Mag. (April, 1856), 419.]

Henry Granville FitzAlan, Fourteenth Duke, eldest son of Henry Charles and Charlotte, daughter of the Duke of Sutherland, was educated privately, and at Trinity College, Cambridge. He entered the army but retired on attaining the rank of captain. In 1839 he married the daughter of Admiral Sir Edmund (afterwards Lord) Lyons, the ambassador at Athens. From 1837 to 1842 he was a member of the House of Commons, a Whig, until he broke with his party on the introduction of the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill of 1850. In 1856, as Duke of Norfolk, he took his seat in the House of Lords. In 1859 he attended the services of Notre-Dame in Paris and made the acquaintance of Montalembert. This resulted in his conversion to Catholicism, and Montalembert describes him as "the most pious layman of our times". Cardinal Wiseman, in a pastoral letter, at the time of his death in 1860, referred to his benevolent nature: "There is not a form of want or a peculiar application of alms which has not received his relief or co-operation". He wrote: "Collections relative to Catholic Poor Schools throughout England," MSS. folio, 134, pp. 48-50. "A few Remarks on the Social and Political Condition of British Catholics" (London, 1847); "Letter to J. P. Plumtree on the Bull "In Cana Domini" (London, 1848); "Observations on Diplomatic Relations with Russia" (London, 1848). He edited from original MSS. the "Lives of Philip Howard and Anne Dacre" (London, 1857 and 1861). [See "Gent. Mag." (Jan., 1861); "London Times" (27 Nov. and 4 Dec., 1860); "London Tablet" (1 Dec., 1860); H. W. NORIS, Henry, Cardinal, b. at Verona, 20 August, 1631, of English ancestry; d. at Rome, 23 Feb., 1704. He studied under the Jesuits at Rimini, and there entered the novitiate of the Hermita of Saint Augustine. After his probation he was sent to Rome to study theology. He taught the sacred sciences at the Colleges of S. Perugia, and Padua, where he held the chair of church history in the university from 1674 to 1692. There he completed "The History of Pelagianism", and "Dissertations on the Fifth General Council", the two works which, before and after his death, occasioned much controversy. Together with the "Vindiciae Augustinianæ" they were printed at Padua in 1673, having been approved by a special commission at Rome. Noris himself went to Rome to give an account of his orthodoxy before this commission; and Clement X named him one of the qualiﬁcators of the Holy Ofﬁce, in recognition of his learning and sound doctrine. But, after the publication of the works, further charges were made against him of teaching the errors of Jansenius and Balsi. In a brief to the prefect of the Spanish Inquisition, 31 July, 1748, ordering the embargo to be taken off the few hidden books, Benedict XIV says that these charges were never proved; that they were rejected repeatedly by the Holy Ofﬁce, and repudiated by the popes who had honoured him. In 1692 Noris was made assistant Li- terator in the Vatican Library. On 22 December, 1695, he was named Cardinal-Priest of the Title of S. Agostino. In 1700 he was given full charge of the Vatican Library. His works, apart from some minor controversial treatises, are highly valued for accuracy and thoroughness of research. In addition to those already named, the most important are: "Annales et Epocha Syro-Macedonum in Vetustis Urbium Syriacae Expositoribus"; "Fatti Consulari Annorum et Manoscritto Biblici," a Deprimo.

Select portions of his works have been frequently reprinted, at Padua, 1673-1678, 1708; at Louvain, 1702; at Bas-vasso, edited by Bertr, 1769. The best is the edition of all the works, in five volumes. folio by the Ballerini Brothers, Venice, 1729-1741.

FRANCIS E. TOUBSCHER.

Normandy, ancient French province, from which five "departments" were formed in 1790: Seine-Inferne (Archdiocese of Rouen), Eure (Diocese of Evreux), Calvados (Diocese of Bayeux), Orne (Diocese of Sées), Manche (Diocese of Coutances). The Normans, originaly from the Danish or Norwegian pirates, who from the nineth to the tenth century made numerous incursions into France, gave their name to this province. In the Gallic-Roman period Normandy formed the so-called northern Lyonnaise province (Secundus Lupusfrenesium). At The beginning of the twelfth century it was to be found an inscription very important for the history of the worship of the emperors in Gaul and of the provincial assemblies; the latter, thus meeting for this work, were kept up a certain month throughout the conquered territory of Gaul. Under the Merovgians the Kingdom of Neustria annexed Normandy.
About 843 Sydroc and his bands of pillagers opened the door of Normandy to the Normans. The policy of Charles the Bald in giving money or lands to some of the Northmen for defending his land against other bands was unfortunate, as these adventurers readily broke their oath. In the course of their invasions they slew (858) the Bishop of Bayeux and (859) the Bishop of Beauvais. The conversion (862) of the North-man, Weland, marked a new policy on the part of the Carolingians; instead of regarding the invaders as enemies it was admitted that they might become Christians. Unlike the Saracens, then disturbing Europe, the Northmen were admitted to a place and a role in Christendom.

The good fortune of the Northmen began with Rollo in Normandy itself. It was long believed that Rollo came by sea into the valley of the Seine in 876, but the date is rather 886. He destroyed Bayeux, pillaged Liseux, besieged Paris, and reached Lorraine, finally establishing himself at Rouen, where a truce was concluded. His installation was considered so definitive that in the beginning of the tenth century Witto, Archbishop of Rouen, consulted the Archbishop of Reims as to the means of converting the Northmen. Rollo's settlement in Normandy was ratified by the treaty of St. Clair-sur-Epte (911), proping the only verbal agreement between Rollo and Charles the Simple. As the St. If Normandy Rollo remained faithful to the Carolingian dynasty in its struggles with the ancestors of the future Capetians. These cordial relations between the ducal family of Normandy and French royalty provoked under Rollo's successor William Long-sword (931-42)
a revolt of the pagan Northmen settled in Cotentin and Bessin. One of their lords (jure), Ruff, by name was the leader of the movement. The rebel proached the duke with being no longer a true Scandinavian and "treat the French as his kinmen".
Triumphant for a time, they were finally routed and the aristocratic spirit of the jurs had to bow before the monarchial principles which William Long-sword infused into his government.

Another attempt at a revival of paganism was made under Richard I Sans Peur (the Fearless, 942-96). He was only two years old at his father's death. A year later (943) the Scandinavian Setri, landing in Normandy with a band of pirates, induced a number of Christian Northmen to apostatize; among them, the Turmode who sought to make a pagan of the Young duke. Hugh the Great, Duke of France, and Louis IV, King of France, defeated these invaders and after their victory both sought to set up their own power in Normandy to the detriment of the young Richard whom Louis IV held in semi-capitivity at Leu. The landing in Normandy of the King of Denmark, Harold Bluetooth, and the defeat of Louis IV, held prisoner for a time (946), constrained the latter to sign the treaty of Gerberoy, by which the young Duke Richard was re-established in his possessions, and became, according to the chronicler Dudon de Saint-Quentin, a sort of King of Normandy. The attacks later directed against Richard by the Carolingian King Lothaire and Thibaut le Tricheur, Count of Chartres, brought a fresh descent on France of the soldiers of Harold Bluetooth. Ascending the Seine these Danes so devastated the country that when they withdrew, according to the chronicler Guillaume de Jumièges, there was not heard even the bark of a dog. When Eudes of Chartres, brother-in-law of Richard II the Good, again threatened Normandy territory (996-1020), it was the work of chieftains, Olaf of Norway and Locman, who came to the duke's aid. So attached were these Scandinavians to paganism that their leader Olaf, having been baptized by the Archbishop of Rouen, was put to death by them. Although they had become Christian, all traces of Scandinavian paganism did not disappear under the first dukes of Normandy. Rollo walked barefoot before the relics of St. Ouen, he caused many relics to be sold in England, and on his death-bed, according to Athémar de Chabannes, simultaneously caused prisoners to be sacrificed to the Scandinavian gods and gave much gold to the churches. Richard I was a great builder of churches, among them St. Ouen and the primitive cathedral of Rouen, St. Michel du Mont, and the Trinity at Fécamp. Richard II, zealous for monastic reform, was brought from Burgundy Olaf of Denmark, and the Abbey of Fécamp, reformed by him, became a model monastery and a much frequented school.
All these dukes protected the Church, but the feudal power of the Church, which in many States at that time limited the central power, was but little developed in Normandy, and it was to their kinmen that the dukes of Normandy most often gave the Archdiocese of Rouen and other sees. Ecclesiastical life in Normandy was vigorous and well-developed;
previous to the eleventh century the rural parishes were almost as numerous as they are to-day. Thus Normandy for nearly a century and a half was at ones
a sort of promontory of the Christian world in face of Scandinavia and at the same time a coign of Scandinavia thrust into the Christian world. Henceforth those Danes and Scandinavians who used the name of Normans formed a part of Christendom, never called pagan Danes or Scandinavians to their aid
unless threatened in the possession of Normandy;
under their domination the land became a stronghold of Christianity. The monastery of Fontenelle (q. v.) pursued its religious and literary activity from the Merovingian period. The "Chronicon Fontanelense", continued to 1040, is an important source for the history of the period. The dynal family of Normandy early determined to have an historiographer whom they sought in France, one Dudon, dean of the chapter of St. Quentin, who between 1015-80 wrote in Latin half verse, half prose, a history of the family according to the traditions and accounts transmitted to him by Raoul, Count of Ivry, grandson of Rollo and brother of Richard I, Aline. Duke Robert the Young (1027–35) was a powerful enough to interfere efficaciously in the struggles of Henri I of France against his own brother and the Counts of Champagne and Flanders. In gratitude the king bestowed on Robert the Devil, Pontoise, Chauvain on Vexin, and the Abbey of Saint-Denis. It was under Robert the Devil that the ducal family of Normandy first cast covetous glances towards England. He sent an embassy to Canute the Great, King of England, in order that the sons of Ethelred, Alfred and Edward, might recover their patrimony. The petition having been denied he made ready a naval expedition against England, destroyed by a tempest. He died while on a pilgrimage to the Holy Sepulchre.

It was reserved for his son William the Bastard, later called William the Conqueror, to make England a Norman colony by the expedition which resulted in the victory of Hastings or Senlac (1066). It seemed then, that in the second half of the eleventh century, a sort of Norman imperialism was to arise in England, but the testament of William the Conqueror which left Normandy to Robert Courte-Heuse and England to Robert Rufus, marked the separation of the two countries. Each of the brothers sought to despoil the other; the long strife which Robert waged, first against Robert Rufus, afterwards against his third brother Henry I BeaulesTer, terminated in 1106 with the battle of Tinchebray, after which he was taken prisoner and brought to Cardiff. Thenceforth Normandy was the possession of William I, King of England, and while forty years previous England seemed about to become a Norman country, it was Normandy which became an English country; history no longer speaker of the ducal family of Normandy but of the royal family of England. Later Henry I, denounced to the Council of Reims by Louis VI of France, explained to Calistus II in tragic terms the condition in which he had found Normandy. "The duchy", said he, "was the prey of brigands. Priests and other servants of God were no longer honoured, and paganism had almost been re-inforced in Normandy. The monastery which our ancestors founded for the repose of their souls were destroyed, and the religious obliged to disperse, being unable to sustain themselves. The churchmen were given up to pillage, most of them reduced to ashes, while the priests were in hiding. Their parishioners were slaying one another." There may have been some truth in this description of Henry I; however, it is well to bear in mind that the Norman dukes of the eleventh century, while they had prepared and realised these astounding political changes, had also developed in Normandy, with the help of the Church, a brilliant literary and artistic movement.

The Abbey of Bec was for some time, under the direction of Lanfranc and St. Anselm, the foremost school of northern France. Two Norman monasteries produced historical works of great importance; the "Historia Normannorum", written between 1070–77 by Guillaume Calixtus at the monastery of Jumieges; the "Historia Ecclesiastica" of Order of Encausse, which begins with the birth of Christ and ends in 1141, written at the monastery of St. Evroult. The secular clergy of Normandy emulated the monks; in a sort of academy founded in the second half of the eleventh century by two bishops of Lisieux, Hugues of Eu and Gilbert Maminot, not only theological but also scientific and literary questions were discussed. The Norman court was a kind of Academy and an active centre of literary production. The chaplain of Duchess Matilda, Gui de Ponthieu, Bishop of Amiens, composed in 1067 a Latin poem on the battle of Hastings; the abbot of William the Conqueror, William of Poitiers, wrote the "Gesta" of his master and an extant account of the first crusade is due to another Norman, Raoul de Can, an eyewitness. At the same time the Norman dukes of the eleventh century restored the buildings, destroyed by the incursions of their barbarian ancestors, and a whole Romance school of architecture developed in Normandy, extending to Chartres, Picardy, Brittany, and even to England. Caen was the centre of this school; and the monuments like the Abbey aux Dames, built at Caen by William and Matilda, mark an epoch in the history of Norman art.

In the course of the twelfth century the political destinies of Normandy were very uncertain. Henry I of England, master of Normandy from 1106–35, preferred to live at Caen rather than in England. His rule in Normandy was at first disturbed by the partisans of Guillaume Cliton, son of Robert Courte-Heuse, and later by the plot concocted against him by his own daughter Matilda, widow of Emperor Henry V, who had taken as her second husband Geoffrey Plantagenet, Count of Anjou. When Henry I died in 1135 his body was brought to England; his death without male heirs left Normandy a prey to anarchy. For this region was immediately disputed between Henry Plantagenet, grandson of Henry I through his mother Matilda, and Thibaut of Champagne, grandson of William the Conqueror through his mother Adèle. After nine years of strife Thibaut withdrew in favour of his brother Stephen who in 1135 had been crowned King of England. But the victories of Geoffrey Plantagenet in Normandy assured (1144) the rule of Henry Plantagenet over that land, which being thenceforth subject to Angevin rule, seemed destined to have no further connection with England. Then suddenly Henry Plantagenet, who in 1152 had married Eleanor (Aliénor) of Aquitaine, divorced from Louis VII of France, determined to assert his rights over England itself. The naval expedition which he conducted in 1153 led Stephen to recognize him as his heir, and as Stephen died at the end of that same year Henry Plantagenet reigned over all the Anglo-Norman possessions, his territorial power being greater than that of the kings of France. A long series of wars followed between the Capetians and Plantagenets, interrupted by truces. Louis VII wisely favoured everything which paralyzed the power of Plantagenet, and supported his enemies. The murder of Becket and the other exiles who had protested against the despotism which Henry exercised against the Church, found refuge and help at the court of France; and the sons of Henry were thus able to assert their rights against their father in Normandy, were supported first by Louis VII and then by Philip Augustus.

The prestige of the Capetian kings grew in Normandy when Richard Cœur de Lion succeeded Henry II in 1189. Philip Augustus profited by the enmity between Richard and his brother John Lackland to gradually establish French domination in Normandy. A war between Richard and Philip Augustus resulted in the treaty of Josselin (1193) by which Philip Augustus acquired the French crown Norman Vexin and the castellannies of Nonancourt, Ivry, Pacy, Vernon, and Gaillon. A second war between Richard and Philip Augustus, then John Lackland, Lord of Eu and Gilbert Maminot, not only theological but also scientific and literary questions were discussed. The Norman court was a kind of Academy and an active centre of literary production. The chaplain of Duchess Matilda, Gui de Ponthieu, Bishop of Amiens, composed in 1067 a Latin poem on the battle of Hastings; the abbot of William the Conqueror, William Normandy was marked by the production of important works, chief of which was the "Roman de Rou" of Robert or rather Richard Wace (1100–75), a canon of Bayeux. In this, which consists of nearly 17,000 lines and was continued by Benoît de Sainte-More, Wace relates the history of the dukes of Normandy down to the battle of Tancrode. Mention must also be made of the great French poem which the Norman Amibroise wrote somewhat prior to 1196 on the Jerusalem pilgrimage of Richard Cœur de Lion. As early as the 12th century Normandy was an important commercial centre. Guillaume de Neubrig wrote that Rouen was one of the most celebrated cities of Europe and that the Seine brought thither the commercial products of many countries. The "Établissements Rouens" in which was drawn up the "custom" adopted by Rouen, were copied not only by the other Norman towns but by the cities with which Rouen maintained constant commercial intercourse, e.g., Angoulême, Bayonne, Cognac, St. Jean d'Angély, Niort, Poitiers, La Rochelle, Saintes, and Tours. The ghilde of Rouen, a powerful commercial association, possessed in England from the time of Edward the Confessor the port of Dungeness, now Dungeness, near London, and its merchandise entered London free.

Once in the power of the Capetians, Normandy became an important strategic point in the struggle against the English, masters of Poitou and Guyenne in the south of France. Norman sailors were enrolled by Philip VI of France for a naval campaign against England in 1340 which resulted in the battle of Ecluse. Under John II the Good, the States of Normandy, angered by the ravages committed by Edward III of England on his landing in the province, voted (1349–50) subsidies for the conquest of England. The Valois dynasty was in great danger when Charles the Bad, King of Navarre, who possessed important lands in Normandy, succeeded in 1356 in detaching from John II of France a number of Norman barons. John II appraising the danger came suddenly to Rouen, put several barons to death, and took Charles the Bad prisoner. Shortly afterwards Normandy was one of the provinces of France most faithful to the Dauphin Charles, the future Charles V, and the hope the English entertained in 1359 of seeing Normandy ceded to them by the Preliminaries of London was not ratified by the treaty of Brétigny (1360); Normandy remained French. The victory of Championne V consolidated the prestige of the Valois in this province. In 1388 Normandy furnished 1387 vessels for an expedition against England never executed. In 1418 the campaign of Henry V in Normandy was for a long time paralysed by the resistance of Rouen, which finally capitulated in 1419, and in 1420 all Normandy became again almost English.

The Duke of Clarence, brother of Henry V of England, was made lieutenant-general in the province. Henry VI and the Duke of Bedford founded a university at Caen which had faculties of canon and civil law, to which Charles VII in 1450 added those of theology, medicine, and arts. This last attempt at English domination in Normandy was marked by the execution at Rouen of Blessed Joan of Arc. English rule, however, was undermined by incessant conspiracies, especially on the hotel de Rouen, and by revolts in 1435–36. The revolt of Val de Vire is famous and was the origin of an entire ballad literature, called "Vaux de Vire", in which the poet Oliver Boscelin excelled. These songs, which later became known in the provinces, in the crystallized form of the "Vaudevielle", were in the beginning chiefly of an historical nature recounting the invasion of Normandy by the English. Profitting by the panic opinion of which the "Vaux de Vire" gave evidence, the Constable de Richemont opposed the English on Norman ter-

The Norman school of architecture from the thirteenth to the fifteenth century produced superb Gothic edifices, chiefly characterized by the height of their spires and bell-towers. Throughout the Middle Ages Normandy, greatly influenced by St. Bernard and the Cistercians, was distinguished for its veneration of the Blessed Virgin. It was under her protection that William the Conqueror placed his expedition to England. One of the most ancient mural paintings in France is in the chapel of the Hospice St. Julien at Petit-Quevilly, formerly the house of one of the early dukes of Normandy, portraying the Annunciation, the Birth of Christ, and the Blessed Virgin suckling the Infant Jesus during the flight into Egypt. As an example of this type Robert or rather Richard Wace wrote the history of Mary and that of the establishment of the feast of the Immaculate Conception. The Norman students at Paris placed themselves under the patronage of the Immaculate Conception which thus became the "feast of the Normans"; this appellation does not seem to date beyond the thirteenth century. During the modern period the Normans have been distinguished for their commercial expeditions by sea and tours of discovery. As early as 1366 the Normans had established markets on the coast of Africa and it was from Caux that Jean de Bithencourt set out in 1402 for the conquest of the Canaries. He opened up to Vasco da Gama the route to the Cape of Good Hope and to Christopher Columbus that to America. Two of his chaplains, Pierre Bontier and Jean le Verrier, gave an account of his voyage in a manuscript known as "Le Canarien", edited in 1874. Jean Ango, born at Dieppe about the end of the fifteenth century, acquired as a ship-owner a fortune exceeding that of many princes of his time. The Portuguese having in time of peace, seized (1580) a ship which belonged to him, he sent a flotilla to blockade Lisbon and ravage the Portuguese coast. The ambassador sent by the King of Portugal to Francis I to negotiate the matter, was referred to the citizen of Dieppe. Ango was powerful enough to assist the armaments of Francis I against England. He died in 1531.

Jean Parmentier (1494–1543), another navigator and a native of Dieppe, was, it is held, the first Frenchman to take ships to Brazil; to him is also ascribed the honour of having discovered Sumatra in 1529. Poet as well as sailor, he wrote in verse the "Description Nouvelle des Merveilles de ce monde". The foundation by Francis I in 1517 of the "French City" which afterwards became Havre de Grace, shows the importance which French royalty attached to the Norman coast. Nor was commerce much developed by Henry II and Catherine de Medicis. They granted to the port of Rouen a sort of monopoly for the importation of spices and drugs arriving by way of the Atlantic, and when the Huguenots came to Rouen in 1550 the merchants of that town contrived to give to the nearby wood the appearance of the country of the Brasil "with three hundred naked men, equipped like savages of America, whence comes the word of Brasil". Among these three hundred men were fifty real slaves, and there also figured in this exhibition "several monkeys and squirrel monkeys which the merchants of Rouen had brought from Brazil." The description of the festivities, which bore a marked and exclusive character, the intercourse between Normandy and America, was published together with numerous figures. After the Reformation religious wars interrupted the maritime activity of the Normans for a time. Rouen took sides with the League, Caen with Henry IV, but with the restoration of peace the maritime expeditions recommenced. Normans founded Quebec in 1608, opened markets in Brazil in 1612, visited the Sonda Islands in 1617, and colonized Curacao in 1634. The French possession of New France is to a large extent of Norman origin. During the French Revolution Normandy was one of the centres of the federalist movement known as the Girondins. Caen and Evreux were important centres for the Girondins; Busot, who led the movement, was a Norman, and it was from Caen that Charlotte Corday set out to slay the "montagnard" Marat. The royalist movement "La Chouannerie" had also one of its centres in Normandy.

GEORGES GYAU.

NORTON, Sylvester (alias Smith, Newton), controversial writer and English missionary priest; b. 1570 or 1572 in Somersethshire, 17 March, 1630. After receiving minor orders at Reims in 1590, he went to the English College, Rome, where he completed his studies and was ordained priest. In May, 1596, he was sent on the English mission, and his energetic character, combined with the fact that he was one of the ablest and most popular clergy in 1600. In the proceedings following upon the Gunpowder Plot, he was committed to Bridewell Gaol. From his prison he addressed a letter to the Earl of Salisbury, dated 1 Dec., 1605, in which he protests his innocence, and in proof of his loyalty promises to repair to Rome, and labour that the pope shall bind all the Catholics of England to be true, true, and loyal subjects, and that hostages shall be sent "for the affermation of those things." He was thereupon banished along with forty-six other priests (1606), went to Rome, and entered the Society of Jesus. He was for some time employed in the Jesuit colleges on the Continent, but in 1611 returned to the English mission, and in 1621 was made superior of the Hampshire district, where he died.

He wrote: "An Antidote, or Treatise of Thirty Controversies: With a large Discourse of the Church" (1622); "An Appendix to the Antidote" (1621); "The Pseudo-Scripturist" (1623); "A true report of the Private Colloquy between M. Smith, alias Norton, and M. W..." (1624), etc. These works are compared by "Discourse proving that a man who believeth in the Trinity, the Incarnation, etc., and yet believeth not all other inferior Articles, cannot be saved" (1625).

Northampton, Diocese of (Nortantoniensis), in England, comprises the Counties of Northampton, Bedford, Buckingham, Cambridge, Huntingdon, Northampton, and Suffolk, and includes most of the agricultural districts and fenlands, where Catholics are comparatively few (see, in article England, Map of the Ecclesiastical Province of Westminster). The number of secular priests is 70, of regular 18, of chapels and stations, 73, of End of Catholic, 15, 398 (1912). The most important religious orders are the Benedictines, the Franciscans, the Carmelites, and the Jesuits. Of convents the most notable are those of the Benedictines at East Bergholt, the Sisters of Notre Dame at Northampton and Norwich, the Sisters of Jesus and Mary at Ipswich, the Poor Sisters of Nazareth at Northampton, and the Dames Bernardines at Slough, who at their own expense built a fine church for that parish. The principal towns are Norwich, Ipswich, and Cambridge, the university town where, according to tradition, St. Simon Stock, of the Order of Carmel, received the brown scapular from Our Lady. The established Gothic Catholic church at Cambridge, one of the most beautiful in the kingdom (consecrated in 1890), is dedicated to Our Lady and the English Martyrs. It is the gift of Mrs. Lyne Stephens of Lynford Hall, Norfolk. Norwich possesses one of the grandest and most commodious but unpretentious building designed by the younger Pugin. The first Bishop of Northampton, William Waring, had been Vicar Apostolic of the Eastern District before the Restoration; among the noble hierarchy; he resigned the see in 1858, and died in 1865. His successor, Francis Kerril Amberth, was consecrated 4 July, 1858, and resigned in 1879, the see being occupied the following years by Arthur Riddell, who d. 15 Sept., 1907. The present Bishop of Northampton (1910), Frederick William Keating, b. at Birmingham, 15 June, 1859, was consecrated 25 Feb., 1908.

Northampton was the scene of the last stand made by St. Thomas of Canterbury against the arbitrary conduct of Henry II. Bury St. Edmund's, anciently so renowned as the place where the body of St. Edmund, King and Martyr, was enshrined and venerated as well as for its Benedictine abbey, has become familiar to the modern reader mainly through Carlyle's "Past and Present," in the pages of which Abbot Samson (1135-1211), the hero of Jocelin's Chronicle, occupies the central position. The Isle of Ely and St. Etheldreda are famous in English ecclesiastical history. Canute, King of England, was accustomed to row or skate across the fens each year to be present on the Feast of the Purification at the Mass in the Abbey Church of Ely, and Thomas Elginas ascribes to him the well-known lines beginning, "Sweety sang the monks of Ely". At Walsingham, also in this diocese, only ruins are now left of a shrine which, in the Middle Ages, was second only to the Holy House of Loreto, of which it was a copy. Many great names of the Reformation period are connected with the district covered by the Diocese of Northampton. Catherine of Aragon died at Kimbolton and was buried at Peterborough, where the short inscription, "Queen Cathérine", upon a stone slab marks her resting-place. From Framlingham Castle, the ruins of which are still considerable, Queen Mary Tudor set out on the death of Edward VI, to contest with Lady Jane Grey her right to the throne. At Ipswich, the birthplace of Cardinal Wolsey, is still to be seen the gateway of the College built by him. At Fotheringhay, Mary Queen of Scots was beheaded (1587), and at Wisbech Castle, where so many missionary priests, during penal times, were imprisoned, William Watson, the last but one of the Marian bishops, died, a prisoner for the Faith (1584). Sir Henry Bedingfield, the faithful follower of Queen Mary and the gentle "savior of the Princes Elizabeth," was associated with this diocese through Oxburgh Hall, his mansion, still occupied by another Sir Henry Bedingfield, his direct descendant. The Festons of Paston are memorable in connexion with the celebrated "Paston Letters." Many of the priests who suffered death under the penal laws belonged to the districts now included in the Diocese of Northampton, in particular, Henry Heath, born, 1600, at Peterborough; Venerable Henry Walpole, S.J., (d. 1655), a native of Norfolk, and Venerable Robert Southwell, S.J. (1560-95), the Catholic poet, also born in Norfolk. In more recent times Bishop Milner was connected with the preservation of the Faith in this part of England. Alban Butler, the hagiographer, was born in Northamptonshire and was resident priest at Norwich from 1754-66. Dr. Hussonobeth resided for some years at Cowley, where he is buried (see Hussonobeth, Frederick Charles). Father Ignatius Spencer, the Passionist, son of Earl Spencer, and formerly Rector of Brington, was received into the Catholic Church at Northampton, and Faber, the Oratorian, held the Anglican living of Etton, Huntingdonshire, before his conversion.

JOHN FRELAND.

NORTH CAROLINA, one of the original thirteen States, is situated between 33° 35' and 39° 53' N. lat., and 75° 25' and 84° 30' W. long. It is bounded on the north by Virginia, east and south-east by the Atlantic Ocean, south by South Carolina and Georgia, and west and north-west by Tennessee. Its extreme length from east to west is 1033 miles, with an extreme breadth of 187 miles, and an average breadth of about 100 miles. Its area is 52,250 square miles, of which 3670 is water. Originally it included the present State of Tennessee, ceded to the United States in 1790. In 1784-85 the people of this section made an unsuccessful effort to set up an independent state named Franklin, with John Sevier as governor. It is divided into ninety-eight counties and has (1910) ten Congressional districts, with a population of 2,206,287. The capital is Raleigh, situated nearly in the geographical centre of the state; the principal cities are Wilmington, Charlotte, Asheville, Greensboro, and Winston.

PHYSICAL CHARACTERISTICS. North Carolina has a remarkable variety of topography, soil, climate, and production and falls naturally into three divisions. The eastern or Tidewater section begins at the ocean and extends north-westward to the foot of the hills; the land is level, with sluggish streams and many marshes and swamps, including part of the great Dismal Swamp. It is the home of the long leaf pine, with its products of pitch, tar, and turpentine, long a source of wealth. The principal productions are corn, cotton, and rice; while "truck gardening" has recently grown into an important industry. The fisheries are also valuable. The central or Piedmont section, comprising nearly half the state and extending westward to the eastern foot of the Blue Ridge, is more or less hilly, but the rich intervening valleys produce practically all the general crops, including cotton and tobacco, with fruits of all kinds. The soil, though not naturally rich, is capable of high degree of cultivation. The westward section, which runs to the Tennessee line, is mostly mountainous, with rich valleys and sheltered coves. Its principal productions are modified somewhat by its greater elevation. It contains some lofty peaks, Mount Mitchell being the highest peak east of the Rocky Mountains. The state is well watered, having numerous rivers, which, though not generally navigable, in their rapid descent furnish enormous water-power, much of which has been recently developed. They may be divided into three classes, those flowing indirectly into the Mississippi, those flowing into the Great Pee Dee and the Santee, and those flowing into the Atlantic. The coast line, nearly four hundred miles long, includes Cape Fear, Lookout, and Hatteras; and, at varying distances from the ocean, run a series of sounds chief of which are curvature, Albemarle, and Pamlico. There are good harbours at Edenton, New Bern, Washington, Beaufort, and Wilmington, including Southport. The climate is gradually equable, and North Carolina produces all the crops grown in the United States with the exception of sub-tropical cane and fruits. Four of the wine grapes, the Catawba, Isabella, Lincoln, and Scuppernong, originated here. It has also large areas of the valuable timber of great variety. With a few rare exceptions all the known minerals are found in the state. In 1905, taking the fourteen leading industries, including about 90 per cent of the total, the net worth of manufacturing establishments, with a capital of $141,639,000, producing yearly products of the value of $142,520,776. The principal manufactured product was cotton, in which North Carolina ranked third among all the States, and tobacco, in which she ranked second.

RAILROADS AND BANKS.—There are in operation within the State 4387 miles of railroads, besides 911 miles of sidings, with a total valuation of $80,347,533, but capitalized for a much larger amount. The state has 321 banks organized under the state law; with an aggregate capital stock of $7,622,767; and 69 national banks with a capital of $6,752,950. The entire recognized state debt is $6,880,950, the greater part of which could be paid by the sale of certain railroad stock held by the state.

HISTORY. North Carolina was originally inhabited by various tribes of Indians, the three principal ones being the Tuscaroras in the east, the Catawbas in the centre, and the Cherokees in the west. A small body of Cherokees is still located in the mountains section. In 1584 Queen Elizabeth granted to Sir Walter Raleigh the right to discover and hold any lands not inhabited by Christian people. This charter constitutes the first step in the work of English colonization in America. Five voyages were made under it, but without success in establishing a permanent settlement. In 1663 Charles II granted to Sir George Carteret and seven others a stretch of land on the Atlantic coast, lying between Virginia and Florida, and running west to the South Seas. The grantees were created "absolute lords proprietors" of the province of Carolina, with full powers to make and execute such laws as they deemed proper. This was enlarged in 1665 both as to territory and jurisdiction, and in 1669 the lords proprietors promulgated the "Fundamental Constitutions of Carolina," framed by John Locke, the philosopher, but they proved too theoretical for practical application. The lords proprietors made every effort to colonize the province, which already contained one or two small settlements and for which they appointed governors at various times, frequently with local councils.
Albemarle, the name originally given to what now constitutes North Carolina, was augmented by settlements from Virginia, New England, and Bermuda. In 1674 the population was about four thousand. In 1729, Carolina became a royal province, the king having purchased from the proprietors seven-eighths of their domain. Cartersville, subsequently Earl Granville, surrendered his right of jurisdiction, but retained in severalty his share of the land. It gained considerable ascensions in population by a colony of Scotch Highlanders on Cape Fear, of Moravians at Salem, and of Scotch-Irish and Pennsylvania Dutch, who settled in different parts of the state. For many years, however, there has been very little immigration and the population is now essentially homogeneous.

The people of North Carolina were among the earliest and most active promoters of the Revolution. The Stamp Tax was bitterly resisted; a provincial congress, held at New Bern, elected delegates to the first Continental Congress in September, 1774, and joined in the declaration of Colonial rights. As early as 20 May, 1775, a committee of citizens met in Charlotte and issued the "Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence," formally renouncing allegiance to the British Crown. In December, 1776, the provincial congress at Halifax adopted a State constitution which immediately went into effect, with Richard Caswell as governor. The delegates from this State signed the Declaration of Independence and the Articles of Confederation. In 1786 the General Assembly elected delegates to the Federal Constitutional Convention and its delegates present signed the Constitution, but the General Assembly did not ratify it until 21 November, 1789, after the Federal Government had been organized and gone into operation. During the Revolution the state furnished the Continental army with 22,910 men. Important battles were fought at Guilford Court House (between Green and Cornwallis, 13 March, 1781), Alamance, Moore's Creek, Ramspur's Mill, and King's Mountain on the state line. There was a predominant Union sentiment in North Carolina in the early part of 1861; and at an election held 28 February, the people voted against secession, but after the firing on Fort Sumter and the actual beginning of the war, a convention, called by the Legislature without submission to the people, met on 21 June, 1861, passed an ordinance of secession, and ratified the Confederate Constitution. Fort Fisher was the only important battle fought in the state. The State sent 125,000 soldiers into the Civil War, the largest number ever sent by any Southern state. In 1865 a provisional government was organized by President Johnson, and later the state came under the Reconstruction Act passed by Congress, 2 March, 1867. On 11 July, 1868, the state government was restored by proclamation of the president.

The Constitution of 1776 had some remarkable provisions. It allowed free negroes to vote because they were "freemen," all slaves, of course, being disfranchised because in law they were considered chattels. Any freeman could vote for the members of the House of Commons; but must own fifty acres of land to vote for a senator, who must himself own at least one hundred acres. As North Carolina, was then one hundred acres. The governor must own a freehold of five thousand dollars in value. The borough towns of Edenton, New Bern, Wilmington, Salisbury, Hillsboro, and Raleigh, had a mayor and a council, with its streets.

Not a member in the House of Commons apart from the counties. It declared: "That all men have a natural and inalienable right to worship Almighty God, according to the dictates of their own conscience," but that no person, who denies the truth of the Protestant religion should hold any civil office of trust or profit. No clergyman or preacher of any denomination should be a member of either house of the Legislature while continuing in the exercise of his pastoral functions. All of these provisions, except the declaration of religious freedom, have since been abandoned. The Convention of 1835 adopted many amendments, ratified in 1838; among others, all persons of negro blood to the fourth generation were disfranchised; and the Protestant qualification for office omitted. The Constitution of 1868 restored negro suffrage, but in 1900 amendments, adopted by the Legislature and ratified by the people, provided that every voter should have paid his poll tax and be able to read and write any section of the Constitution; but that any person entitled to vote on or prior to 1 January, 1867, or his lineal descendant, might register on a permanent roll until 1 November, 1908. This is called the "Grandfather Clause."
office under every constitution. The preamble to the present Constitution recognizes the dependence of the people upon Almighty God, and their gratitude to Him for the existence of their civil, political, and religious liberties. The Legislature is opened with prayer. The law requires the observance of Sunday, and punishes any disturbance of religious congregations. The following are legal holidays: 1 January (Lee's birthday); 22 February; 12 April (anniversary of Halifax Resolution); 10 May (Confederate Decoration Day); 20 May (anniversary of Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence); 4 July; 1st Monday in September (Labour Day); general election day in November; Thanksgiving; and Christmas. Neither Sundays nor holidays are regarded as dies non except in certain limited cases. Religious bodies may become incorporated either under the general law or by special Act. If not specifically incorporated they are regarded as quasi corporations, and may exercise many corporation powers. The Protestant Episcopal Church has been created a corporation sole by special Act of the Legislature. All real and personal property used exclusively for religious, charitable, or educational purposes, as also property whose income is required, is exempt from taxation. Ministers of the Gospel are exempt from jury duty and their private libraries from taxation. The only privileged communications recognized are those between lawyers and their clients, and between priests and their patients. There is no statute allowing this exemption to priests, and therefore they stand as at common law; but there is no recorded instance in which they have ever been sued for libel of the confessional.

MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE. Originally in this colony legally valid marriages could be solemnized only by ministers of the Church of England, of whom there were few, nearly all in the eastern part of the colony. In 1715 the power was conferred upon the governor; in 1741 upon justices of the peace; in 1766 upon ministers of the Presbyterian Church, and finally in 1778 upon the ministers of all denominations. The ceremony can now be performed by an ordained minister of any religious denomination or a justice of the peace; and the peculiar marriage custom of the Friends is recognized as valid. Males under sixteen and females under fourteen are legally incapable of marriage, and all marriages of those related by consanguinity closer than the degree of first cousin, and between whites and negroes or Indians are void. A marriage licence is required, and the Register is forbidden by law to issue licences for the marriage of any one under eighteen years of age without written consent of the parent or one standing in loco parentis. Absolute divorce (a seco) may be obtained for the following causes: pre-existing natural and continued impotence of either party; if they shall have lived separate and apart continuously for ten years, and have no children; adultery by the wife, or pregnancy at the time of marriage unknown to husband and not by him; continued fornication and adultery by the husband. Either party may remarry, but no alimony is allowed. Divorce a mensa et toro may be granted with alimony for the following causes: if either party shall abandon him or her family, or turn the other out of doors, or shall by cruel and barbarous treatment endanger the life of the other, or shall offer such indignities to the person of the other as to make his or her life intolerable, or shall become an habitual drunkard. Upon such a divorce parties cannot remarry.

Requests for charitable purposes must be clearly defined, as the granting of any aid to persons not in need and there must be some one capable of taking the bequest. Whether a bequest for Masses would be specifically enforced by the courts, has not been decided, but it is not probable that it would be interfered with, as the party has never invoked the doctrine of Supersitious Uses. Cemeteries are provided for and protected by law. In administering oaths, the party sworn must "lay his hand upon the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God"; but those having conscientious scruples may appeal to God with uplifted hand; and "Quakers, Moravians, Dunkers, and Mennonites" may affirm.

PROHIBITION. For many years prohibition sentiment has been growing until it culminated, in 1908, in the passage by the General Assembly of an act making it unlawful to make or sell any spirituous, vinous, fermented, or malt liquors within the state, except for sacramental purposes, or by a registered pharmacist on a physician's prescription. Native ciders may be sold without restriction; and native wines at the place of manufacture in sealed or crated packages containing not less than two and a half gallons each, which must not be opened on the premises.

In the above, the Catholic population was reduced by deducting 15 per cent for children under nine years of age.

NORTH CAROLINA, VICARIAE APOSTOLICAE OF, was canonically established and separated from the Diocese of Charleston, South Carolina by Bull, 3 March, 1868; James (now Cardinal) Gibbons as first vicar. It comprised the entire state until 1910, when eight counties were attached to Belmont Abbey. The latest statistics, for the entire state, show secular priests, 17; religious, 16; churches, 15; missions, 34; stations, 47; chapels, 5; Catholic, 3,570. The Apostolate Company, a corporation of secular priests at Nazareth, maintains a boys' orphanage and industrial school, and publishes "Truth", a monthly periodical. There is a girls' school and sanatorium at Asheville, and hospitals at Charlotte (Sisters of Mercy) and Greensboro (Sisters of Charity). There are parochial schools at Asheveile, Charlotte, Salisbury, Durham, Newton Grove, Raleigh, and Wilmington. The vicariate is subject to the Propaganda, and its present vicar is the Abbot Ordinary of Belmont.

Belmont Cathedral Abbey. By Bull of Pius X, 8 June, 1910, the Counties of Gaston, Lincoln, Cleveland, Rutherford, Polk, Burke, McDowell, Catawba, and Wilkes were cut off from the vicariate to form the diocese of the Cathedral Abbey at Belmont, canonically erected by Mgr Diomede Falconio, Apostolic Delegate in the United States, on 18 October, 1910. The vicariate remains under the administration of the abbot ordinary at Belmont until a diocese can be formed in the state. Belmont Abbey, situated in Gaston County, was erected into an abbey by Pope Pius X on 19 December, 1884, its first abbot being Rt. Rev. Leo Haid. He was born at Latrobe, Pennsylvania, 15 July, 1849, ordained priest in 1872, and served as chaplain and professor of St. Vincent's College in Westmoreland, Pennsylvania. As Vicar Apostolic of North Carolina in 1887, he was consecrated titular Bishop of Messene 1 July, 1888. The abbey itself has many extra-territorial dependencies, i.e., military colleges in Savannah, Georgia and Richmond, Virginia, and parishes in both of these cities besides various missions in the state itself; and forms legal corporations in Virginia, North Carolina, and Georgia. To it also is attached a college for secular education and a seminary for the secular and regular clergy. To the abbey proper belong 32 priests, 2 deacons, 6 clerics in minor orders, and 10 lay brothers. At Belmont is also a college for the higher education of women under the Sisters of Mercy, with 60 pupils, an orphanage for girls and a preparatory school for little boys.

Prominent Catholics. — Though there are few Catholics in the state, an unusual proportion have occupied prominent official positions. Thomas Burke was governor, and William Gaston, Dr. M. E. Manly, and R. M. Douglas were associate justices of the Supreme Court. R. R. Heath, W. A. Moore, and W. S. O'B. Robinson were Superior Court judges, and R. D. Douglas attorney general. Prominent benefactors were Dr. D. O'Malley, Lawrence Brown, and Raphael Guastatino, Francis C. Tierman (Christian Reid) is a native of North Carolina.

North Dakota, one of the United States of America, originally included in the Louisiana Purchase. Little was known of the region prior to the expedition of Lewis and Clark, who spent the winter of 1804-5 about thirty miles north-west of Bismarck. In 1811 the Astor expedition encountered a band of Sioux near the boundary of North and South Dakota on the Missouri. Settlement was long delayed on account of the numerous Indian wars, and the land was practically given up to hunters and trappers. In 1849 all that part of Dakota east of the Missouri and White Earth Rivers was made part of the Territory of Minnesota, and in 1854 all to the west of the said rivers was included in the Territory of Nebraska. Finally, 2 March, 1861, President Buchanan signed the bill creating the Territory of North Dakota, with Dr. William Jayne of Springfield, Ill., as first governor; and on 2 November, 1889, the State of North Dakota was formed. North Dakota is bounded on the north by the Mackenzie and the White Sea, on the south by South Dakota, on the east by Minnesota (the Red River dividing), and on the west by Montana. The surface is chiefly rolling prairie, with an elevation of from eight hundred to nine hundred feet in the Red

Northcote, James Spencer, b. at Feniton Court, Devonshire, 25 May, 1821; d. at Stoke-upon-Trent, Staffordshire, 3 March, 1897. He was the second son of George Barons Northcote, a gentleman of an ancient Devonshire family of Norman descent. Educated first at Ilamington Grammar School, he won in 1837 a scholarship at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, where he came under Newman's influence. In 1841 he became B.A., and in the following year married his cousin, Susannah Spencer Ruscombe Poole. Taking Anglican Orders in 1844 he accepted a curacy at Ilfracombe; but when his wife was received into the Catholic Church in 1845, he resigned his office. In 1846 he himself was received, being ordained at Prior Park College, where he continued as a master for some time. From June, 1852, until September, 1854, he acted as editor of the “Rambler”, and about the same time helped to edit the well-known “Clifton Tracts”. After his wife's death in 1853 he devoted himself to preparation for the priesthood, first under Newman at Edgbaston, then at the Collegiate Pio, Rome. On 29 July, 1855, he was ordained priest at Stone, where his daughter had entered the novitiate. He returned to Rome to complete his ecclesiastical studies, also acquiring the profound erudition in Christian antiquities which was later to be emahising in his great work “Roma Sottomarina”. In 1857 he was appointed to the mission of Stoke-upon-Trent, which he served until 1860, when he was called to Oscot College as vice-president, and six months later became president. Under his rule, which lasted for seventeen years, the college entered on an unprecedented degree of prosperity, and his influence on education was felt far outside the walls of Oscot. Failing health caused him to resign in 1874, and he returned to the mission, first at Stone (1878), and then at Stoke-upon-Trent (1881), where he spent the rest of his life revered by all for his learning, his noble character, and his sanctity. During the last twenty years of his life he suffered from creeping paralysis, which slowly deprived him of all bodily motion, though leaving his mind intact. He had been made a canon of the Diocese of Birmingham in 1861, canon-theologian in 1862, and provost in 1885. In 1881 the pope conferred on him the doctorate in divinity. Dr. Northcote's wide scholarship is witnessed to by many works, chief among which is “Roma Sottomarina”, the great work on the Catacombs, written in conjunction with William H. Brown, low, afterwards Bishop of Clifton. This work has been translated into French and German; and it won for its authors recognition as being among the greatest living authorities on the subject. Other works were: “The Fourfold Difficulty of Anglicanism” (Derby, 1846); “A Pilgrimage to La Salette” (London, 1852); “Roman Catacombs” (London, 1857); “Mary in the Gospels” (London, 1867); “Celebrated Sanctuaries of the Madonna” (London, 1868); “A Visit to the Roman Catacombs” (London, 1877); “Epitaphs of the Catacombs” (London, 1877).

Edwin Burton.
River valley, from thirteen hundred to fifteen hundred feet in the Devil's Lake region and from two thousand to twenty-eight hundred feet west of Minot. The chief rivers are the Missouri, Red, Sheyenne, James, Mouse, and their tributaries. The state forms a rectangle, measuring approximately two hundred and fourteen miles from north to south and three hundred and thirty from east to west, and has an area of 7,795 square miles, of which 650 is water. The population (1910) was 577,056, an increase of 62.8 per cent. since 1900.

Resources.—Agriculture.—The number of farms in the state in 1910 was 64,442, number of acres in cultivation over 13 millions. Wheat is the dominant crop, the Red River Valley being perhaps the most famous wheat-producing region in the world. Oats, flax, and barley are also produced in large quantities. The prairies offer fine grazing ground and the state has 1,319,870 head of live stock. Her forests aggregate 95,918 acres; there are 135,150 cultivated fruit trees, and 2,381 acres of berries. Besides many natural groves, very rich in wild small fruit, there are a vast number of cultivated fruit and groves, and some fine nurseries, the largest of which is near Devil's Lake and consists of about 400 acres.

Mining.—In the western part of the state, North Dakota has a coal supply greater than that of any other state in the Union; coal is mined at Minot, Burlington, Kenmare, Ray, Dickinson, Dunseith, and other places; the supply is cheap and inexhaustible for fuel, gas, electricity, and power. In 1908 there were 88 mines in operation and 250,435 tons mined. Clay is used for pottery, fire and pressed brick abound in Stark, Dunn, Mercer, Morton, Hettinger, and Billings counties. Cement is found in Cavalier County on the Missouri River and Pembina County. The North Dakota sandstone at the base of the upper cretaceous, at a depth of from eight hundred feet in the south-east to fifteen hundred feet at Devil's Lake. Good common brick clay may be found practically all over the state from deposits in the glacial lakes. North Dakota has 5012 miles of railroad, and four main lines cross the state. There is direct railway communication with Winnipeg, Brandon, and other points on the Canadian Pacific.

Matters Affecting Religion.—North Dakota is a code State. The civil and criminal codes prepared by the New York commissioners, but not therein but not therein, were adopted by that State, Territory in 1865; a probate code was adopted the same year, and thus the Territory of Dakota was the first English-speaking community to adopt a codification of its substantive law. The territorial laws, compiled in 1887, were revised by the State in 1895, 1899, and 1905. Section 4, Article 1 of the State Constitution provides: "The free exercise and enjoyment of religious worship and belief, without discrimination or preference, shall be forever guaranteed in this State, and no person shall be rendered incompetent to be a witness or juror on account of his opinion on matters of religious belief; but the liberty of conscience hereby secured shall not be so construed as to excite acts of licentiousness, or justify practices inconsistent with the peace or safety of this State." The statute marks a milestone in the prevention of free exercise of religious worship and belief, or to compel by threats or violence any particular form of worship, or to disturb a religious assemblage by profane discourse, indecent acts, unnecessary noise, selling liquor, keeping open bawdy shops, or exhibiting plays without license, within a mile of such assemblages. Servile labour (except works of necessity or charity) is forbidden on Sunday; also public sports, trades, manufactures, mechanical employment, and public traffic (except that meats, milk, and fish may be sold before nine A.M., also food to be eaten on premises. Drugs, medicines, and surgical appliances may be sold at any time). Service of process except in criminal cases is prohibited on Sunday. A person uniformly keeping another day of the week as holy time, may labour on Sunday, provided he do not interrupt or disturb other persons in observing the first day of the week. Breaking the law is less than one dollar or more than ten dollars for each offence. It is a misdemeanour to serve civil process on Saturday on a person who keeps that day as the Sabbath.

Oaths.—Section 353 of the code of 1895, amended 1909, provides: "The following officers are authorized to administer oaths: each judge of the supreme court and his deputy, clerks of the district court, clerks of the county court with increased jurisdiction, county auditors and registers of deeds and their deputies within their respective counties, county commissioners within their respective counties, judges of the county court, public administrators within their respective counties, justices of the peace within their respective counties, notaries public anywhere in the State upon complying with the provisions of sections 545 and 546, city clerks or auditors, township clerks and village recorders in their respective cities, townships, and villages; each sheriff and his deputy within their respective counties in the cases provided by law; other officers in the cases especially provided by law to administer, an extra-judicial oath, except where the same is required by the provisions of some contract as the basis or proof of claim, or is agreed to be received by some person in proof of any fact in the performance of any contract, obligation or duty instead of other evidence. Blasphemy consists in wantonly uttering or publishing words, reproaches, or profane words against God, Jesus Christ, the Holy Ghost, the Holy Scripture, or the Christian religion. The Christian religion swearing consists in any use of the name of God, Jesus Christ, or the Holy Ghost, either in imprecating Divine vengeance upon the utterer or any other person, in a light, trifling, or irreverent speech. Blasphemy is a misdemeanour, and profane swearing is punishable by a fine of one dollar for each offence. Obscenity in a public place or in the presence of females, or of children under ten years of age is a misdemeanour.

Exemptions from Taxation.—"All public school houses, academies, colleges, institutions of learning, with the books and furniture therewith, are exempt from taxation in any manner, but not from taxation in any manner, and also from taxation in any manner, and also from taxation in any manner, attached to such buildings, necessary for their proper occupancy and use, not to exceed forty acres in area and not leased or otherwise used with a view to profit; also all houses used exclusively for public worship and lots and parts of lots upon which such houses are erected; all land used exclusively for burying grounds or for a cemetery; all buildings and contents thereof used for public charity, including public hospitals under the control of religious or charitable societies used wholly or in part for public charity, together with the land actually occupied by such institutions, not leased or otherwise used with a view to profit, and all monies and credits appropriated solely to sustaining and belonging exclusively to such institutions, are exempt from taxation." All churches, parsonages, and usual outbuildings, and grounds not exceeding one acre on which the same are located, whether on one or more tracts, also all personal property of religious corporations, used for religious purposes, are exempt.

Matters Affecting Religious Work.—The law provides for corporations for religious, educational, benevolent, charitable, or scientific purposes, giving to such corporations power to acquire property, real and personal, by purchase, devise, or bequest and hold the same as and sell or mortgage it according to the by-laws or a majority of votes of the members. Catholic church corporations, according to diocesan statutes, consist of the bishop, vicar-general, local pastor, and two trustees. No corporation or association for religious purposes shall acquire or hold real estate of greater value than $200,000 (laws of 1909). Charitable trusts are favored if conformable to the statute against perpetuities, which forbids the assignment of power or alienation for a longer period than the lives of persons in being at the creation of condition (Hager v. Sacriston, 123 N. W. Rep., 518). Cemetery corporation may be formed with power of regulation. The net proceeds must go to protect and improve the grounds and not to the profit of the corporation or members. Interment lot inalienable, but any heir may release to another heir. Cemetery grounds are exempt from all process. Sales, division of lands and use.

Marriage and Divorce.—Any unmarried male of the age of eighteen or upwards and any unmarried female of the age of fifteen or upwards, not otherwise disqualified, are capable of consenting to marriage, but if the male is under twenty-one or the female under eighteen, the licence shall not be issued without the consent of parents or guardian, if there be any. Marriage between a parent and child, including grandparent and grandchild or any relationship, is declared to be incestuous and absolutely void, and this applies to illegitimate as well as legitimate children and relations. Marriage contracted by a person having a former husband or wife, if the former marriage has not been annulled or dissolved, is illegal from the beginning; unless the former husband or wife was absent and believed by such person to be dead for five years immediately proceeding. Judges of all courts of record and justices of the peace, within the jurisdiction, are authorized to perform the ceremony. Priests of every church may perform the marriage ceremony. The form used by Friends or Quakers is also valid. Licences, issued by the county judges, in the county where the contracting parties reside, must be obtained and the persons performing the ceremony must file the certificate thereof, and such licence with the county judge within thirty days after the marriage, such certificate to be signed by two witnesses and the person performing the ceremony. Indians contracting marriage according to Indian custom and co-habiting as man and wife, are deemed legally married, if all the conditions of a lawful marriage are satisfied at the time: (1) if the person seeking annulment was under the age of legal consent, and such marriage was contracted without the consent of parent or guardian, unless after attaining the age of consent, they lived together as husband and wife; (2) when former husband or wife of either party was living and former marriage then in force; (3) when either party was of unsound mind unless after coming to reason the parties lived together as husband and wife; (4) when consent was obtained by fraud, unless after full knowledge of facts the party defendant continued to live with the other in marriage relation (5) when consent was obtained by force, unless afterwards they lived freely together; (6) incapacity.

Actions for annulment where former husband or wife is living, and where party is of unsound mind, may be brought at any time before the death of either party. Actions for annulment for other causes must be brought by the party injured within four years after arriving at age of consent or by parent or guardian before the child marries, also for children under 18 years of age. When a marriage is annulled children begotten before the judgment are legitimate and succeed to the estate of both parents. Marriages between white persons and coloured persons of one eighth or more negro blood are null and void by Act of 1907, and severe penalty is provided against parties, officials, and clergy for violation of the law. Divorce may be granted for: (1) adultery, (2) extreme cruelty, (3) wilful desertion, (4) desertion or abandonment, (5) habitual intemperance, (6) conviction of felony. Neither party to a divorce may marry within three months after decree is granted. Wilful desertion, wilful neglect, or habitual intemperance must continue for one year before it is a cause for divorce. As to proof in divorce cases the Statute provides that no divorce can be granted on default of the defendant or upon the uncorroborated statement, admission, or testimony of parties, or upon any statement or evidence of facts made by revere, but the court must in addition to any statement or finding of revere, require proof of facts alleged. The court has held that the fact of marriage alleged in complaint may be admitted in answer without other corroboration. The restriction as to corroboration applies to testimony, not to pleading, and is intended to prevent collusive divorces. This statute is more severe as to proof than the proposed resolution, No. 13, of proceedings of the National Congress on Uniform Divorce which reads: "A decree should not be granted unless the cause is shown by affirmative proof and a clear preponderance of evidence on the part of the respondent." A residence of one year in the State is required for the plaintiff in an action of divorce. Dower and Curtesy are abolished, and a deed of the husband or wife is required to be signed by the husband and wife. Labour of children under fourteen years of age is prohibited, and stringent rules provide for regulation of those under sixteen, and no woman under eighteen years of age may be compelled to work over ten hours; age of consent is eighteen years.

Wills.—A woman is of age at eighteen, and any person of sound mind may, on arriving at that age, dispose of his or her real and personal property by will. A married woman may will her property without the consent of her husband. A "nuncupative will" is limited to $1000, and to cases where the testator is in military service in the field, or on board ship, and anticipates death, or where death is anticipated from a wound received that day. There must be two witnesses who are requested by the testator to act as such. An nuncupative will is one, written, and signed by the hand of the testator, and requires no other formalities. Other wills must be executed by the testator in presence of two witnesses, who in his presence and in the presence of each other, subscribe as witnesses.

Education.—The educational system in North Dakota is on a broad basis. Sections 16 and 36 of each congressional township are given to the common schools by Congress, also 6 per cent of the net proceeds of the sale of public lands subsequent to admission, to be used as a permanent fund for schools, interest only to be expended for support of common schools. The enabling act also gives 72 sections for university purposes, to be sold for not less than ten dollars per acre, proceeds to constitute a permanent fund, interest only to be expended. Also 90,000 acres for the Agricultural College, 40,000 acres for the School of Mines, Reform School, Deaf and Dumb School, Agricultural College, State University, two State Normal Schools; 50,000 acres for capital buildings and 170,000 acres for such other educational and charitable institutions as the legislature may determine. No part of the school fund may be used for support of any sectarian or denominational school, college, or university. The Normal Schools are located at Mayville and Valley City, the Industrial Training School at Ellendale, the School of Forestry at Bottineau, the Agricultural College at Fargo, the State University (Arts, Law, Engineering, Model High School, State School of Mines, Public Health Laboratory and Graduate Department) at Grand Forks; number of professors, instructors, and assistants, 68; lecturers, 13; students, 1,000. Charitable institutions are the Deaf and Dumb School at Devil's Lake, the Hospital for Feeble Minded at Grand Forks, the Indian Asylum at Jamestown, the School for the Blind at Bathgate, the Soldiers' Home at Lisbon, the Reform School at Mandan. The permanent school and institutional fund amounted to their $15,000 in 1903; the appropriation from that fund in 1903 was $274,348.80; in 1908, $545,814.66. Ample provisions are made for State and county institutes, and teachers are required to attend. Third Grade Certificates are abolished. The number of teachers for 1908 was 45. The monthly provisions are made for the extension of the High School system, and also for consolidated schools and transportation of children to the same. The legislative appropriation in 1909 for the university was $181,000.

Prisons and Reformatories.—The keeper of each prison is required to provide at the expense of the county for each prisoner who may be able and desirous to read, a copy of the Bible or New Testament to be used by the prisoner at seasonable and proper times during his confinement, and any minister of the Gospel is permitted access to such prisoners at seasonable and proper times to perform and instruct prisoners in their moral and religious duties. Suitable provisions are made for reduction of time for good behavior, for indeterminate sentences, and paroling prisoners.

Sale of Liquor.—The manufacture, importation, sale, gift, barter, or trade of intoxicating liquors by any person, association, or corporation as a beverage, is prohibited by Article 20 of the State constitution and statute. Exception is made in favor of sale in limited quantities on affidavit of applicant by druggists for medicinal, mechanical, scientific, and sacramental purposes, under permit granted at the discretion of the district. Not more than three-fourths of a half-pint may be sold to any one in one day and the purchaser must sign affidavit stating the particular disease for which the same is required. Sales to minors, habitual drunkards, and persons whose relatives forbid, are prohibited. Places where intoxicating liquors are sold or kept for sale or where persons are permitted to resort for purpose of drinking intoxicating liquors are declared to be common nuisances. The keeper is liable for the sale of intoxicating liquors and in a certain place on which a nuisance is abated the premises closed for one year. The statute also provides for civil liability against persons violating the law, in favor of those taking charge of and protecting minors, brothers, and in favor of every wife, child, parent, guardian, employer, or other person injured in person or property or means of support by any intoxicated person.

Statistics of the Protestant Churches.—The Episcopal Church has 4664 members; 1224 families; 97 Sunday School teachers; 741 pupils; 42 churches and chapels; 2200 sittings; 784 members in guilds. The value of the churches, chapels, and grounds is $158,055; rectories $49,000; other property $42,850. There are 6 parishes, 36 organized missions, and 44 unorganized missions. Total offerings for all purposes for the year ending 1 June, 1910, were $32,496.28. The Methodist Episcopal Church had in the State in 1908, 223 church buildings valued at $600,000, and 101 parsonages valued at $150,000, with a membership of about 11,000. The most important fact in connexion with this organization is the affiliation of Wesley College with the State university, where the Methodists aim to give religious and other instruction in their own buildings and arrange for their pupils to get the benefit of secular instruction at the State university. The plan suggests a possible solution of the much vexed question of division of the school fund. The Presbyterian Church has 7 presbyteries; 175 ministers; 7185 members, 9411 Sunday School members. They contributed for all purposes in the past year $150,000. There are 185 church organizations; 10 preaching stations; 132 church buildings, and 62 manse houses. The value of church manors and educational property was estimated at $350,000 in 1908. This denomination has recently located at Jamestown, the Presbyterian university, said to have an endowment fund of about $200,000. The Lutheran Church is composed chiefly of Norwegians and other Scandinavians. According to the "Norwegian American," published in Minneapolis in 1807, there were in the State in 1865, of Norwegian birth and descent, 140,000. The founders and their congregations, and about 240 churches. The Baptist Church in 1908 had a membership of 4161, a Sunday School enrollment of 3164; 33 churches, valued at $191,430; and 28 parsonages valued at $35,772.

Ecclesiastical History.—The establishment of Catholic missions in North Dakota cannot be reliably traced to an earlier date than 1818. In that year Rt. Rev. J. Octave Plessis of Quebec sent Rev. Joseph Provencner and Rev. Joseph Severe Dommolin to Fort Douglas, as St. Boniface was then called, and after the grasshoppers had destroyed the crops, the Selkirk colonists went in large numbers to Ft. Pembina. Father Provencner sent Father Dommolin in September, 1818, to minister to the spiritual wants of the colonists, with instructions to spend the winter at Pembina. When that place was found to be within the United States, Father Dommolin was recalled. Anthony Becloud became the second resident priest of North Dakota. A gifted linguist, well versed in the Algonquin languages which included the Chippewas, he taught the language in the young mission school, and composed an Indian grammar and dictionary, still standard works. He was resident priest from 1831-8 and often said Mass in every camp place from Pembina to the interior of North Dakota. It was customary in the summer for the settlers to go to the south-western part of the State to hunt bison on the prairies, and to take their families with them. The priest always accompanied them and in those camps for the first time the children were given an opportunity of religious instruction. Father Becloud is said to have evangelized the whole of the Turtle Mountain Chippewas, a circumstance which kept that tribe in peace with the government during the Sioux troubles following the Minnesota massacre in 1862. Father De Met sent a few weeks with the Mandans on the Missouri in 1840 for the purpose of learning to teach the children. Jean Baptiste Marie Genin is credited with establishing a mission at St. Michael's, Fort Totten, in 1855. His name is honourably and extensively associated with much of the missionary history of the State. The first real missionary work among the Sioux of North Dakota dates from 1874 when Major Forbes (a Catholic), Indian Agent at Fort Totten, with the help of the Catholic Indian Bureau, induced the Sisters of Charity (Grey Nuns) of Montreal under Sr. Mary Clapin to establish themselves in his agency. Father Bonnin came as their chaplain. Rev. Claude Ebner, O.S.B., was stationed at Fort Totten. Rev. Jerome Hunt, O.S.B., has devoted his talent and zeal to the welfare of the Indians at Fort Totten Reservation since 1882, and has written and published in the Sioux language, a Bible history, prayerbook with instruction and hymns, and a smaller book of prayer, and for eighteen years has published an Indian paper in Sioux. The Grey Nuns at Fort Totten have conducted a school since 1874. Rt. Rev. Martin Marquet, O.S.B., was Vicar Apostolic of Dakota until 27 December, 1889, when Rt. Rev. John Shanley became Bishop of Jamestown; the see was later changed to Fargo. The number of churches increased from 40 in 1890 to 210 in 1908.
After the death of Bishop Shanley, the diocese was divided. Rt. Rev. James O'Reilly, as Bishop of Fargo, has charge of the eastern part, and Rt. Rev. Vincent Wehrle, O.S.B., rules over the western part as Bishop of Bismarck. According to the census of 1910, the Catholic population was 70,000 but a subsequent count shows the number much larger, and the latest estimate by Father O'Driscoll, secretary of the Fargo council, places it at about 100,000. There are in the two dioceses, 140 priests; 14 religious houses; 1 monastery; 7 academies; 5 hospitals; and about 250 churches. The Sisters of St. Joseph have a hospital at Fargo and one at Grand Forks, and an academy at Jamestown. The Sisters of St. Benedict have establishments at Richmond, Glen Ellen, Oakes, Fort Yates, and a hospital at Bismarck. The Presentation Sisters have an academy and orphanage at Fargo. Sisters of Mary of the Presentation are established at Wild Rice, Oakwood, Willow City, and Libon. The Ursuline Sisters conduct St. Bernard's Academy at Grand Forks. Three Sisters of Mercy opened a mission school at Belcourt in the Turtle Mountains among the Chippewa in 1884, and continued to teach until 1907, when their convent was destroyed by fire. They established at Devil's Lake, St. Joseph's hospital in 1886 and the Academy of St. Mary of the Lake in 1887. The State has several active councils of the Knights of Columbus and Courts of the Catholic Order of Foresters. Among the Catholics distinguished in public life are John Burke, three times elected governor; John Carney, judge of the civilizing court; Joseph Kennedy, dean of the Normal College, State University; W. E. Purcell, U.S. senator; and P. D. Norton, secretary of state.

Northern Territory, Prefecture Apostolic of the.—The Northern Territory, formerly Alexander Land, is that part of Australia bounded on the north by the ocean, on the south by South Australia, on the east by Queensland and on the west by Western Australia. It thus lies almost entirely within the tropics, and has an area of 523,620 square miles. It is crown land, but was provisionally annexed to South Australia, 6 July, 1883. It is practically uninhabited; the population is roughly estimated at between 25,000 and 30,000, of whom less than a thousand are Europeans, about 4000 Asians mostly Chinese, the remainder being aborigines. There are but two towns, Palmerston at Port Darwin, with a population of 600, and Southport on Blackmore River, twenty-four miles south. There is transcontinental telegraphic communication (over 2000 miles) established in 1872, between Palmerston and Adelaide, but railroad communication extends only 146 miles south of the former town, a distance of over 1200 miles from the northern terminal of the railway. There are large navigable rivers in the north, and Port Darwin is probably surpassed in the world as a deep water port by Sydney Harbour. The rivers run two inches on the coast, where the climate resembles that of French Cochin China to six inches at Charlotte Waters. Droughts, cattle disease, and the financial crisis of 1891 have combined to retard the development of the country. John McDouall Stuart, the pioneer explorer, and his successors declare that large tracts in the interior are suitable for the cultivation of cotton and the breeding of cattle, while the government officials at Port Darwin have grown spices, fibre plants, maize, and cacao with great success. The crown lands (only 473,278 of the total 334,443,522 acres have been leased) are controlled by the Northern Territory Crown Lands Act of 1890-1901.

Northern Territory has a varied ecclesiastical history. In 1847, by a decree of the Sacred Congregation (27 May), it was made a diocese (Diocese of Port Victoria and Palmerston), Joseph Serra, O.S.B., consecrated at Rome, 15 August, 1848, being appointed to the see. He, however, was transferred in 1849 before taking possession to Daulis, and nominated coadjutor of the Diocese of Perth; he retired in 1851 and died in 1856 in Spain. He was succeeded by Mgr Rosendo Salvador, O.S.B., consecrated at Naples on 15 August, 1849, but he was not able to take possession of his see, for in the meantime the whole European population had abandoned the diocese; consequently he returned to the Benedictine Abbey of New Norcia in Western Australia, where he resided as abbot nullius. Resigning the see of Port Victoria and Palmerston, 8 August, 1888, he was appointed titular bishop of Adrians, 29 March, 1889. Seven years previously the Jesuits of the Austrian Province were commissioned to establish a mission for the purpose of civilizing the aborigines; about sixteen members of the order devoted themselves to the work and stations were established at Rapid Creek (St. Joseph's), seven miles north-east of Palmerston, Daly River (Adelaide), and Serpentine Lagoon (Sacred Heart of Jesus). There were 2 churches, 1 chapel, and 2 mixed schools. In 1891 there were about 260 Catholics in the mission. However the priests remained for about twenty years' labour the Jesuits withdrawn, Father John O'Brien, S.J., being the last administrator. On their withdrawal the diocese was administered by Bishop William Kelly of Geraldton. Somewhat later the mission was confided to the Missionaries of the Sacred Heart of Issoudun and established in 1906 as the Prefecture Apostolic of the Northern Territory. Very Rev. Francis Xavier Geer, M.S.H., b. 30 October, 1872, was elected administrator Apostolic on 23 April, 1906. He resides at Port Darwin. At present there are in the prefecture 3 missionaries, 2 churches, and 1 chapel.

ANDREW A. MACEDON.

Northmen, the Scandinavians who, in the ninth and tenth centuries, first ravaged the coasts of Western Europe and its islands and then turned from raiders into settlers. This article will be confined to the history of their exodus.

Tacitus refers to the "Siueses" (Germ., xivi, xiv) living beyond the Baltic as rich in arms and ships and men. But, except for the chance appearance of a small Viking fleet in the Meuse early in the sixth century, nothing more is heard of the Scandinavians until the end of the eighth century, when the forerunners of the exodus appeared as raiders off the English and Scottish coasts. In the broad outlines the political divisions of Scandinavia were much as they are at the present day, except that the Swedes were confined to a narrower territory.

The Finns occupied the northern part of modern Sweden, and the Danes the southern extremity and the eastern shores of the Cattegat, while the Norwegians stretched down the coast of the Skager-Rack, cutting off the Swedes from the Western sea. The inhabitants of those kingdoms bore a general resemblance to the Teutonic peoples, with whom they were connected in race and language. In their social condition and religion they were not unlike the Angles and Saxons of the 5th century. Though we cannot account satisfactorily for the exodus, we may say that it was due generally to the increase of the population, to the breaking down of the old tribal system, and the efforts of the kings, especially of Harold Fairhair, to consolidate their power, and finally to the love of adventure and the discovery that the lands and cities of Western Christendom lay at their mercy.

The Northmen invaded the West in three main streams; the most southerly started from South Norway and Denmark and, passing along the German coast, visited both sides of the Channel, rounded the Breton promontory, and reached the mouths of the Loire and the Garonne. It had an offshoot to the west of England and Ireland and in some cases it was prolonged to the coasts of Spain and Portugal (where Northmen came into contact with Saracen) and even into the Mediterranean and to Italy. The midstream crossed from the same region directly to the east and north of England, while the northern stream flowed from Norway westwards to the Orkneys and other islands, and, dividing there, moved on towards Iceland or southwards to Ireland and the Irish Sea. The work of destruction which the first stream of Northmen brought on the continent is told in words of despair in what is left of the Frankish Chronicles, for the pagan and greedy invaders seem to have sengled out the monasteries for attack and must have destroyed, except for the records of their own devastation. A Danish fleet appeared off Frisia in 810, and ten years later another reached the mouth of the Loire, but the systematic and persevering assault did not begin till about 835. From that date till the early years of the following century the Viking ships were almost annual visitors to the coasts and river valleys of Germany and Gaul. About 850 they began to establish islands strongholds near the mouths of the rivers, where they could winter and store their booty, and to which they could retire on the rare occasions when the Frankish or English kings were able to check their raids. Such were Warchen at the mouth of the Scheldt, Shroppey at the mouth of the Thames, Oisel in the lower Seine, and Noirmoutier near the Loire. For over seventy years Gaul seemed to lie almost at the mercy of the Danes. Their ravages spread backwards from the coasts and river valleys; they penetrated even to Aquitaine. There was little resistance whether from king or count. Robert the Strong did, indeed, succeed in defending Paris and so laid the foundations of what was afterwards the house of Capet, but he was killed in 896. In the end the success of the Danes brought this period of destruction to a close; the raiders turned into colonists, and in 911 Charles the Simple, by granting Normandy to Rollo, was able to establish a barrier against further invasion. Meanwhile, England had been assailed not only from the Channel and the south-west, but also by Viking ships crossing the North Sea. The Danes for a time had been even more successful than in Gaul, for Northern and Eastern districts fell altogether into their hands and the fate of Wessex seemed to have been decided by a succession of Danish victories in 871. Alfred, however, succeeded in recovering the upper land, the country was partitioned between Dane and West Saxons, and in 876 raids were stopped by the formation of a fleet and the defeat of Hastings in 893.

To Ireland, too, the Northmen came from two directions, from south and north. It was one of the first countries of the West to suffer, for at the beginning of the ninth century it was the weakest. The Vikings arrived even before 800, and as early as 807 their ships visited the west coast. They were, however, defeated near Killarney in 812 and the full fury of the attack did not fall on the country till 820. Twenty years later there appear to have been three Norse "kingdoms" in Ireland, those of Dublin, York, and Limerick, with an overking, but the Irish won a series of victories, while war broke out between the Danes coming by the Channel and the Norwegians descending from the north. For the next century and a half the Danish wars continued. Neither party gained a distinct advantage and both the face of the country and the national character suffered. Finally in 1014, on Good Friday, at Clontarf, on the shores of Dublin Bay, the Danes suffered a great defeat from Brian Boru. Henceforth they ceased to be an aggressive force in Ireland, though they kept their position in a number of the coast towns. During the earlier attacks on Ireland the Scotch Islands and especially the Orkneys had become a permanent centre of Norse power and the home of the adventurers who had been driven to life of adventure by centralization carried out by Harold Fairhair. They even returned to help the king's enemies; to such an extent that about 885 Harold followed up a victory in Norway by taking possession of the Orkneys. The result was that the independent spirits amongst the Vikings pushed on to the Faroes and Iceland, which had been already explored, and established there one of the most remarkable homes of Norse civilization. About a hundred years later the Icelanders founded a colony on the strip of coast between the glaciers and the sea, which, to attract settlers, they called Greenland, and soon after occurred the temporary settlement in Vinland on the mainland of North America. The prows of the Viking ships were not always turned towards the West. They also followed the Norwegian coast past the North Cape and established trading relations with "Biarmaland" on the shores of the White Sea. The Baltic, however, provided an easier route to the east and in the ninth and tenth centuries it was a Swedish Lake. By the middle of the ninth century a half-mythical Ruric reigned over a Norse or "Varangian" Kingdom at Novgorod, and, in 880, one of his successors, Olaf, moved his capital to Kiev, and ruled from the Baltic to the Black Sea. He imposed on Constantinople itself in 907 the humiliation which had befallen so many of the cities of the West, and "Micklegarth" had to pay Danegeld to the Norse sovereign of a Russian army. The Varangian ships are said to have pulled down the Volga and ascended the remote waters of the Caspian. There is, however, a second stage of Norse enterprise as remarkable, though for different reasons, as the first. The Norman conquests of Southern Italy and of England and in the Crusades, in which the Normans took the large share, prove what the astonishing vitality of the Northmen could do when they had received Christianity and Frankish civilization from the people they had plundered.

It is impossible to account for the irresistible activity of the Northmen. It is a mystery of what might be called "racial personality". Their forces were rarely numerous, their ships small and open, suited to the protected waters of their own coast, most unsuitable for ocean navigation, and there was no guiding power at home. Their success was due to the indomitable courage of each unit, to a tradition of discipline which made their compact "armies" superior in fighting qualities and activity to the mixed and ill-organized forces which Frankish and English kings usually brought against them. Often they are said to have won a battle by a single flight, a dangerous manœuvre except with well-disciplined troops. Until Alfred collected a fleet for the protection of his coast they had the undisputed command of the sea. They were unfortunate in the time of their attack. Their serious attacks did not begin till the empire of Charlemagne was weakened from within, and the Teutonic principle of division among heirs was overcoming the Roman principle of unity. When the period of reconstitution began the spirit of discipline, which had given the Northmen success in war, made them one of the great organizing forces of the early Middle Ages. Everywhere these "Romans of the Middle Ages" appear as organizers. They took the various material provided for them in Gaul, England, Russia, Southern Italy, and breathed into it life and activity. But races which assimilate are not enduring, and by the end of the twelfth century the Northmen had finished their work in Europe and been absorbed into the population which they had conquered and governed.

There is no complete history of the Northmen and their work in Europe. Einar Grube, "Vikings in Western Christendom", can be consulted with profit; much is to be found in the histories of the countries attacked, especially in "Palgrave, England and Norway", I. 1; cf. Helmer, "World's History", VI (London, 1897). The Nortoph Lager date and throws little trustworthy light on this early period of Norse history; cf. Vigneron, "Promenades to the Scandinavian Shores" (Oxford, 1879).

Norton, Christopher, martyr; executed at Tyburn, 27 May, 1570. His father was Richard Norton of Norton Conyers, Yorkshire, and his mother, Susan Neville, daughter of Richard, second Baron Latimer. Richard Norton, known as "Old Norton", was the head of his illustrious house, which remained faithful to the Catholic religion. Despite this fact he held positions of influence during the reigns of Henry VIII and Edward VI, was Governor of Norham Castle under Mary, and in 1568-69 was sheriff of Yorkshire. He had been pardoned for joining in the Pilgrimage of Grace, but he and his brother Thomas, his nine sons, of whom Christopher was the seventh, and many of their relatives hastened to take part in the northern uprising of 1569. He was attainted and fled to Flanders with four of his sons, two of his sons were pardoned, another apostatized, Christopher and his father's brother having been captured proved themselves steadfast Catholics, were hanged, disembowelled, and quartered. Edmund, who apostatized, and a sister are the subject of Wordsworth's "White Doe of Blythone".

Norway, comprising the smaller division of the Scandinavian peninsula, is bounded on the east by Lapland and Sweden, and on the west by the Atlantic. The surface is generally a plateau from which rise precipitous mountains, as Snåhatten (7506 feet) and Stora Galdhöppigen (about 5399 feet). The west coast is deeply indented by fiords. In eastern and southern Norway the valleys are broader and at times form extensive, fruitful plains. There are several navigable rivers, as the Glommen and Vormen, and lakes, of which the largest is Lake Mjøsaen. The numerous islands along the coast, some wooded and some bare, promote shipping and fishing; in the Lofoten Islands alone twenty million cod are annually caught. The climate is only relatively mild, with rain almost daily. Agriculture consists largely in raising oats and barley, but not enough for home consumption. Rye and wheat are grown only in sheltered spots. Bread is commonly made of oats. The cultivation of the potato is widely spread, a fact of great importance. There are in the country only about 160,000 horses; these are of a hardy breed. Cattle-raising is an important industry, the number of cattle being estimated at a million, that of sheep and goats at over two millions. Of late attention has been paid to the raising of pigs. The Lapps of the north maintain over a hundred thousand reindeer in the grassy pastures of the higher plateaus. The most important trees are pine, fir, and birch; oak and beech are not so common.

Forestry was long carried on unscientifically; considerable effort has been made to improve conditions, and wood is now exported chiefly as wrought or partly wrought timber. Silver is mined at Kongsvig, and iron at Røraas, but the yield of minerals is moderate. Coal is altogether lacking. The peasants are skilful wood-carvers, and in isolated valleys still make all necessary household articles, besides spinning and weaving their apparel. The Northmen were always famous seamen, and Norwegians are now found on the ships of all nations. The merchant marine of about 8000 vessels is one of the most important of the world. Good roads and railways have greatly increased traffic. A constantly increasing number of strangers are attracted by the country's natural beauty. Although in this way a great deal of money is brought into the country, the morals and honesty of the people unfortunately suffer in consequence. The area is 123,843 sq. miles; the population numbers 2,250,000 persons.

The great majority belong officially to the Lutheran state Church, but on account of liberal laws there is a rapid development of sects. Catholics did not regain religious liberty until the middle of the nineteenth century. Reports as to their numbers vary from 1500, as given in the Protestant "Tägliche Rundschau", to 100,000, as given in the Catholic "Germania" (see below). Norway is a constitutional monarchy, its ruler since 15 November, 1905, has been King Haakon VII, a Danish prince. The colours of the flag are red, white, and blue. The country is divided into 20 counties and 60 bailiwicks. Justice is administered by district courts (kommenskäter). Ecclesiastically the country is divided into 6 dioceses, with 83 provosts or deans, and 450 pastors. The largest city and the royal residence is Christiania (230,000 inhabitants), the seat of government, of the Parliament (Storting), of the chief executive, of the state university, and of other higher schools. The most important commercial city is Bergen (80,000 inhabitants), important even in the Middle Ages and for a long time controlled. by the Hanseatic League. Trondhjem, formerly Nidaros, a city of 40,000 inhabitants, was earlier the see of the Catholic archbishops, and the place where the Catholic kings were crowned and buried. Its fine cathedral, in the process of restoration, contains the bones of St. Olaf, the patron saint of Norway. The army is not highly trained; men between twenty-three and thirty-three years of age are liable for military duty. The most well-armed navy is only used for coast defense.

History.—Unlike the Swedes and Danes, the Norwegians were not organized even so late as the ninth century. The name of king was borne by the chiefs and heads of separate clans, but their authority was limited and the rights of the subjects very extensive. Only by marauding expeditions were the Vikings able to gain honour and wealth, and at times also to acquire control of extensive districts. Their early history is lost in the fabulous tales of the bards. In 872, Harold Haarfager (Fair-Haired), after a decisive sea-fight near Stavanger, established his authority over all the clans. Those refusing to submit left the country and their possessions were confiscated. When Harold divided his kingdom among several sons, its permanence seemed once more uncertain, but Hakon the Good (q.v.) restored a transient unity and procured an entrance for Christianity. Olaf Tryggvason continued the work of union after Hakon's death, and promoted the spread of the new faith, but in a sea-fight with the united forces of the Danes and Swedes he was killed about 1000 near Stavanger (of uncertain locality). The kingdom now fell apart, some portions coming under Cnut the Great of Denmark.

Finally Olaf, son of Harold Grensko and a descendant of Harold Haarfager (865), reestablished the boundaries of Norway, and aided Christianity to its final victory. At a later date Olaf became the patron saint of Norway. His severity so embittered the great families that they combined with Cnut and forced him to flee the country. Returning with a small army from Sweden, he was defeated and killed in the battle of Stiklestad (29 July, 1030). His heroic death and the marvellous phenomena that occurred in connexion with his body completely changed the feeling of his opponents. His son, Magnus the Good, was unanimously chosen his successor (1035), and the Danish intruders were driven away. Magnus died childless in 1047, and the kingdom went to his father's half-brother Harold, son of Sigurd. Harold had won fame and wealth as a Viking, and had been an important personage at the Byzantine Court. On account of his grandeur he was called Impulsions. Impelled by ambition, he first waged a bloody war with England and then attacked England. On an incursion into Northumberland, he was defeated at the battle of Stamford Bridge (1066). His son, Olaf the Quiet, repaired the injuries caused by the occupation of Haradhrada's policy. Olaf's successor, Magnus, conquered the Scotch islands, waged successful war with Sweden, and even gained parts of Ireland, where he was finally killed. One of his sons, Sigurd Jorsalafari (the traveller to Jerusalem), went on a crusade to the Holy Land, while another son, Eystein, peacefully acquired Jemtland, a part of Sweden. With Sigurd's death (1203) the kingdom was divided into three, each order caused partly by strife between claimants to the throne, partly by rivalry between the secular and ecclesiastical dignitaries, whose partisans (known as the haakon and the thegns) perpetuated unbelievable outrages and cruelty on each other. The power of the king sank steadily, while that of the bishops increased. For a time Sverre (1177-1202) seemed successful, but lasting peace was not restored until the reign of his grandson Hakon the Old (1217-63). Hakon ruled with wisdom and force and was highly regarded by the rulers of other countries. During his reign Norway reached its greatest extent, including Greenland and Iceland. He died in the Orkney Islands (1238) while returning from an expedition against the Scots. His peace-loving son Magnus Lagobodo (the Law-Mender) tried to establish law and order and prepared a book of laws. His efforts to promote commerce and intercourse resulted in unfortunate consequences. The Hanseatic League, to which he granted many privileges, used these to the detriment of the country, and gradually brought it into a state of grievous dependence. With the death (1518) of the vigorous young son Magnus, Hakon V, the male line of Harold Harfager became extinct. The crown went to the three-year-old King Magnus Eriksson of Sweden, son of Hakon's daughter, Ingeborg; this brought about for the first time a close union between the two kingdoms of northern Scandinavia. When King Magnus assumed the government (1332), it was soon evident that, although possessing many good qualities, he lacked force. He seldom came to Norway, and the Norwegians felt themselves neglected. They forced him, when holding court at Varberg (1343), to send his younger son Hakon as viceregent to Norway, where Hakon soon gathered an independent court, and in 1335 became the actual ruler. Seven years later he was elected King of Sweden by a part of the Swedish nobility, but had to yield to Duke Albert of Mecklenburg, chosen by an opposition faction. In 1363 he married Margaret, daughter of King Waldemar of Denmark, and won with her a claim to the Danish throne. As Waldemar, when he died in 1375, left no male descendants, his brother, Olaf, also became King of Norway upon the death of his father, and died in 1387. His mother, an able and energetic ruler, entered at once upon the administration of Denmark. In Norway she carried on the work of the Hanseatic League, and aimed at Christianizing the pagan. The result was often unfortunate, as in the appointment of the Archbishop of Upsala (1408). Margaret's efforts to regain former possessions of the three Scandinavian countries were successful only in one case; she purchased the Island of Gotland from the Teutonic Knights. She died suddenly (1412) in the harbour of Flensburg, and was brought to the coast, where she died. Her successor was a boy, and the crown was occupied by a series of duchesses and princesses, who ruled until 1491. The union of Denmark and Sweden was always her first interest. She placed Danish officials in Sweden and forced the Church of that country to accept Danish bishops; the result was often unfortunate, as in the appointment of the Archbishop of Upsala (1408). Margaret's efforts to re-Christopher’s early death (1448) the union was virtually dissolved: the Swedes chose Karl Knutsson as king, and the Danes called Count Christian of Oldenburg to the throne. At first Norway wavered between the two, but Christian was able to retain control.

Of Christian’s two sons Hans was at first only ruler of Denmark and Norway, but, by an agreement made at Calmar, he was able to gain Sweden also. Yet it was only after defeating Sten Sture that his position in Sweden was secure. King Hans I was succeeded (1513) in Denmark and Norway by his son, Christian II. Christian’s cruelty to the conquered Swedes prepared the way for the defection of that country to Gustavus Vasa; consequently, he was indirectly responsible for the withdrawal of Sweden from Catholic last Bishop of Holm in Iceland, Jon Arason, died a martyr. The king and the nobility seized the lands of the Church. The chief nobles acquired inordinate influence, and the landed proprietors, once so proud of their independence, fell under the control of foreign tyrants.

As regards territorial development in the Middle Ages, Norway had a number of tributary provinces—in the north, Finnmark, inhabited by heathen Lapps; various groups of islands south-west of Norway as: the Faroe Islands, the Orkneys, the Shetlands, and the Isle of Man in the Irish Sea, to which were added later Iceland and Greenland. During the period of the union, Norway also included Bohuslän, Härjedalen, Jemtland, and some smaller districts, all now belonging to Sweden. With these islands and outlying ter-unity. Christian soon aroused dissatisfaction in his own country. Undue preference granted to the lower classes turned the nobility against him, and his undisguised efforts to open the way for the teachings of Luther repelled loyal Catholics. Serious disorders followed in Jutland, and Christian, losing courage, sought to save himself by flight. With the aid of the Hanseatic League his uncle, Duke Frederick of Schleswig-Holstein, soon acquired possession of his kingdoms. The new king and his son, Christian III, were fanatical adherents of the new doctrine, and by craft and force brought about its victory in Denmark (1539). In Norway Archbishop Olaf of Trondheim laboured in vain for the maintenance of Catholicism and the establishment of national independence. The majority of the peasants were indifferent and the impoverished nobility, who hoped to benefit by the introduction of the “pure Gospel”, urged Christian on. After the departure of the church dignitaries Christian acquired the mastery of the country (1537). Norway now ceased to be an independent state. While retaining the name of kingdom it was for nearly three hundred years (until 1814) only a Danish province, administered by Danish officials and at times outrageously plundered. Here, as in Sweden and Denmark, people were gradually and systematically turned away from the Catholic Faith, though it was long before Catholicism was completely extinguished. The ratories the monarchy comprised about 7000 square miles. The Scotch islands were lost towards the end of the fifteenth century, and at a later period the colonies in Greenland were totally neglected. Originally the kingdom had consisted of four provinces, each with its own laws, but when a system of law for the entire country was introduced, it was divided into eleven judicial districts. The most closely settled districts were the fertile lowlands on the inlets of the sea, now Christiania and Trondheim fiords. The waterway from Trondheim to Oslo, near the present Christiania, was the most important route for traffic. There was also much intercourse by water between Oslo and Bergen. Through the mountain districts ports for the convenience of travellers (Spjelkautgater) were erected, and developed later into inns and taverns. The country was unprepared for war. The topography and economic conditions made it difficult to mobilize the land forces. The soldiers were not paid, but only fed. The chief state officials lived in Bohus, Akershus, Tuneberg, and the royal fortified castles on the harbours of Bergen and Trondheim. Ecclesiastically, Norway was at first under the direction of the Archbishop of Lund (1103); later (1152) under the Archbishop of Trondheim, who had jurisdiction over the Bishops of Bergen, Stavanger, Oslo, Hamar, Farvæ, Kirkwall (Orkney Islands), Skalkolt and Holar (Holm) in Iceland, and Gardar (Garde) in Greenland. Jemtland was subject to the Swedish Archdiocese of Upsala. There were a thousand well-endowed churches, thirty monasteries, and various orders of women: Benedictines, Cistercians, Premonstratensians, Dominicans, Franciscans, Augustinians, and Brigittines. Schools were attached to the cathedral and to most of the monasteries. For higher education Norwegians went to foreign universities, especially to Paris.

In the reign of Christian III, Norway shared the fortunes of Denmark. Christian's son, Frederick II (1589–98), paid no attention to Norway, but much was done for the country during the long reign of Christian IV (1588–1648), who endeavoured to develop the country by encouraging mining at Kongsberg and Røros, and to protect it from attack by improving the army. Jemtland and Herjedalen, however, had to be ceded to Sweden. Frederick III (1648–70) was also obliged to cede Bohusland. Frederick V (1746–66) encouraged art, learning, commerce, and manufactures. Prosperity strengthened the self-reliance of the people and their desire for political independence. In 1660, they were granted autonomous administration, and in 1814 a national university was founded at Christiania. Political events enabled Sweden to force Denmark in the Treaty of Kiel to relinquish Norway. Many of the Norwegians had been in favour of the Union, which seemed to be a national diet, held at Eidsvold (17 May, 1814), agreed upon a constitution and chose as king the popular Danish prince, Christian Frederick. But the Powers interfered and ratified the union with Sweden.

The Swedish monarchs, Charles John XIV, Oscar I, Charles XV, and Oscar II, had a difficult position to maintain in Norway. Notwithstanding zealous and successful efforts to promote the material and intellectual prosperity of the land, they neglected the concerns of the Church in Norway. They did not lose sight of the possibility of the union of the two kingdoms, and of the political advantage such a union might have been to the Swedish crown, but they did not neglect the Church. They intended to hold it in their sway, but it remained strong and independent.

The northern part of the country was inhabited by the Lapps, who were not included in the union. The Hebrides were ceded to Denmark in 1658, and the islands of Svalbard and Jan Mayen were ceded to Sweden in 1658.

The Norwegian Church was governed by the bishop of Trondheim and his successors. The suffragans of the archbishopric were: Hamar, Farve, and Kirkwall in the Orkneys, Skalholts, and Holar in Iceland, and Gardar in Greenland. The churches, legally established before 1150 in the reign of Sigurd and Jonsalaf, made possible the foundation of a large number of new parishes and strengthened those already existing. The Diocese of Oslo contained the largest number, namely 300 parishes; Nidaros had 250. There was a chapter for each see. Not much is known of the morals and religious spirit of the people; it is certain that in the Catholic period much more in proportion was given for purposes of religion than after the Reformation. There are few details of the pastoral labours of bishops and clergy, but the works of Christianity, charity, hospices, lazaretto, inns for pilgrims, bear ready testimony to their efforts for the advancement of civilization. Norway was learning neglected. As early as the twelfth century the monk Dietrich of Trondheim wrote a Latin chronicle of the country, and in 1250 a Franciscan wrote an account of his journey to the Holy Land. Norwegian students who desired degrees went to the Universities of Paris and Bologna, or, at a later period, attended a university nearer home, that of Rostock in Mecklenburg.

With the abandonment of the old faith and its institutions was associated the loss of national independence in 1537. As early as 1519 Christian II had begun to suppress the monasteries, and Christian III abetted the cause of Lutheranism. Archbishop Olaf Engelboecksten and other dignitaries of the Church were forced to flee; Mogens Lawritzen, Bishop of Hamar, died in prison in 1642, and Jon Arason of Holar was executed on 7 November, 1550.

The large landed possessions of the Church went to the king and his favourites. Many churches were destroyed, others fell into decay, and the number of parishes was greatly reduced. The salaries of the preachers, among whom were very objectionable persons, were generally a mere pittance. Fanatics of the new belief thundered from the pulpits against idolatry and the cruelty of the "Roman Antichrist"; whatever might preserve the memory of earlier ages was destroyed; the pictures of the Virgin were cut to pieces, burned, or thrown into the water; veneration of saints was threatened with severe punishment. This was only a reflection of the idea of the church as a mere tool of the state. Catholicism did not die out in Norway until the beginning of the seventeenth century. The pope entrusted the spiritual care of Norway, first to the Nuncio of Cologne, and then to Brussels, but the Draconian laws of Denmark made Catholic ministration almost impossible. Whether the Jesuits arrived in Norway ever there is unknown. A Dominican who reached the country was expelled after a few weeks. The Norwegian convert Rhugiwas permitted to remain, but was not allowed to exercise his office. Conditions remained the same later, when the supervision was transferred from Brussels to Cologne, from Cologne to Hildesheim, and thence to Osabrück.

There was no change until the nineteenth century when the laws of 1845 and 1846 were enforced, and all dissenters, including Catholics who had come into the country, from the control of the Lutheran state Church. From the time of its foundation the Lutheran Church had waivered between orthodoxy and rationalism, and was finally much affected by the Pietistic movement, led by Hauge. In 1843 a small Catholic parish was formed in Christiania, and from this centre efforts were made to found new stations. In 1860 Pius IX created an independent prefecture Apostolic for Norway. The first prefect was a Frenchman, Bernard, formerly prefect of the North Pole mission. He was followed by the Luxembourg priest...
Fallsie, later Bishop of Alusa, under whom the mission has steadily developed, although not yet large. Especially noteworthy among the men who of late years have been reconciled to the Church are the former gymnasial rector Sverresen, and the author Rosenius, respectively. In theory, originally a Lutheran pastor at Christiansia. All monastic orders, Jesuits excepted, are allowed, but there are no monasteries for men. On the other hand the missionaries of the Sisters of St. Francis, and Sisters of St. Joseph of Chambéry, numbering about thirty, have gained useful and active fellow-workers. There are a few thousands of Catholics, for whom there are churches in Christiansia (St. Olaf and Halvors), in Bergen, Trondheim, Fredrikshald, Tromsø, Fredrikstad, Almgaard, Hamar, etc. Catholic hospitals exist in Christiansia, Bergen, Drammen, and Christiansand, and there is a number of Catholic schools turning which the Protestant population has shown itself friendly. In 1897, for the first time in three hundred years, the feast of St. Olaf was celebrated at Trondheim.

History of Art.—During the Middle Ages art was closely connected with religion, and its chief task was the building and embellishment of churches. Some twenty old wooden churches (Starkkirker), still in existence, exist now with what skill Norwegians made use of the wood furnished by their forests. At a comparatively early date, stone was used, first in the Romanesque, then in the Gothic buildings. Some of the work thus produced has a singular and characteristic charm. Besides the usual churches of one aisle with rude towers and belfries, as at Vossevangen, there are in existence churches of three aisles with preaching, and at times relatively rich ornamentation. The façade of some of these are flanked by two towers at Akers, Bergen, and Stavanger. The most striking achievements of Norwegian architecture are the cathedral of St. Magnus at Kirkwall in the Orkneys, and, within the present century, that of Trondheim. The latter has had a chequered history. Built originally in 1077 by Olaf the Quiet (Kyrre) as a “Christ Church” of one aisle over the bones of St. Olaf, it served at first as the burial place of the kings. When in 1162 Trondheim (Nidaros) was made an archdiocese, it became a place of pilgrimage for the entire kingdom, and the gifts of the faithful made possible the necessary enlargement of the cathedral. In 1181 Archbishop Eystein Erlendsson began its restoration in the Romanesque style. Obliged to flee from King Sverri, he became acquainted during his stay in England with Gothic architecture and made use of this style on his return. This is especially evident in the unique octagon erected over St. Olaf’s grave, evidently an imitation of “Becket’s Crown” in Canterbury cathedral. Eystein’s successors completed the building according to his plans. The cathedral was twice damaged by fire but each time was repaired (in 1328 and in 1432). It fell into almost complete ruin after the great fire of 5 May, 1531, and for several hundred years no attention was paid to it. A change came with the awakening of national pride, and the restoration of the cathedral is now nearing completion. Its most valuable treasures, the body of the great Apostle of Norway St. Olaf and the costly shrine that enclosed it, have disappeared. In 1537 the shrine was taken to Copenhagen, robbed of its jewels, and melted, while the bones of the saint were buried by fanatics in some unknown place to put an end forever to the veneration of St. Olaf. The wood-carving, paintings, and other objects of art, which formerly adorned Norwegian churches, have been either carried off or destroyed. This was not so frequently the case in the northern part of the country, and in other districts some fine objects escaped. Among the works of art especially interesting may be mentioned: (wood-carving) the altar of the Virgin in the Church of Our Lady at Bergen, and the altar in the Ringsaker church on Lake Nysen; (in painting) the antependium at Gal; (in relief work) the doorways of the churches at Hyllestad and Hemsdal; the baptismal font at Stavanger, reliquaries, as at Hedal; censers, as at Hadsel; crucifixes and vestments. The finest example of medieval secular buildings is King Haakon’s Hall, a part of the former royal palace at Bergen. Beautifully carved chairs, rich tapestries, and fine chased work are further proof of the degree of culture attained by St. Olaf.

History of Literature.—Norway can hardly be said to have an indigenous literature. As regards material and arrangement, the chronicles and narratives are very much the same both in the north and the south (for Iceland) as in England. We here treat specifically Protestant literature only so far as individual writers, such as the brothers Munch, refer in poetry or prose to the Catholic era in Norway, and thus indirectly further the interests of the Church. The historical investigations and writings of Bang, Dietrichson, Daae, and Bugge have overthrown many historical misstatements and judgments prejudicial to Catholicism. These works have influenced even Protestant theology in Norway, so that its position towards Rome is relatively more friendly that in other countries. If heretofore no Norwegian Catholic has made a great contribution to the national literature the reason is obvious. Of late years, however, various books have been published of an edifying, apologetic, or of a polemical nature. There is a Catholic weekly, the “St. Olaf”.

When not otherwise noted, the place of publication is Christiansia: Diplomateria Norwegiaca (1649—5); Munch, Dødt norske folkest historie (5 vols., 1852-61); Sars, norske folkest historie (1892—); Odder, Lærebok i Storvenes, Norges och Danmarks historia (7th ed., Stockholm, 1849); Vossevangen Kirke i Noreg fra 13. Norwich (Nordovici; Norvicum), Ancient Diocese of.—Though this see took its present name only in the eleventh century, its history goes back two hundred years earlier to the conversion of East Anglia by St. Felix in the reign of King Sigeberht, who succeeded to the kingdom of his father Redwald on the death of his half-brother Eorwulph in 632. St. Felix fixed his see at Dunwich, a sea-coast town since submerged, the site of which is in Southwold Bay. From Dunwich, St. Felix evangelized Norfolk, Suffolk, and Cambridgeshire, the counties which formed the diocese. He was succeeded by Thomas (647), Beorhtric (Boniface), who died about 669, and Bisi, on whose death, in 673, St. Theodore, Archbishop of Canterbury, divided the see into two, with cathedrals at Dunwich and Elmham. The following are the episcopal succession based on the most recent research, with approximate dates of accession where known:

Dunwich: Eccles, 673; Alric; Eccles; Eadulf; Eadred; Eadbeorht I; Eadwulf; Cuthwine; Eadbeorht II; Ecgil; Heardred; Elfrith, 790; Tidfrith, 798; Wærmund; Wilred, 825. Elmham: Beaudowine, 673; Hludscelf; Nothbeorht; Hthehleow, 732; Eadflægel; Eahleheard; Sibba; Hunfrith; St. Hume; Cundis (there is some doubt as to whether Cundis was Bishop of Elmham or Dunwich).

There were no Carthusians in the diocese. The arms of the see were azure, three mitres with their edges turned up, distinguishing the three sees.

NOTARIES (Lat. notarius), persons appointed by competent authority to draw up official or authentic documents. These documents are issued chiefly from the official administrative bureaux, the chanceries; secondly, from tribunals; lastly, others are drawn up at the request of individuals to authenticate their contracts or other acts. The public officials appointed to draw up these three classes of papers have been usually called notaries.

Etymologically, a notary is one who takes notes. Notes are signs or cursory abbreviations to record the words uttered, so that they may be reproduced later in ordinary writing. Notaries were at first private secretaries, attached to the service of persons in positions of importance. It was natural for the science of notes to be in high esteem among those employed in recording the transactions of the law courts, and for the name notary to be applied to these officials; so that before long the word was used to signify their occupation.

The title and office existed at the Imperial Court (cf. Cod. Thoed. VI, 16, "De primicerio et notariis"), whence they passed into all the royal chanceries, though in the course of time the term notary ceased to be used. This was the case also with the chanceries of the pope, the great episcopal sees, and even every bishopric. There are grounds for doubting whether the seven regional notaries of the Roman Church, one for each ecclesiastical district of the Holy City, were instituted by St. Clement, and appointed by him to record the Acts of the martyrs, as is said in the "Liber Pontificalis" ("Vita Clementis", ed. Duchesne, I, 123); they date back, however, to an earlier age. Not only were there these bureaux for ecclesiastical documents was established, but in very ancient days we find these notaries forming a kind of college presided over by a primicerius; the notice of Julius I in the "Liber Pontificalis" states that this pope ordered an account of the property of the Church, intended as an authentic document, to be drawn up before the primicerius of the notaries.

The latter were in the ranks of the clergy and must have received one of the minor orders; for the notaries is an office and not an order. At intervals the popes entrusted the notaries of their curia with various missions. Their chief, the primicerius, with whose secediciarius is sometimes found later, was a very important personage, in fact, the head of the pontifical chancery; during the vacancy of the papal chair, he formed part of the interregnum Government, and a letter in 1140 (laffé, "Regesta", n. 2040) is signed (the pope being elected but not yet consecrated) by one "Ioannes primicerius et servans locum s. sedis apostolicae".

There were of course many notaries in the service of the pontifical chancery; the seven regional notaries preserved a certain pre-eminence over the others and became the pronotaries, whose name and office continued. The ordinary notaries of the chancery, however, were gradually known by other names, according to their various functions, so that the term ceased to be employed in the pontifical and other charters. The prothonotaries were and still are a college of prelates, enjoying numerous privileges; they are called "participants", but outside of Rome there are many purely honorary prothonotaries. The official duties had insensibly almost ceased; but Pius X in his reorganization of the Roman Curia has appointed prothonotaries to the chancery (Const., "Sapienti", 29 June, 1903). A corresponding change occurred in the bureaux of the episcopal churches, abbeys, etc.; the officials attached to the church and called chancellor, secretary, etc. Lastly, mention must be made of the notaries of the synodal or conciliar assemblies, whose duties are limited to the duration of the assembly.

Society in former times did not recognize the separation of powers; so, too, in the Church the judicial authority was vested in the same prelates as the administrative. Soon, however, contentious matters were tried separately before a specially appointed body. The courts required a staff to record the transactions; these clerks were likewise notaries. In most civil courts they are, however, called registrars, clerks of the court, etc., but in the ecclesiastical tribunals they retain the name notary, though they are also called actuaries. Thus the special law of the higher ecclesiastical tribunals, the Rota and the Signatura, regulated by Pius X, provides for the appointment of notaries for these two tribunals (can. v and xxxiv).

The reason why the head official charged with drawing up the documents of the Holy Office is called the notary is that in former times drew up the records of the Inquisition, is, doubtless, that of all the Roman Congregations the Holy Office is the only real judicial tribunal. The notaries of ecclesiastical tribunals are now behaves; the duties may however be confided to laymen, except in criminal cases against a cleric.

Finally, there is the class of persons to whom the term notary is restricted in common parlance, to wit, those who are appointed by the proper authorities to witness the documentary proceedings between private persons and to impress them with legal authenticity. They are not engaged in the chancery, in order that they may be within easy reach of private individuals; they have a public character, so that their records, drawn up according to rule, are received as authentic accounts of the particular transaction, especially agreements, contracts, testaments, and wills.

Consequently, public notaries may be appointed only by those authorities who possess jurisdiction in foro aequo, and have a chancery, e.g. popes, bishops, emperors, reigning princes, and of course only within the limits of their jurisdiction; moreover, the territory within which a notary can lawfully exercise his functions is expressly determined. There were formerly Apostolic notaries and even episcopal notaries, duly commissioned by papal or episcopal letters, whose duty it was to receive documents relating to ecclesiastical or mixed affairs, especially in connexion with benefices, foundations, and donations in favour of churches, wills of clerics, etc. They no longer exist; the only ecclesiastical notaries at present are the officials of the Roman and episcopal curiae. Moreover the notaries of the Sepulchre, and Canon Law forbids clerics to acts as scriveners (c. viii., "Ne clerici vel monachi", 1, III, tit. 50).

Notburga, Saint, patroness of servants and peasants, b. c. 1265 at Rattenberg on the Inn; d. c. 16 September, 1313. She was so well-known in the family of Count Henry of Rothenburg, and used to give food to the poor. But Ottilla, her mistress, ordered her to feed the swine with whatever food was left. She, therefore, saved some of her own food, especially on Fridays, and brought it to the poor. One day, according to legend, her master met her, and commanded her to show him what she was carrying. She obeyed, but instead of the food he saw only shavings, and the wine he found to be vinegar. Hereupon Ottilia dismissed her, but soon fell dangerously ill, and Notburga remained to nurse her and prepared her for death.

Notburga then entered the service of a peasant in the town of Eben, on condition that she be permitted to go to church the evenings before Sundays and festivals. One evening her master urged her to continue working in the field. Throwing her sickle into the air she said: "Let my sickle be judge between me and you," and the sickle remained suspended in the air. Meantime Count Henry of Rothenburg was visited with great reverses which he ascribed to the dismissal of Notburga. He engaged her again and thenceforth all went well in his household. Shortly before her death she told her master to place her corpse on a wagon drawn by two oxen wherever the oxen would stand still. The oxen drew the wagon to the chapel of St. Rupert near Eben, where she was buried. Her ancient cult was ratified on 27 March, 1862, and her feast is celebrated on 14 September. She is generally represented with an ear of corn, or flowers and a sickle in her hand; sometimes with a sickle suspended in the air.

Notburga, legendary daughter of Dagobert I, who is said to have lived in a cave near Hochhausen on the Neckar in Baden. Many legends are related as to the sanctity and holiness of her life. After the body was placed on a chariot drawn by two white oxen to the place of burial, where at present stands the church of Hochhausen. It is very probable that the legend of St. Notburga is the daughter of Dagobert I, is merely a distortion of that of St. Notburga of Rattenberg.

Notomb, Jean-Baptiste, Belgian statesman, b. 3 July, 1805, at Messeux, Luxembourg; d. at Berlin, 16 September, 1881. He received his secondary education at the athénes of Luxembourg, studied law in the University of Liège, and was awarded a doctor's degree in 1826. He practised law in Luxembourg, then in Brussels, where he took an active part in the war that was then waged in the press in behalf of the independence of Belgium. During the riots of August, 1830, he was in his native province; but hearing of the fight which had taken place between the patriots and the troops of the Prince of Orange he hurried back to the capital.

The provisional government appointed him secretary of the committee which was preparing the first draft of a new constitution. Three electoral districts of Luxembourg chose him as their representative.

in the first legislature of Belgium. He declared for the district of Arlon to which, in 1831, he gave proof of his gratitude by doing his utmost to prevent its union with Germany. Nothomb, who was the youngest member of the legislative assembly, was appointed one of its secretaries and a member of the committee on foreign affairs. In the chamber he strongly opposed the advocates of the union of Belgium with France and those who were for a republican government. His political ideal, which he defended with great fervor, was a representative monarchy with two houses, liberty of the press, and complete independence, in their own spheres, of the secular and religious powers.

From 1831-36 he was general secretary for foreign affairs; with Devaux he went to London to carry on secret negotiations at the conference which had met in that city to settle the new state of affairs created by the Belgian revolution, and did much to remove the impediments to the construction of railroads and when he resigned in 1840 more than 300 kilometers had been built. In the same year he was sent as an extraordinary envoy to the German Confederation and in 1841 became minister of the interior in a unionist administration; but the positions of the parties were not what they had been in the preceding decade, and Nothomb soon realized that a union of the Catholics and Liberals was no longer possible. In 1845 he withdrew from the political arena to enter the diplomatic corps. He was for many years minister plenipotentiary of Belgium in Berlin. In 1840 he had become a member of the Royal Academy of Brussels; and he received many distinctions from foreign countries.

Notitiae Episcopatuum, the name given to official documents that furnish for Eastern countries the list and hierarchical rank of the suffragan bishops of a Church. Whilst, in the Patriarchate of Rome, archbishops and bishops were classed according to the seniority of their consecration, and in Africa according to their age, in the Eastern patriarchates the hierarchical rank of each bishop was determined by the see he occupied. Thus, in the Patriarchate of Constantinople, the first metropolitan was not the longest of time, but whoever happened to be the incumbent of the see of Cæsarea; the second was the Archbishop of Ephesus, and so on. In every ecclesiastical province, the rank of each suffragan was thus determined, and remained unchanged unless the list was subsequently modified. The hierarchical order included first of all, the patriarch; then the greater metropolitan, i.e., those who had dioceses with suffragan sees; the autocephalous metropolitan, who had no suffragans; and who was not directly subject to the patriarch; next archbishops who, although not differing from autocephalous metropolitan, occupied hierarchical rank inferior to theirs, and were also immediately dependent on the patriarch; then simple bishops, i.e., exempt bishops, and lastly suffragan bishops. It is not known by whom this very ancient order was established, but it is likely that, in the beginning, metropolitan sees and simple bishoprics must have been classified according to the date of their respective foundations, this order being modified later on for political and religious considerations. We here append, Church by Church, the principal of these documents.

A. Constantinople: The "Ethchesia of pseudo-Epiphanius", a revision of an earlier Notitiae episcopatum (probably compiled by Patriarch Epiphanius under Justinian), made during the reign of Heraclius (about 640); a Notitia dating back to the first years of the ninth century and differing but little from the earlier one; the "Notitiae of Basil the Armenian", drawn up between 820 and 842; the Notitia compiled by Emperor Leo VI the Philosopher, and Patriarch Nicholas Mlechites between 901 and 907, modifying the hierarchical order which had been established in the seventh century, but had been disturbed by the incorporation of the ecclesiastical provinces of Illyricum and Southern Italy in the Byzantine Patriarchate; the Notitiae episcopatum of Constantine Por-Notitia. Among the various monks of St. Gall who bore this name, the following are the most important:

(1) Notker Balbulus (Stammerer), Blessed, monk and author, b. about 940, at Jonswil, canton of St. Gall (Switzerland); d. 912. Of a distinguished family, he received his education with Tuotilo, originator of tropes, at St. Gall's, from Isò and the Irishman Moengall, teachers in the monastic school. He became a monk there and is mentioned as librarian (909) and as master of the choir (912-914). He was chiefly active as teacher, and displayed refinement of taste as poet and author. He completed Erchanbert's chronicle (516), arranged a martyrology, and composed a metrical biography of St. Gall. It is practically accepted that he is the "monk of St. Gall" (Montachus Sangallenensis), author of the legends and anecdotes "Gesta Caroli Magni." The number of works ascribed to him is constantly increasing. He introduced the sequence, a new species of religious lyric, into Germany. It had been the custom to prolong the Alleluia in the Mass before the Gospel, modulating through a skilfully harmonized sequence. Notker learned how to fit the separate syllables of a Latin text to the tones of this jubilation; this poem was called the sequence (q.v.), formerly called the "jubilation." (The reason for this name is uncertain.) Between 881-887 Notker dedicated a collection of such verses to Bishop Liutwert of Vercelli, but it is not known which or how many are his. Ekkeshard IV, the historiographer of St. Gall, speaks of fifty sequences attributable to Notker. The hymn, "Media Vita," was erroneously attributed to him late in the Middle Ages. Ekkeshard IV lauds him as "delicate of body but not of mind, studdering of tongue but not of intellect, pushing boldly forward in things Divine, a vessel of the Holy Spirit without equal in his time." Notker was beatiied in 1512.

Notker Labo, monk in St. Gall and author, b. about 950; d. 1022. He was descended from a noble family and nephew of Ekkeshard I, the poet of Waltharius. "Labo" means "laborious." Later he was named "the German" (Teutonicus) in recognition of his services to the language. He came to St. Gall when only a boy, and there acquired a vast and varied knowledge by omnivorous reading. His contemporaries admired him as a theologian, philologist, mathematician, astronomer, connoisseur of music, and poet. He tells of his studies and his literary work in a letter to Bishop Hugo of Sitten (1018-1017), but was obliged to give up the study of the liberal arts in order to devote himself to teaching. For the benefit of his pupils he had undertaken something before unheard, namely translations from Latin into German. He mentions eleven of these translations, but unfortunately only five are preserved: (1) Boethius, "De consolatione philosophiae"; (2) Marcusianus Capella, "De nuptiis Philologus et Mercurii"; (3) Aristole, "De categorias"; (4) Aristole, "De interpretatione"; (5) "The Peater." Among those lost are: "The Book of Job," at which he worked for more than fifteen years; "Distich Catonia"; Vergil's "Bucolica" and the "Aeneid," some of some of his own writings he mentions in the above letter a "New Rhetoric" and a "New Computus" and a few other smaller works in Latin. We still possess the Rhetoric, the Computus (a manual for calculating the dates of ecclesiastical celebrations, especially of Easter), the essay "De partibus logicae," and the German essay on Music.

In Kögel's opinion Notker Labo was one of the greatest stylists in German literature. "His achievements in this respect seem almost marvellous." His style, where it becomes most brilliant, is essentially poetical; he observes with surprising exactitude the laws of the language. Latin and German he commanded with equal fluency; and while he did not understand Greek, he was weak enough to pretend that he did. He put an enormous amount of learning and erudition into his commentaries on his translations. There everything may be found that was of interest in his time, philosophy, universal and literary history, natural science, astronomy. He frequently quotes the classics and the Fathers of the Church. It is characteristic of Notker that at his table, even the poor were fed, and that he asked to be buried in the clothes which he was wearing in order that none might see the heavy chain with which he had been in the habit of mortifying his body.

(3) NOTKER PHYSICUS (surnamed Piperis Gra-

Nikon), physician and painter, d. 12 Nov., 975. He received his surname on account of his strict discipline. Concerning his life we only know that in 956 or 957 he became cellarius, and in 965 hospitalarius at St. Gall. Ekkhard

IV extols several of his paintings, and mentions some antiphons and hymns of his composition

(e. g. the hymn “Rector aeterni metuende sedi”). He is probably identical with a “Notker notarius”,

who enjoyed great consideration at the court of Otto

I on account of his skill in medicine, and whose knowledge of medical books is celebrated by Ekkhard.

In 940 this Notker wrote at Quendlimn the confirmation of the immunity of St. Gall. This is in accord with the great partiality later shown by the Ottos towards the monk, for example when they visited St. Gall in 972.

mation concerning him until his appointment as Abbato]

cerning him, except that they call him “abba benig-

nus” and laud his unaffected piety.

(5) NOTKER, Protopst of St. Gall and later Bishop of Liège, b. about 940; d. 10 April, 1008. This celebrated monk is not mentioned by the otherwise pro-lix historians of St. Gall. He probably belonged to a noble Swabian family, and in 969 was appointed imperial chaplain in Italy. From 969 to 1008 he was

Bishop of Liège. Through him the influence of St.

Gal was extended to wider circles. He laid the foundation of the great fame of the Liège Schools, to which studious youths soon flocked from all Christendom.

By procuring the services of Leo the Calabrian and thus making possible the study of Greek, Notker gave a notable extension to the Liège curriculum. Among Notker’s pupils, who extended the influence of the Liège schools to ever wider circles, may be mentioned: Hubald, Gunther of Salzburg, Ruthard, and

Erwin of Cambray, Heimo of Verdun, Iccleso of Tou1, and Adalbach of Utrecht. A noteworthy architectural activity also manifested itself under Notker.

In Folowin’s opinion Notker’s achievements surpass

those of any of his predecessors: among the buildings erected by him may be mentioned St. John’s in Liège, after the model of the Aachen cathedral. Praiseworthy also were his services as a politician under

Otto III and Henry II. He adhered faithfully to the cause of the romantic Otto, whom he accompanied to Rome. It was also he who brought back the corpse of the young emperor to Germany. The “Gesta episcoporum Leodium” have been frequently wrongly attributed to him, although he merely suggested its composition, and lent the work his name to secure it greater authority.

NOTO, DIACRESE of (NETEN), the ancient Naxos in and after the Saracen conquest the capital of one of the divisions of Sicily, was among the last cities to surrender to the Normans. Destroyed by an earthquake in 1693, it was rebuilt nearly five miles from its primitive site. It contains fine churches, like that of St. Nicholas, an archaeological museum with a collection of Cyrenian, Roman, and Saracen coins, and a library. Noto is the birthplace of the humanist

John Aurioui, secretary of Eugene IV and Nicholas V.

In the cathedral is the tomb of Blessed Conrad of Franciscus. The diocese was separated in 1644 from the Archdiocese of Cyren, of which Noto was the first bishop was Joseph Menditto. It has 19 parishes; 148,400 inhabitants; 11 religious houses of men, and 14 of women; a school for boys and three for girls;

and a home for invalids.

Notoriety, Notorious (Lat. Notorietas, notorium, from notus, known).—Notoriety is the quality or the state of things that are notorious; whatever is so fully or officially proved, that it may and ought to be held as certain without further investigation, is notorious. It is difficult to express exactly what is meant by notoriety, and, as the Gloss polyglossus (in can. Manif. 15, C. ii, q. 1), “we are constantly using the word notorious and are ignorant of its meaning”. Ordinarily it is equivalent to public, manifest, evident, known; all these terms have something in common—

they signify that a thing, far from being secret, may be easily known by many. Notoriety, in addition to this common idea, involves the idea of indisputable proof,

so that what is notorious is held as proved either as a basis for the conclusions and acts of those in authority, especially judges. To be as precise as is possible, “public” means what any one may easily prove or ascertain, what is done openly, what many know and hold as certain, is “manifest”; what a greater or less number of persons have learnt, no matter how, is “known”; what is to be held as certain and may no longer be called in question is “notorious”.

Authorities distinguish between notoriety of fact, notoriety of law, and presumptive notoriety, though the last is often considered a subdivision of the second.

Whatever is easily shown and is known by a sufficient number of persons to be free from reasonable doubt is notorious in fact. This kind of notoriety may refer either to a transitory fact, e. g., Caius was assassinated; or permanent facts, e. g., Titius is parish priest

(of this parish); or recurrent notoriety as in transactions. Notoriety has been judicially ascertained, viz., judicial admissions, an affair fully proved, and the judgment rendered in a lawsuit, is notorious in law; the judge accepts the fact as a certain without investigation; nor will be allow, except in certain well-specified cases, the matter to be called in question. “Notorious” is then used as more or less synonymous with “official”. Such also are facts recorded in official documents, as civil or ecclesiastical registries of births, deaths, or marriages, notarial records. Lastly, whatever arises from a rule of law based on a “violent” presumption, for instance, paternity

and filiation in case of a legitimate marriage, is pre-sumptively notorious.

When a fact is admitted as notorious by the judge,

and in general by a competent authority, no proof of it is required, but it is often necessary to show that it is notorious, as the judge is not expected to know every notorious fact. The notoriety has to be proved, like any other fact alleged in a trial, by witnesses or “instruments”, that is, written documents. The question is publicly known and admitted beyond dispute in their locality

or circle. The documents consist especially in extracts from the official registries, in the copies of acts, or of notarial papers, known as “notarial acts”, drawn up by public notaries on the conscientious declarations of well-informed witnesses.

Canonists have variously classified the legal effects of notoriety, especially in matters of procedure; but, ultimately, they may all be reduced to one: the judge, and in general the person in authority, holding what is notorious to be certain and proved, requires no further information, and therefore, both may and ought to refrain from any judicial inquiry, proof, or formalities, which would otherwise be necessary. For these inquiries and formalities having as their object to enlighten the judge, are useless when the fact is notorious. Such is the true meaning of the axiom that in notorious matters the judge need not follow the judicial procedure (cf. can. 14 and 16, C. ii, q. 1; cap. 7 and 10, ib. 11, lib. 11, t. 4, c. 8; De testib. cogend., lib. II, tit. xxi). None of the essential solemnities of the procedure should ever be omitted. The most interesting application of the effect of notoriety in criminal matters is in connexion with the flagrante delicto, when the accused is caught in the criminal act, in which case the judge is dispensed from the necessity of any inquiry.

A. BOUDINON.

Notre Dame, Congregations of.—I.—Congregation of Notre Dame de Montréal.—Marguerite Bourgeoys, the foundress, was born at Troyes, France, 17 April, 1620. She was the third child of Abraham Bourgeois, a merchant, and Guillemette Garnier, his wife. In 1653 Paul Chabanel and Father, the founder of Ville Marie (Montreal), visited Troyes, and invited her to go to Canada to teach; she set out in June of that year, arrived at Ville Marie, and devoted herself to the work of teaching. She opened her first school on 30 April, 1657, but soon had to return to France for recruits, where four companions joined her. A boarding school was opened and three convents of nuns were opened, in 1667 the foundress went back to France and returned in 1672 with letters from King Louis XIV and also with six new companions. In 1675 she built a chapel dedicated to Notre Dame de Bon Secours. To ensure greater freedom of action Mother Bourgeoys founded an unenclosed community, its members bound only by simple vows. They had chosen 2 July, as their patron saint. In 1705, while still in France, she undertook a third journey to Europe. She returned the next year, and resisted the many attempts made in the next few years to merge the new order in that of the Ursulines, or otherwise to change its original character. In 1684 a mission on Mount Royal was opened for the instruction of Indian girls. This mission, under the auspices of the priests of St. Sulpice, was removed in 1701 to Sauteau Recollet, and in 1720 to the Lake of Two Mountains. It still exists. The community, still standing on the grounds of Montreal College were part of a stone fort built to protect the colony from the attacks of their enemies; they were expressly erected for the sisters of that mission: one for their residence, the other for their classes.

The sisters continued their labours in the schools of Ville Marie, and also prepared a number of young women for Christian teachers. Houses were opened at Pointe-aux-Trembles, near Montreal, at Lachine, at Champlain and Chateau Richer. In 1685 a mission was established at Sainte Famille on the Island of Orleans and was so successful that Mgr de St. Vallier, Bishop of Quebec, invited the sisters to open houses in that settlement, which was done. In 1689 he desired to confer with Mother Bourgeoys in regard to a project of foundation. Though sixty-nine years of age, she set out at once on a long and perilous journey on foot to Quebec, and had to suffer all the inconveniences of an April thaw. According to the demands of the bishop for the new foundation, she had to double the consolations of obedience to her superior, and of keeping her sisters in their true vocation when, only four years later, the bishop himself became convinced that such was necessary. Mother Bourgeoys asked repeatedly to be discharged from the superintendence, but not until 1693 did the bishop agree to her petition. Eventually on 24 June, 1698, the rule and constitution of the congregation, based upon those which the foundress had gathered from various sources, were formally accepted by the members. The next day they made their vows. The superior at the time was Mother of the Assumption (Barbier). Mother Bourgeoys devoted the remainder of her life to the preparation of points of advice for the guidance of her sisterhood. She died on 12 January, 1700. On 7 Dec., 1787, she was declared venerable. The proclamation of the heroicity of the virtues of the Venerable Marguerite Bourgeoys was officially made in Rome on 27 June, 1910. In 1701 the community numbered fifty-four members. The nuns were self-supporting and, on this consideration, the number of subjects was not limited by the French Government, as was the case with all the other existing communities. The flagration which ravaged Montreal in 1768 destroyed the mother-house, which had been erected eighty-five years before. The chapel of Bon Secours, built by Mother Bourgeoys, was destroyed by fire in 1754, and rebuilt by the Seminary of St. Sulpice in 1771.

During the latter half of the nineteenth century, missions were established in various parishes of the provinces of Quebec, Marcogé, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, and in the United States; also, many new academies and schools were opened in the city of Montreal. The normal school in Montreal, under the direction of the congregation, began in 1899, has materially increased its work in recent years, and is under the care of the congregation. It is attended by 500 pupils. The school system of the Congregation of Notre Dame de Montreal always comprised day-schools and boarding-schools. The pioneers of Canada had to clear the forest, to cultivate the land, and to prepare homes for their families. They were all of an intelligent class of farmers and artisans, who felt that Christian education was the best legacy they could leave their children; therefore they seized the opportunity afforded them by the nascent Congregation of Notre Dame, to place their daughters in boarding-schools. The work, inaugurated in Canada, led to demands for houses of the congregation in many totally English parishes of the United States. The schools of the Congregation of Notre Dame everywhere give instruction in all fundamental branches. The real advantages developed by the systematic study of psychology and pedagogy have been fully turned to account. The system begins with the kindergarten, and the courses are afterwards graded as elementary, model, commercial, academic, and collegiate. The first college opened was in Nova Scotia at Antigonish, affiliated with the university for young men in the same place; and the early years of its foundation it has annually seen a number of Bachelors of Arts among its graduating students. In 1909 the Notre Dame Ladies' College, in affiliation with Laval, was inaugurated in Montreal. The fine arts are taught in both the secondary schools and universities, while the larger and more central houses those branches are carried to greater perfection by competent professors. The teaching from the very elements is in conformity with the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass and in Jerusalem. That of St. John in the Mountains was founded from it. Connected with the orphanage in Jerusalem under the patronage of St. Peter are schools of art and manual-training. At the Ecole Homo there are 170 pupils, Jews, Mohammedans, and Greek schismatic, besides 100 day scholars.

There are foundations in London and also at Rome, Grandour near Versailles, Trieste, Vienna, Prague, Galata, Breslau, Basle, Constantinople, Kadi-Koi, etc. At Munich the "Sionsverein" for the support of poor children in Palestine was founded in 1865 through the instrumentality of Baroness Therese von Trumpemberg and Hermann Geger. The Sisters of Notre-Dame de Sion number 500, of whom fifty are at the Ecole Homo and St. John's, and seven at St. Peter's. They are directed spiritually by the Priests of Notre-Dame de Sion, a congregation of secular priests, which includes lay brothers. At St. Peter's in Jerusalem, there are six priests, nine lay brothers, and some scolastics. The German settlement of Tabgha, on the Lake of Genesareth, is in charge of a priest of Notre-Dame de Sion, assisted by a Lazarist. There is a foundation of Priests of Notre-Dame de Sion at Constantinople.

III.—Institute of Notre-Dame de Namur, founded in 1803 at Amiens, France, by Bl. Julie Billiart (b. 1751; d. 1816) and Marie-Louise-Francoise Bliin de Bourdon, Countess of Gazeigncourt, in religion Mother St. Joseph (b. 1756; d. 1838). The formation of a religious congregation for the education of youth was the result of a formal order to Blessed Julie in the name of God by Father Joseph J. who directed her fitness for such an enterprise. Mlle Blin de Bourdon offered to defray the immediate expenses. At Amiens, 5 August, 1803, they took a house in Rue Neveu, the cradle of the institute, with eight orphans, children confided to them by Pere Varin. In the chapel of this house, at Mass on 2 February, 1803, the two foundresses and their postulant, Catherine Du- chêde of Reims, made a vow of chastity, to which they added that of devoting theirselves to the Christian education of girls, further proposing to train religious teachers who should go wherever their services were asked for. Victoire Leseur (Sister Anastasie) and St. John) joined the institute this year and with the foundresses, made their vows of religion 15 October, 1804. The Fathers of the Faith who were giving missions in Amiens sent to the five sisters women and girls to be prepared for the sacraments. Bl. Julie was successful and on the invitation of the missionaries continued to assist them in the neighbouring towns.

Returning to Amiens, the foundress devoted herself to the formation of her little community. She taught the young sisters the ways of the spiritual life. To attain the double end of the institute, the foundresses first secured teachers, among whom were Fathers Varin, Enfantin and Thomas, the last-named a former professor in the Sorbonne, and Mother St. Joseph Blin, to train the novices and sisters.

The first regular schools of the Sisters of Notre-Dame were opened in August, 1806. Pupils filled every class-room at once. The urgent need of Christian education among all classes of society in France at that time, led the foundresses to modify their original plan of teaching only the poor and to open schools for the children of the rich also. Simplicity, largeness of mind, and freedom from little feminine weaknesses, marked the training given to the higher classes. But the poorest and most forsaken were never to remain the cherished portion of the institute, and the unwritten law that there may be in every mission free schools without pay schools, but not pay schools without free schools, still remains in force. Mother Julie did not require her postulants to bring a dowry, but a modest pension for the years of probation; a sound judgment, good health, aptitude for the work of the congregation, a fair education; these, with unblemished reputation, good morals, and an inclination to piety, were the qualifications she deemed indispensable. Within two years forty postulants were received.

The community lived under a provisional rule, based upon that of St. Ignatius, drawn up by Mother Julie and Father Varin, which was approved in 1805 by Mgr Jean-Francois Demandolx, Bishop of Amiens. The necessary recognition was accorded on 10 March, 1807. Though time and experience brought additions to these first constitutions, none of the fundamental articles have been changed: the sole exterior labour in the institute is the instruction of youth in schools in concert with the parochial clergy; a mother-house, a superior-general who appoints the local superiors, decides upon foundations and assigns their revenues, visits the secondary houses and moves subjects from one to another when necessary; one grade only of religious, no cloister, but no going out save for necessity, no visiting to relations, friends, or public buildings. It was for these points that the Blessed Foundress laboured and suffered, as the substance of the constitutions, solemly approved by Gregory XVI in 1844, shows.

The first branch house was established at St. Nicholas, near Ghent. At the departure of these five missionaries, 15 December, 1806, the religious habit was assumed by the congregation, a private, religious ceremony, still unchanged. The taking of vows is also private, but takes place during Mass. St. Nicholas, as well as Mother Julie's five other foundations in France, were all temporary. Later and permanent foundations were made in Belgium: Namur, 1807, which become the mother-house in 1808; Junet, 1808; St. Hubert, 1809; Ghent, 1810; Zele, 1811; Gembloux and Andennes, 1813; Fleurus, 1814; and all arrangements for Liége and Dinant, though the communities took possession of these convents only after 1816.

Mother St. Joseph Bliin de Bourdon, the co-foundress, was elected superior-general in succession to Blessed Mother Julie. During her generalate the institute became a strong force through the persecutions of religious orders by William of Orange-Nassau, King of the Netherlands. To compel them to remain in statu quo, to hold diplomas obtained only after rigid examinations in Dutch and French by state officials, to furnish almost endless accounts and writings regarding convents, schools, finances, and subjects, were some of the measures adopted to harass and destroy all teaching orders; but Mother St. Joseph’s tact, clear-sightedness, and zeal for souls saved the institute. During his tour in 1829, King William visited the establishment at Namur and was so pleased that he created the mother-general a Dutch subject. The Revolution of 1830 and the assumption of the crown of Belgium by Leopold of Saxe-Gotha put an end to the petty persecutions of religious. Mother St. Joseph founded houses at Thuin, 1817; Namur Orphanage, 1823; Hospital St. Jacques, 1823; Verviers, 1827; Hospital d’Harsequart and Bastogne, 1836, the latter having been for the past thirty years a state normal school; Philippeville, 1838. The most important work of her generalate was the compiling and collating of the present Rules and Constitution of the Sisters of Notre Dame. She has left an explanation of the rule; the particular rule of each office; the Directory and Customs. She had preserved a faithful record of all that Mother Julie had said or written on these points; hence the will of the foundress is carried out in the smallest details of daily life, and the communities are alike everywhere. Moreover, she drew up the system of school management which has been followed ever since, with only such modification of curricula and discipline as time, place, and experience have rendered indispensable.

This system of instruction is based upon that of St. John Baptist de La Salle, and may be read broadly in the “Management of Christian Schools,” issued by the Christian Brothers. The points of uniformity in the primary and secondary schools of all countries are chiefly: the emphasis laid upon thorough grounding in reading, writing, and arithmetic, grammar and composition, geography, and history; the half-hour’s instruction daily in Christian doctrine; the half-hour’s change of exercise in Christian doctrine; the use of the signal, or wooden clapper in giving directions for movements in class; the constant presence of the teacher with her class whether in the class-room or recreation ground; the preparation of lessons at home, or at least out of class hours. Vocal and chant music, drawing and needlework are taught in all the schools. No masters from outside may give lessons to the pupils in any of the arts or sciences.

Mother St. Joseph was twice re-elected superior-general, the term being at first fixed at ten years. To give greater stability to the government of the institute, a general chapter was convoked which should settle by ballot the question of the choice of superior-general. The assembly unanimously voted in the affirmative. In 1819 a foundation was asked for Holland by Rev. F. Wolf, S.J., but, on account of political difficulties, Mother St. Joseph could not grant it. She offered, instead, to train aspirants to the religious life. Accordingly, two came to Namur, passed their probation, made their vows, and returned to labours in their own countries. Thus is the origin of the congregation of Sisters of Notre Dame, whose mother-house is at Coesfeld, and who have large houses in Cleveland, Covington, and other cities of the Middle West. Though not affiliated to Notre Dame of Namur, they follow the same rule and regard Blessed Mother Julie as their foundress.

Mother St. Joseph died on 9 February, 1838, in the eighty-third year of her age and the twenty-third of her generalate. The preliminary process of her beatification is well advanced.

The third superior-general was Mother Ignatius (Thérèse-Josephine Goethals, b. 1800; d. 1842). Her services during the persecutions under King William were invaluable. Excessive toil, however, told upon her later, and she died in the fourth year of her generalate; but before she had sent the first colony of sisters to America.

She was succeeded by Mother Marie Thérèse, who, on account of ill-health, resigned her office the following year and Mother Constantine (Marie-Jeanne Joseph-Collin, b. 1802; d. 1873) was elected. She ruled the institute for thirty-three years, her term of office being marked by the papal approbation of the Rule in 1844, the first mission to England in 1845, to California in 1851, to Guatemala in 1856. Under Mother Aloysie (Thérèse-Joseph Mainy, b. 1817, d. 1888), fifth superior-general, the processes for the canonization of Mother Julie and Mother St. Joseph were begun in 1881; twenty houses of the institute were established in Belgium, England, and America. Under her successor, Mother Aimée de Jésus (Élodie Dullact, b. 1825, d. 1907), the Sisters of Notre Dame, at the request of Leopold II of Belgium, took charge of the girls’ schools of the peasant missionary district of Congo Free State, where three houses were established. She also sent from England a community of eight sisters for the girls’ schools in the Jesuit mission of Zambesi, Mashonaland. An academy and free school were opened later at Kronstadt, Orange River Colony, South Africa. Mother Aimée de Jésus was created by the King of Belgium a Knight of the Order of Leopold, and Sister Ignatius was accorded a similar honour after fourteen years of labour in the Congo. During this generalate Mother Julie Billiart was solemnly beatified by Pius X, 13 May, 1906. The present Superior-general, Mother Marie Aloysie, was elected in January, 1908.

The first foundation in America was made at Cincinnati, Ohio, at the request of the Right Reverend John B. Purcell, then Bishop and later the first Archbishop of Cincinnati. Sister Louise de Gonzague was appointed superior of the eight sisters who came for this purpose. After firmly establishing the institute in America, failing health caused her recall to Namur, where she worked until her death in 1896. Upon Sister Louise, another of the original group, devolved in 1848 the supervision of the houses of Cincinnati, but also of the others then founded or to be founded east of the Rocky Mountains. Every year the sisters were asked for in some part of the country and the mother-house of Namur gave generously of subjects and funds until the convents in America were able to supply their own needs.

The two provincials who have followed Sister Louise continued the work along the lines she had traced out. Sister Julie (b. 1827, d. 1901) founded fifteen houses, including Trinity College, Washington, D. C., and a provincial house and novitiate at Cincinnati, Ohio. Sister Agnes Mayer (b. 1840, d. 1910) made three foundations and built the first chapel dedicated to Blessed Mother Julie in America, a beautiful Gothic structure in stone, at Moylan, Pennsylvania.

In 1848 a colony of eight sisters left Namur under the care of Right Reverend F. N. Blanchet and Father de Smet, S.J., to labour among the Indians of the Oregon mission. Five years later these sisters, with the request of the Right Reverend J. S. Mazzuchelli, Bishop of San Francisco, were transferred to San José, California. The first establishment on the Pacific Coast was followed in course of time by ten others, which formed a separate province from Cincinnati.

For thirty years it was under the wise care of Sister Marie Cornelie.
IN 1851 two foundations were made in Guatemala Central America. Under government auspices and with such an outburst of welcome and esteem from the people as reads like a romance. In less than twenty years the reins of power having passed into the hands of the Liberals and Freemasons, the forty-one sisters of Notre Dame were exiled. There are three convents in America: at San José for the California Province, at Cincinnati for the central part of the United States, and at Waltham, Mass., for the eastern States. The rule has been kept in its integrity in America as in Europe. The union with Namur has been preserved, and a like union has even been maintained between all the houses of a province and its centre, the residence of the provincial superior. According to the needs of the schools, the sisters pass from house to house, and even from province to province as obedience enjoins. It was through the Redemptorists that the sisters of Notre Dame first went to England. Father de Buggenom, a Belgian, superior of a small mission at Falmouth, felt the urgent need of schools for the poor Catholic children. He asked and obtained from the Superior of the Sisters of Namur at Namur the community of six sisters, and with these he opened a small school at Penryn in Cornwall. It continued only three years, however, as the place afforded no means of subsistence and the religious house. The Redemptorists having established a second English mission at Clapham, near London, and having asked again for Sisters of Notre Dame for a school, the community of Peru was transferred thither in 1848. Through the initiative of Father Buggenom the sisters of the Holy Child Jesus, a community in the Diocese of Northampton, about fifty in number, were affiliated in 1848 to the Institute of Notre Dame, with the consent of the Bishops of Namur and Northampton. Scarcely had the hierarchy been re-established in England when the Government offered education to the Catholic poor; the Sisters of Notre Dame devoted themselves earnestly to this work, under the guidance of Sister Mary of St. Francis (Hon. Laura M. Petre), who was to the congregation in England what Mother St. Joseph was to the whole institute. Before her death (24th June, 1856) eighteen houses had been founded in England. There are now twenty-one. The most important of these English houses is the Training College for Catholic School-Mistresses at Moseley, near Birmingham. In 1854 they were confided to the Sisters of Notre Dame by the Government in 1856. The “centre system” which admits of the concentrated instruction of pupil teachers, now adopted by all the school boards of the larger English cities, originated with the sisters at Liverpool. At the request of the Scotch Education Department, the Sisters of Notre Dame opened the Dowanhill Training College for Catholic School-Mistresses at Glasgow in 1855. Its history has been an unbroken record of academic successes and material expansion. A second convent in Scotland has been opened at Dumbarton this year (1910). Although “codes” differ in terms and requirements, it may be said in general that in England and America the schools of Notre Dame are graded from kindergarten all through the elementary, grammar, and high schools. The academic courses carry the schedule of studies on to college work, while Trinity College, Washington, D.C., and St. Mary’s Hall, Liverpool, are devoted exclusively to work for college degrees. To meet local difficulties and extend the benefits of Catholic education, the sisters conduct industrial schools, orphanages for girls, schools for deaf mutes, and for negroes.NOTES OF THE MOTHER-HOUSE OF NOTRE DAME, NAMUR, BELGIUM; BOUND IN LEATHER BOUND WITH A POCKET AT THE BACK (LONDON, 1890); SISTER OF NOTRE DAME, LIFE OF THE REV. IV.—SCHOOL SISTERS OF NOTRE DAME, a religious community devoted to education. In 1910 they counted 3,170 members in Europe and 3,604 in America, a total of 6,774, with about 115,300 pupils in America. In 1847 they had 158 in Europe and 94 in America, a total of 252. In the United States they conduct parish schools in ten archdioceses and twenty-five dioceses, and have charge of eight orphanages; in addition they have parish schools in the Diocese of Hamilton, Canada; an Indian school at Arbor Springs, Mich.; a school for negroes at Annanville; and a deaf-mute institute in Louisiana. Their principal boarding-schools are: Baltimore, Md.; Fort Lee, New Jersey; Quincy, Ill.; Longwood, Chicago; Prairie du Chien, Wis. Of their day and high schools the most prominent are at Baltimore, Md., Quincy, Ill.; Longwood and Chataw, Miss. The School Sisters of Notre Dame are a branch of the Congregation of Notre-Dame founded in France, by St. Peter Fourier in 1597. In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, several convents of the congregation were established in Germany. The one at Ratisbon was suppressed at the beginning of the nineteenth century, but it was soon restored and remodelled to meet the needs of modern times. Bishop Wittmann of Ratisbon and Father Job of Vienna effected the change. While retaining the essential features of the rule and constitutions given by St. Peter Fourier, they widened the scope of the Sisters’ educational work. In 1834 the members established the first convent in upper Canada, near Niagara Falls. The first convent was in Neunburg vorm Wald, Bavaria. In 1839 they removed to a suburb of Munich, in 1842 to a former Poor Clare convent, built in 1284, and situated within the city limits. From this mother-house in the year 1847 six schools Sisters of Notre Dame, on the invitation of Bishop O’Connor of Pittsburgh, emigrated to America and landed at New York on 31 July. One of the sisters succumbed to the heat of the season and died at Harrisburg, Pa., on the journey from New York to St. Mary’s, Elk Co., Pa., destined to be the foundation-house in America. As St. Mary’s was not the place for a permanent location the mother-general successfully negotiated to obtain the Redemptorists’ convent attached to St. John’s Church, Baltimore, Md. By Nov. 1847, three schools were opened. The second and last colony of sisters, eleven in number, arrived from Munich, 25 March, 1848, and foundations were made at Pittsburgh, Philadelphia, and Buffalo. On 15 December, 1850, the mother-house was transferred to Milwaukee, with Mother Mary Caroline Fries as vicar-general of the sisters in America. With money donated by James L. Page, Archdiocese of Baltimore, a house was bought; this was absorbed later by Notre Dame Convent on St. Mary’s Hill. On 2 January, 1851, St. Mary's parish school was opened and St. Mary's Institute for boarding and day pupils soon afterwards. On 31 July, 1876, owing to its growth and extension, the congregation was divided into two provinces: the Western, with mother-house at Milwaukee; and the Eastern province at Baltimore. A second division of the Western province became necessary, and on 19 March, 1895, the Southern province was formed, with its mother-house at St. Louis.

Government of the Congregation.—The Congregation of the School Sisters of Notre Dame is under the government of the mother-general at Munich; she and her four assistants form the generalate. In America the government is in the hands of the commissary-general and four assistants. The commissariat is elected for six years. All professed sisters of the teaching grade have a vote in this election. The congregation is divided into districts. The voting sisters in each district choose one chapter-sister. These chapter-sisters together with the provincials elect the commissary-general and assistants. The election is by secret ballot, and its results must be confirmed by the mother-general and the cardinal-procurator. At the head of each province there is a mother provincial, elected with two assistants, by each province for three years. For the election of the mother-general and the general council, the Western province meets every six years; a deputation of the sisters in America is sent to Munich, Bavaria. This deputation consists of the commissary-general and the mother provincial, ex officio, and a companion of each mother provincial elected by the respective provinces. In America, the general congregation is convened every six years in the principal mother-house at Milwaukee.

Training of Members.—To train members for their future work in the School Sisters, all candidates become novitiates. The age for admission into the community is sixteen to twenty-seven. After two years' probation and study, the candidate enters the novitiate and two years later makes temporal vows for seven years; she then makes perpetual vows and becomes a professessed sister. The teaching sisters meet at specified periods and at appointed houses of the orders for summer schools and teachers' institutes.

The principal houses of the congregation in the Western province are in Elm Grove, Waukesha Co., Wis., the home for aged, invalid, and convalescent sisters; at Prairie du Chien, Wis., founded in 1872, charterd in 1877, owing its highest honor, John Lawler (died on 24 Feb., 1891) and his son, Thomas C. Lawler, of Dubuque, Iowa; at Longwood, Chicago, Ill., established and chartered in 1872. In 1905 the Legislature of Illinois granted the academy the right to add a college course and confer the degrees of A.B. and Ph.B. In the Eastern province at Baltimore, Md., chartered in 1864, charter amended and powers of corporation enlarged 1896. The sisters began their work in Baltimore in 1848; owing to the growth of their academy, more commodious quarters became necessary and the school, Notre Dame of Maryland, was transferred in 1873 to a magnificent estate of seventy acres obtained in the suburb. To meet the continual demand for a more extensive curriculum for women, the sisters of the convent applied in January, 1896, to the State for the power of conferring academic degrees; this was granted by an Act of the Legislature, 2 April, 1896, and the convent now has a college with courses leading to the baccalaureate, an academy that prepares students for the college, and a grammar and preparatory department. The Eastern province, in 1902, founded an academy at Pawtuckaw, the Palisades of the Hudson, Bergen County, N. J., where a residence was purchased by the sisters on 2 Oct., 1879, the school being opened on 21 November, 1879, and chartered in June, 1890. In the Southern province the principal schools are at Quincy, Ill., founded on 28 Dec., 1850, as a parochial school, the academy opened in Sept., 1867; at Chatawa, Miss., founded on 15 October, 1874, a deaf-mute institution; at Chincuba, La., founded by Canon Mignot, 1 October, 1890, given in charge of the sisters 25 September, 1892.

Most prominent among the sisters in America was Mother M. Caroline Fries, who died on 22 July, 1892, after being superioress of the congregation for forty-two years. She was born near Paris, on 24 August, 1824, and was called at baptism by the name of Josephine. As a child she was brought to Eichstätt, Bavaria, under the tutelage of her uncle, Mgr Michael Fries. Even when only a novice she was given charge of very important schools in Munich. She was one of the first to volunteer for the missionary work in the New World, and emigrated to America in 1847. It soon became evident that it was Sister Caroline who was to develop the young congregation. She was appointed vicar of the mother-general in America and later on elected as the first commissary-general. Under her direction from four members in 1847, the sisterhood grew to two thousand in 1892. Her life was written by Mgr P. M. Abbelein. Mother M. Clara Heuck, the third commissary-general, when the Eastern province was established in 1876 sister M. Clara was appointed as novice-mistress. Soon she became the superioress in Baltimore and the first general of the Eastern province, which she held for three terms, after which she was elected commissary-general at Milwaukee on 13 May, 1899. She died at Milwaukee on 4 August, 1905, aged sixty-two.

Sisters of Notre Dame (of Cleveland, Ohio), a branch of the congregation founded by Blessed Julie Billiart. In 1859, Father Elting of Coelessen, Germany, aided by the Misses Hildergard and Sister Lisette Kuebling, who became the first members of this community, introduced the Order of Notre Dame into Westphalia. The novices were trained by three sisters from the community of Amersterdam, Holland. Soon they were enabled to open a normal school and to take charge of parochial schools. The Prussian Government objecting to teachers dependent on foreign authority, the sisters were compelled to sever their relations with the mother-house in Holland and to erect their own at Coesfeld. When in 1871, the Kulturkampf broke out in Germany, the Sisters of Coelessen, though they had repeatedly received at the Prussian government the highest testimonials of their efficient teachers, were at once expelled. Thereupon, Father Westerholt, of St. Peter's Church, Cleveland, had Bishop Gilmour invite them to his diocese. On 8 July, 1874, the superior-general accompanied by the eight sisters arrived in New York, and the following day in Cleveland. Their first home was a small frame house near St. Peter's Church. Two months later they took charge of the parish school for girls. Presently Bishop Toebbe of Covington, Ky., invited them to his diocese, where they were first employed as teachers of the Mother of God schools in Covington. In the autumn of 1874, the sisters began to conduct the parish schools of St. Stephen's, Cleveland, and of St. Joseph's, Fremont. Within four years of their first arrival on the North American continent, two hundred sisters had been transferred to the missions in Ohio and Kentucky. The centre of the community was temporarily at Covington, where in 1875 a convent with an academy was erected. The same year the superior-general came to Cleveland, where the school and mother-house was built and an academy was opened in 1878. In 1883 a girls' boarding-school on Woodland Hills was opened. An academy was founded in Toledo, Ohio, and opened September, 1904. Since 1877 the Sisters of Notre Dame have been in charge of two orphanages, one at Cold Spring, Ky., and the other at Bond Hill in the Archdiocese of Cincinnati. In May, 1887, the Prussian Government allowed the sisters to ture affecting the Church, and especially in legislation regarding education, the university is usually consulted, and any proper legislation is needed. In those matters Notre Dame has merited consideration by the State not only by her position as a leading university, but also by a remarkable display of patriotism in the Civil War. At the first call for arms seven of her priests, with professors, were sent by Father Sorin to act as chaplains; and this at a time when the university could ill spare any of her faculty.

The progress of the university has been due largely to its presidents, who have been, in all cases, men of scholarly attainments and executive capabilities. Excepting the founder, who was the first president, each had served as professor at Notre Dame before being called to direct its affairs. In all there have been eight presidents—the Very Reverend Edward Sorin, the founder; Rev. Patrick Dillon, William Corby, Augustus Lemmonier, Patrick Clovin, Thomas Walsh, Andrew Morrissey, and John Casse. All, members of the Congregation of Holy Cross.

Among other professors who, by their writings and researches, have contributed to the sciences which they taught and have added lustre to Notre Dame, are Rev. A. Zahm, C.S.C., author of scientific works and professor of physics; Rev. Henry Kirsch, C.S.C., professor of zoology; Rev. J. C. Carrier, C.S.C., professor of botany, William Hoyne and G. D. Edwards, librarians; Arthur J. Stace and Martin J. McCu, professors of English literature; Father John B. Scheier, C.S.C., professor of Latin; Rev. Louis Cointet, C.S.C., professor of philosophy.

Excepting the land on which it is built, donated by Bishop Hailandtre, and a few lesser donations in money, Notre Dame has developed into a great university without financial aid. It opened as a college in September, 1843, in a modest brick structure erected to serve temporarily until a larger building was completed in 1844. This was enlarged in 1853. Father Sorin was president continuously until 1855. The enrolment of students for many years was small, numbering sixty-nine in 1850, coming from four states in the Middle West and from New York and Pennsylvania. By 1861 the number had advanced to two hundred, and in that year the faculty of the college began. Science was organized in 1856, the central building of 1853 gave way to a more pretentious structure; the corps of professors was augmented to forty; the university press was established; the main library was added to, and the equipment of the college of science enlarged. The college of law was formed in 1869, and the college of engineering in 1872. A fire in April, 1879, wiped out the labours of forty years, consuming all the university buildings except the church and the university theatre. Plans were at once made for rebuilding, and the present Notre Dame begun. In September, 1879, the administration building, a large structure, planned to form the centre of a group, was completed and classes resumed. A departure from the old system of student life was made in 1887 when the first residence hall containing private rooms was erected. Before that time, the common system, modelled on college life in Europe, prevailed. In 1900 the college of architecture was established.

The growth of the University has been steady. At present (in 1911) over one thousand students are registered, from North and South America, and from practically all the countries of Europe. All the students live on the university grounds. The faculties are made up of eighty-five professors, including many laymen. Twenty buildings are devoted to university purposes, and those with their equipment and apparatus are return and their mother-house was established at Mülhausen, Rhénish Prussia. The American branch is under the immediate direction of a provincial superior residing in Cleveland, and numbers 430 sisters. The sisters conduct also upwards of forty parish schools, mostly in Ohio and Kentucky, containing about 14,000 pupils.

Notre Dame du Lac, University of, in Northern Indiana near the boundary lines of Michigan and Illinois. It is owned and directed by the Congregation of Holy Cross, whose mother-house in the United States is located at Notre Dame, the name by which the university is most commonly known. Notre Dame was founded in 1842 by the Very Reverend Edward Sorin, C.S.C., late superior-general of his congregation, who came from France at the invitation of the Right Reverend Celestine A. L. Guynemer de La Hallandière, D.D., Bishop of Vincennes. Nearly two years passed before the first building was erected and a faculty organized. In 1844 the university received a charter from the State. By special act of the Legislature of Indiana, it was given legal existence and empowered to confer degrees in the liberal arts and sciences and in law and medicine. Though no medical faculty has been formed, all the other departments mentioned in the charter have been established, and colleges and universities degrees granted in each.

At the outset only collegiate instruction was given in the studies then regarded as best furnishing a liberal education. The first faculty organized was that of the college of arts and letters, and chairs of philosophy, history, mathematics, and ancient and modern languages were established. But the educational conditions in the country near the university were primitive, and ready to take in collegiate work. Accordingly, there was soon founded a preparatory school at Notre Dame in which instruction was given, not only in subjects immediately preparing for college, but also in the rudiments. Soon after the college courses began, the needs of the North-West demanded a school for those preparing for the priesthood. The founder accordingly provided a faculty in theology, and six years after the State charter was granted, one of the students was pursuing theological studies. But as intercommunication between the more settled parts of the United States increased with more easy modes of travel, the theological faculty was sustained only for the members of the Congregation of Holy Cross. To-day the university consists of five colleges, each with several departments—arts and letters, engineering, science, architecture, and law. At the head of each college is a dean. The faculties of the five colleges are directed by the president of the university, who governs in matters purely academic. All other affairs are administered by a board of trustees. Though young as a university, Notre Dame has had distinct influence on movements of the Church in the Middle West from its foundation. Founded at a period when the need of missionaries was pressing and located in a centre of missionary activity, its aid in the spread of Catholicism in the North-West was strong. The work of the early French missionaries was continued by the religious at Notre Dame, who served both as professors and evangelists. They supplied the Catholic Church with a body of the most learned writings and by works of fiction. A university press was early established, from which has been issued weekly a literary and religious magazine, the "Lave Maria", contributed to by the best writers of Europe and America. By attracting, too, every year a large number of non-Catholic students, the university has greatly lessened antagonism to the Church and has quickened religious feeling among the different. Moreover, in laws passed by the State Legis-

NOTTINGHAM, Diocese of (Nottingham), one of the original twelve English Dioceses created at the time of the restoration of the hierarchy by Pius IX in 1850. It embraces the counties of Nottingham, Leicester, Derby, Lincoln, and Rutland, which were comprised in the old Midland District or vicariate, when at the request of James II in 1685, the Holy See divided England into two vicariates, the London, Northern, the Midland, and the Western. Prior to 1840 when the number of vicars Apostolic was increased from four to eight, the Midland District had consisted of fifteen counties. In 1850 Nottingham could count only twenty-four permanent missions, many of these better than villages. For the most part they originated from chapelaries which had through penal times been maintained by the Catholic nobility and gentry, or had been founded independently by them. Among these there existed foundations of several religious orders. In Derbyshire the Jesuits had missions at Chesterfield and Spink Hill; in Lincolnshire, Louth, Boston, and Market Rasen. The Dominicans were settled in Leicester, the Fathers of Charity carried on several missions in Leicestershire, and the Cistercians occupied their newly founded Abbey of Fontenay at St. Bernard in Charnwood Forest.

From the appearance of the Jesuits in England in 1850 at the special request of Dr. Allen, they had done much by their devoted labours to keep alive the Faith in the Nottingham diocese. Of their missions mentioned above some were among the earliest of the Society in England dating back some three hundred years. Derby was included in the district or college of the Consolata mission to Leicester, founded by Father Richard Blount, about 1633, first Provincial of the English Province. Extinct for many years it was partially revived in 1842 as Mount St. Mary's College, when the present college and convent was established by the then provincial, Father Randal Lythegeoe. After the Reformation, the English Province of the Friars Preachers ceased to exist, until resuscitated at Bornhem in Flanders by Phillip Howard, (q.v.) later cardinal, who became the first prior of the Dominicans in 1675. The first introduction of the English Dominicans from Bornhem was at Hinckley, whence for many years Leicester was served by them. Their mission at Leicester was put on a permanent basis only in 1738 by the purchase of a house by Father Francis Xavier Choppelle. The present church of the Holy Cross was begun by Father Benedict Caetrick in 1815 and was opened in 1819. The dedication under the title of Holy Cross was adopted with no doubt on account of the celebrated relic of the Holy Cross brought from Bornhem, and now in London. After the lapse of three centuries a monastery of the Cistercian Order was resuscitated in England by the foundation of the Abbey of Mount St. Bernard in Leicestershire, made possible by the assistance of Ambrose Philips de Lisle of Graces Dieu Manor. On his conversion in December, 1825, devoted all his energies to the spread of the Faith in England. This he hoped to accomplish by the re-establishment in the country of monastic institutions. In 1830 he had a hundred and twenty-seven acres of wild uncultivated land in Charnwood Forest and presented it to the Cistercians. Beginning with one brother who lived alone in a four-roomed cottage, the community rapidly increased, and a large building was erected as well as a small chapel, opened by Dr. Walsh 1 October, 1837. This also in a short time proving insufficient, the Earl of Shrewsbury generously offered them £2,000, but on condition that a new monastery should be erected,choosing for that purpose the present site of the abbey. It was built from designs by Augustus Welby Pugin. In 1848 by Brief of Pius IX the monastery of Mount St. Bernard was raised to the dignity of an abbey. In 1851 the first mitre abbot in England since the Reformation, was consecrated 1 February, 1849. In introducing the Cistercians into England, de Lisle had hoped that they would undertake the missions territory and with this view he built three chapels, at Grace Dieu, Whitwick, and the Abbey. On the score of their rule, however, they declined to take charge permanently of the missions. De Lisle then decided to bring from Italy members of the Order of Charity. After much negotiation with the head of the order, Father Gentili came to Grace Dieu as chaplain. This was the commencement of the settlement of this order in the diocese. In 1841 Dr. Walsh made over to them the secular mission of Loughborough founded in 1832 by Father Benjamin Hulme. The buildings were too small to permit of a novitiate and a college of their own which they were desirous of establishing. To carry out this twofold object, about nine acres were purchased; here the foundation stone of the new buildings was laid in May, 1843, and in 1844 was opened the first college and novitiate house of the institute in England. Sisters of Mercy had come to Nottingham in 1844, and in 1846 entered their convent in close proximity to the cathedral.

The first Bishop of Nottingham was the Rt. Rev. William Hendren, O.S.F., b. in 1792, consecrated 10 September, 1848, as Vicar Apostolic of the Western District, transferred to the Diocese of Clifton, 29 Sept., 1850, and to Nottingham 22 June, 1867. In the cathedral church of St. Barnabas is of the lancet style of architecture, and is considered one of the best specimens of the work of Augustus Welby Pugin. Owing to ill-health Dr. Hendren resigned in 1853 and was succeeded by Dr. Richard Rosewell, b. at Gatesacre near Liverpool, in 1817. He was sent to Ushaw and afterwards to Rome, where he took his degree and was ordained in 1840. He was consecrated in the cathedral by Cardinal Wiseman on 21 September, 1853. During his episcopate a number of missions were founded in the various counties of the diocese. In Lincolnshire, through the generosity of Thomas Arthur Young of Kingerby Hall, not only was the Church and presbytery built at Gainsborough and Grimsby, but the Premonstratensian order was re-introduced into England at Crowle and Spalding. In 1874, owing to Dr. Rosewell's ill-health, the Rev. Edward Gilpin Bagshawe of the London Oratory his coadjutor. The same year, however, Dr. Rosewell tendered his resignation and Dr. Bagshawe was consecrated at the London Oratory 12 November, 1874. Numerous missions necessitated by the development of the mining industry were opened during his administration, and various communities of nuns introduced into the diocese, which he ruled for twenty-seven years. He resigned in 1901 and in 1904 was transferred to the titular Archbishopric of Seleucia. Rt. Rev. Robert Brindle, D.D., his successor, was born at Liverpool, 4 November, 1837. The first Catholic chaplain to receive the pension for distinguished and meritorious service, as well as Turkish and Egyptian orders and medals, he was, on his retirement from the army in 1899, on the petition of Cardinal Vaughan, appointed his assistant, and on the resignation of Dr. Bagshawe, received his Bishop to the See of Nottingham 6 November, 1901.

In 1910 there were in the diocese 32,000 Catholics; 84 secular, and 14 regular, priests; 75 churches with 73 missions attached, 31 without missions; 6 convents for men, and 9 for women.

NOURRISSON, Jean-Félix, philosopher, b. at Thiens, Department of Puy-de-Dôme, 18 July, 1826; d. at Paris, 13 June, 1899. He received his education in the college of his native city and in the Collège Stanislas (Paris), where, at the age of nineteen, immediately after completing his studies, he was appointed professor. In accordance with the wishes of his father, he applied himself first to the study of law, but his convictions led him in another direction, and he finally decided to devote himself to philosophy. He was appointed to the chair of philosophy in the Collège Stanislas (1849), received the Doctorate (1852), and was made professor of philosophy successively in the Lycée de Rennes (1854), the University of Clermont-Ferrand (1855), the Lycée Napoleon, Paris (1858) and the Collège de France (1874). Nourrissón obtained three prizes in competitions on the philosophy of Leibniz (1860), and on the rôle of psychology in the philosophy of St. Augustine (1864), subjects proposed by the Institut de France. In 1870 he became a member of the Académie des Sciences morales et politiques in the section of philosophy. Nourrissón was one of the best representatives of French spiritualistic philosophy in the nineteenth century. Not only was he a deep thinker, a penetrating philosopher and historian, but a firm believer, convinced that "conscience remains hesitating, and that convictions come to nothing, unless the teachings of religion complete the data of reason" (letter to de Barante, 5 Dec., 1856).

Besides a number of reports, memoirs, and articles in the "Journal des Débats", "Revue des Deux Mondes", "Revue Contemporaine", "Correspondant", etc., Nourrissón's works are: "Quel Platon de l'âge moderne" (Paris, 1852); "Essai sur la philosophie de Bosseuet" (Paris, 1852); "Les Pères de l'Eglise latine" (Paris, 1856); "Le cardinal de Bérulle" (Paris, 1859); "Exposition de la théorie platonicienne des idées" (Paris, 1859); "Tableau des progrès de la pensée humaine depuis Thalès jusqu'à Leibniz" (Paris, 1858), the third edition was augmented and brought down to Hegel's time (1887); "Histoire et philosophie" (Paris, 1890); second enlarged edition under the title "Portraits et études" (Paris, 1883); "La philosophie de Leibniz" (Paris, 1860); "Le dix-huitième siècle et la Révolution française" (Paris, 1863), 2nd ed., 1875, under the title "L'ancienne France et la Révolution"); "La nature humaine: essai de psychologie appliquée" (Paris, 1885); "La philosophie de Saint-Augustin" (Paris, 1865); "Spinoza et le naturalisme contemporain" (Paris, 1866); "De la liberté et du hasard" (Paris, 1878); "Les philosophes de l'âge moderne" (Paris, 1879); "Machiavel" (Paris, 1875); "Trois révolutionnaires: Turgo, Necker, Bailly" (Paris, 1885); "Pascal, physicien et philosophe" (Paris, 1885); "Philosophes de la nature: Bacon, Bayle, Toland, Buffon" (Paris, 1887); "Défense de Pascal" (Paris, 1888); "Voltaire et le voltairianisme" (Paris, s. d.); "Rousseau et le rosschauianisme" (Paris, 1901), a posthumous work edited by Paul Nourrissón.

NOVARA, Diocese of (Novariensis), the capital of the province of Novara, Piedmont, Italy, noted for the manufacture of wool, cotton, and silk textiles, and machinery. The cathedral originally Romanesque has been modified. The high altar is the work of Thorwaldsen, Marchesi, and Finelli; the baldachin is by Gaetani. Among the paintings are by Bordone, Crespi, and other artists, besides some ancient mosaics; the baptistery dates from the fifth century. The cathedral archives contain codices and other documents from the eighth century. The church of St. Gaudentius, a work of Pellegrino Pellegrini, was begun in 1553 to replace the ancient basilica built by St. Gaudentius and torn down to make room for the fortifications; Renaissance in style, although the cupola does not harmonise, it contains valuable paintings and frescoes by Lombard, Caccia, Procaccini, Crespi, Giaridini, Sogni, Saletta, and Flamminghino. The city has an Institute of Arts and trades, a museum of antiquities, and several private galleries, among them the Leonardi. Novara was the birthplace of the ancient jurist, C. Albucius Silo, Peter Lombard, the philologist Cattaneo, the painter Caccia, and the Jesuit Tornielli. Novara, formerly Novaria, was inhabited by Ligurians and Sabellians. Under the Carolingians, it was the seat of a count, but the power of the counts passed gradually to the bishops, confirmed by Otho I (960), in the person of Bishop Aupaldus. From the time of Henry III, Novara was a commune, governed by two consuls and by a consul, called Maggiore. Frequently at war with Vercelli and Milan, it joined Frederick Barbarossa against the latter city, but in 1168 was compelled to join the Lombard League. After the peace of Constance it contended with the Counts of Biandrate, Vercelli, and its own bishops, unwilling to be deprived of their sovereign rights in which they had been again confirmed by Frederick Barbarossa. Upon the expulsion of the bishop in 1210, Innocent III threatened to suppress the diocese. Later, when Martin della Torre became lord of Milan, Novara gave its allegiance to him, then to the Visconti, from which time it formed part of the Duchy of Milan, with rare intervals; in 1536-38 it belonged to Montefeltro, 1556-1602 to the Farnese of Parma, 1724 to the Savoy. Because of its position, Novara has been the scene of important battles: in April, 1500, Louis the Moor, Duke of Milan, intended to besiege here the Trivulzi, appointed governor by the King of France, but abandoned by his Swiss troops, he was taken prisoner. On 6 June, 1613, the Swiss in the pay of the King of Spain, drove out the French; on 18 April, 1812, the troops that had rebelled against King Charles Felix were dispersed there; on 23 March, 1849, Radetzky inflicted upon the Piedmontese a defeat that compelled King Charles Albert to abdicate.

In the fourteenth century, Novara was in the Diocese of Vercelli; its first bishop, St. Gaudentius, was consecrated by St. Simplicianus, Bishop of Milan (347-400). St. Lawrence is said to have introduced the Faith into Novara. St. Julius and St. Julian assisted Gaudentius in the conversion of the diocese. The list of bishops has been preserved on two ivory diptychs, one in the cathedral dates from 1168; the other in the church of St. Gaudentius from 1343. Among the bishops were St. Agabius (417); St. Victor...
The resources of Nova Scotia are diversified. Farming, mining, fishing, lumbering, and manufacturing yield an ample return to the industry of the inhabitants. In the counties lying along the Bay of Fundy and penetrated by the inlets are valuable dikes and lands begun by the early French settlers, and continued after the expulsion of the Acadians by the colonists from New England, who in 1760 and 1761 took possession of the lands of the expelled Acadians. The agricultural products of the country are hay, wheat, oats, barley, potatoes, and turnips, all of which obtain a local market. In the Annapolis Valley about 750,000 barrels of apples are annually produced and shipped to the English markets. There are large coal measures in the Counties of Cumberland, Pictou, Inverness, and Cape Breton. The coal is bituminous, and supplies the local demand and a large portion of the markets of the St. Lawrence River. Iron, copper, and gypseum are also mined. The coast fisheries are looked upon as very valuable. They consist of salmon, cod, halibut, mackerel, herring, shellfish, and are exported to American and European markets.

The forests produce maple, birch, hemlock, spruce, pine, and beech. The manufacturing interests are also extensive, the larger plants being the iron and steel works at Sydney and Sydney Mines.

II. ETHNOGRAPHY. When the European colonists first came to Nova Scotia they found the country inhabited by a tribe of Indians known as the Micmac. These savages were converted to Christianity by St. Lawrence. Their settlement was formed by the early French missionaries. Their descendants, numbered 1542 at the time of the last official census (1901), belong to the Catholic Church. They live principally on reservations set aside for them by the Government. The duty of care of these reservations has been assigned by the British North American Act to the Parliament of Canada. The descendants of the French settlers form an important body. They numbered at the time of the last census 45,161. They also are Catholics and are noted for their industry and frugality.

The Germans form another important element. They are descended from the body of German settlers who arrived in Nova Scotia shortly after the founding of Halifax, and in 1753 removed to the County of Lunenburg. Principally Lutherans and Anglicans, they are thrifty and industrious. The English settlers came in after the defeat of the French, and after the Revolutionary War from twenty to thirty thousand loyalists left the United States and settled in Nova Scotia. Later on came accessions from Ireland and Scotland. At the last census these last-mentioned races were estimated as follows: English, 159,753; Scotch, 143,382; Irish, 54,710. There were also 5984 negroes in the province. They are descended from slaves who were brought to Nova Scotia before the abolition of slavery in British dominions. The total population of the Province of Nova Scotia in 1901 was 459,572, of whom 129,578 were returned as Catholics.

III. HISTORY. John Cabot made his first voyage from Bristol in search of a westerly route to India in 1497. He made a landfall on the eastern coast of North America, but whether on Labrador, Newfoundland, or Nova Scotia is uncertain. No actual settlement immediately followed this voyage.
mouth of the St. Croix River. The companions whom he left at Port-Royal returned to France. The following year de Monts and the survivors of his party at St.
Croix returned to Port-Royal. This was the begining of European settlement in Canada, and the colony thus established is the oldest European settle-mant in North America. The exception was St.
Augustine in Florida. The colony was temporarily abandonned in 1607, but in 1610 the French returned and remained in undisturbed possession until 1613, when a force from Virginia named Argall made a descent upon the colony and totally destroyed it.
In 1621 King James I gave a grant of Acadia to Sir William Alexander and changed the name to Nova Scotia; but the efforts of Sir William Alexander to build an English settlement were of little avail.
After the capture of Quebec by David Kirke, peace was made between France and Great Britain by the Treaty of St-Germain-en-Layev (1632), and Quebec and Nova Scotia were given back to France. But in 1654
Cromwell sent out a fleet to capture the Dutch colony at Manhattan, and a portion of his fleet sailed into Annapolis Basin, and Port-Royal surrendered to them.
After the accession of Charles II, by the Treaty of Breda, Nova Scotia was again restored to France.
In 1690 Sir William Phips took command of a naval force from Massachusetts, and he easily took Port-Royal, but he left no garrison there and the French soon occupied it. After several years of war terms of peace were again arranged between Great Britain and France by the Treaty of Ryswick (1679) and Nova Scotia was once again placed under the rule of France. The final capture of the colony by the British occurred on July 22, 1710 when the French surrender to Colonel Nichol son, who named the settlement Annapolis in honour of Queen Anne. The long warfare between the two counties for the possession of Nova Scotia proper was brought to a close by the Treaty of Utrecht (1713), which provided that the peninsula should belong to England and the Island of Cape Breton to France.
Annapolis became the capital of the colony, and the only other English settlement was at Canso. Very few settlers arrived in the country for nearly forty years. The French to regain their position strongly fortified Louisbourg on the south-east coast of Cape Breton. War again broke out in 1748 a force was sent from Massachusetts under Colonel William Pe-perell. After a siege of seven weeks the Governor of Louisbourg was obliged to surrender. To recapture Louisburg the French in the following year sent out a powerful fleet under d'Anville. This expedition was unfortunate. The fleet encountered bad weather and after the remnants of it arrived at Chebucto (Halifax) Harbour, the commander and many of the men died; those who survived returned to France. Great Britain held Louisbourg for three years after the first capture; and then terms of peace were arranged by the Treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle (1748) and Louisbourg was given to France. To strengthen the position of the English in Nova Scotia it was determined to establish a permanent settlement on the shores of Chebucto Harbour. Accordingly in June, 1749, Colonel Corn-walls arrived with a number of settlers and founded the town of Halifax. The seat of government was transferred from Annapolis to the new town, and Corn-walls selected a council to assist him in the administration of the colony. Six years later occurred the cruel expulsion of the Acadians from their fertile lands along the Bay of Fundy. Several thousands of these people were banished from Nova Scotia and scattered in the English colonies of Massachusetts to Louisiana.
In many cases families were separated and the event remains a dark blot on the reputation of the English governor of that day.
From 1749 to 1758 the governor of the colony admiralty was Mirabeau as a result of the assistance of a council, but there were no representatives directly chosen by the people. In the latter year the first representative assembly was convened in Halifax. By the laws of that time Roman Catholics were disqualified from holding seats in the legislature.
In 1756 began the famous Seven Years’ War; two years later the final capture of Louisbourg, under General Amherst, took place. The siege lasted for seven weeks and at last the French governor was obliged to surrender unconditionally. By the Treaty of Paris (1763) France ceded Cape Breton, Prince Edward Island, and Canada to Great Britain, and the long duel in North America between the two great European powers came at last to an end. Cape Breton and Prince Edward Island became a part of Nova Scotia; but in 1770 Prince Edward Island severed its political connection, as in 1784 did Cape Breton and New Brunswick. Cape Breton was reannexed to Nova Scotia in 1819. During the Revolutionary War Nova Scotia remained loyal to Britain. Many people in the United States who did not approve of the war migrated to the British provinces. These were known as United Empire Loyalists. In the province to which they removed they received free grants of land and they formed a valuable accession to the scant popula-

At the first session of the Legislature of Nova Scotia
a law was passed requiring all Catholic priests to leave the country, and any person who harboured a priest was liable to payment of a large fine. These laws were subsequently repealed. In 1827 a Catholic was permitted, for the first time, to take his seat as a member of the Assembly. While Nova Scotia had an executive government as early as 1758, the executive was not in any way responsible to the people;
affairs were so administered for about seventy years.
Then arose a strong agitation under the brilliant leadership of Joseph Howe. After several years of discussion and negotiation, in 1848, responsible government was secured and thereafter the tenure of office of the government was made to depend upon the support of the people in the Assembly. The next twenty years were years of continued prog-steam communication was established with England; railways were built; and a revival of trade took place. In 1867 the Provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec, and Ontario were confederated as the Dominion of Canada, under the provision of the British North America Act. The legislative functions of the Dominion and of the provinces were separated, and subjected to local concern were assigned to the several provinces. Among the latter may be mentioned education and municipal institutions, solemnizing of marriage, and property and civil rights.

Among the powers assigned to the Dominion are the postal service, census and statistics, military and naval service and defence, navigation, banking, copyrights, marriage and divorce, and the regulations in

IV. CHURCH AND STATE.—The relations between Church and State do not give rise to much complaint.
There is no state religion, and all religious denominations are placed on an equality by the law. The school system is denominational. The Catholics have no separate schools, but in centres of population where they are numerous and in country districts where they predominate, they are permitted by usage to have trachers of their own belief. There is perfect freedom of worship in every respect.
V. DIVISION INTO DIOCESES, POPULATION, ETC.—

The Province of Nova Scotia is divided into two diocees: the Archdiocese of Halifax, which included for many years the westernmost counties of the province; and the Diocese of Antigonish, which embraces the four counties on Cape Breton Island, and the Counties of Guysborough, Pictou, and Antigonish on the peninsula.

According to the last official census there were 54,301 Catholics in the Archdiocese of Halifax, and 75,277 in the Diocese of Antigonish. By chapter 31 of the Acts of the Legislature of Nova Scotia for the year 1849,
the Roman Catholic Bishop of Halifax and his successors were incorporated under the name of "the Roman Catholic Episcopalian Corporation of the City and County of Halifax" with perpetual succession, and power to hold, receive and enjoy real and personal estate. In 1888, by chapter 102 of the Acts of that year, s. 4, it was provided as follows:—"The Corporation is subject to be divested of the possession and enjoyment of all property and the proceeds thereof, or in any other manner for the time being recognized by law within Nova Scotia and may have, hold, possess and enjoy the same for the general uses and purposes established, ecclesiastical or educational of the Archdiocese or of any portion thereof or for any such uses or purposes and may sell, alien, exchange, assign, release mortgage, lease, convey or otherwise dispose of such lands or any part thereof for such uses and purposes or any of them in the manner hereinafter provided". This statute also provides that all Church property, real and personal, shall be vested in the corporation and used as the property of the Romans Catholic Church within the archdiocese for ecclesiastical, educational and other purposes.
The corporation executes a deed by its corporate seal and the signature of the archbishop, his coadjutor or vicar-general, and one of its resident members of the archdiocese. The Diocese of Antigonish was formerly known as the Diocese of Arichat; by chapter 60 of the Acts of the Legislature of Nova Scotia for 1857 the name was changed from Arichat to Antigonish. The Roman Catholic Episcopal Corporation of Antigonish was created by chapter 74 of the Acts of the Legislature of Nova Scotia (1854), and the legislative provisions with respect to this corporation are substantially the same as those relating to the Romans Catholic Episcopal Corporation of Halifax.

VI. TAXATION AND EXEMPTION OF CHURCHES, and Religious Corporations (R.S.N.S., 1900, c. 73, sec-4, 88. (b)) exempt from taxation every church and place of worship and the land used in connexion therewith, and every church and burial ground. The same statute also exempts the real estate of every college, academy, or institution of learning and every schoolhouse. The statute mentioned applies to all property in Nova Scotia outside of the city of Halifax. Property within the city of Halifax is dealt with by the Halifax City Charter, S. 216, which exempts every building used as a college, incorporated academy, schoolhouse, or other seminary of learning, and every building used for public worship and the site, appur-tenance, and furniture of such. This charter also exempts every poorhouse, almshouse, orphans' home, house of industry, house of refuge, and infants' home, while used for the purposes indicated by their respective designations, and all their real and personal property.

VII. EXEMPTION OF THE CLERGY FROM PUBLIC SERVICES.—There are no obnoxious public duties required to be performed by clergymen. The Juries' Act (R. S. N. S., 1900, c. 162, s. 5) exempts from serving on juries "clergymen and ministers of the Gospel". The Militia Act (R. S. c. 41, s. 11) provides that the clergy and ministers of all religious denominations, professors in colleges and universities, and teachers in religious orders shall be exempt from liability to serve in the militia.

VIII. PRISONS AND REFORMATORIES.—These are maintained by the State and are non-denominational.
The clergy are permitted to minister to the spiritual wants of the people of their own faith. At Halifax there are two reformatories conducted under Catholic auspices, namely, St. Patrick's Home for Boys, and the Good Shepherd Reformatory for women. Under the provisions of the Act relating to prisoners and reformatories (R. S. C., c. 148), whenever a boy, who is a Catholic and under eighteen years, is convicted in Nova Scotia for an offence for which he is liable to imprisonment, the presiding justice may sentence such boy to be detained in St. Patrick's Home for a term not exceeding five years and not less than one year.
The statute provides also that boys so detained shall be educated and taught the necessary trades. This home is subsidized from the public funds and is open at all time to public inspection. It is under the direction of the Christian Brothers. The statute provides also that juvenile offenders and vagrants may be sent to this reformatory. Similar provision is made in the case of a girl, being a Catholic and above the age of sixten years, convicted of an offence punishable by imprisonment in the city prison or common jail for a term of two months or longer. She may be sentenced to the Good Shepherd Reformatory at Halifax, for an extended or substituted imprisonment subject to conditions: (a) if she is under the age of twenty-one, such extended imprisonment may be until she attains the age of twenty-one, or for any shorter or longer term not less than two and not more than four years; (b) if she is of the age of twenty-one or upwards, such extended imprisonment may be for an term not less than one year and not more than two years. Catholic girls under the age of sixteen may be sentenced in the same way to the Good Shepherd Industrial Refuge at Halifax, where the sisters are in charge and are obliged to instruct them in reading and writing and writing. and arithmetic to the end of simple proportion, and also to teach them a trade or occupation suitable to t heir capabilities. The Good Shepherd Reformatory receives assistance from the public funds and is subject to inspection by a government official.

IX. WILLS AND CHARITABLE BEQUESTS.—Every person of the age of twenty-one years and upwards may dispose of his property by will. Such will must be signed by the testator in the presence of two witnesses who shall subscribe thereto as witnesses in his presence and in the presence of each other. By statute (R. S. N. S., 1900, c. 133) a devise of real or personal property to any religious or charitable organization, or any incorporated institution of learning is valid and effectual for the purpose of vesting the property in such body, notwithstanding that it was not by its act of incorporation empowered to take or hold real or personal property not notwithstanding any limitation in such act as to the amount of real or personal property the incorporated body was empowered to take or hold—provided such shall not extend to render valid or effectual any devise or bequest that is to be void for another reason.

X. CEMETORIES.—By statute (R. S. N. S., 1900,
c. 132) it is provided that a company of not less than ten, may form themselves into a company for the purpose of establishing a public cemetery. Catholic cemeteries, however, are owned by the Episcopal Corporation of the diocese. Cemeteries are exempt from taxation and the lots or plots owned by individual proprietors cannot be seized or taken on execution.

XI. MARRIAGE LAWS.—By the provisions of the British North America Act, the subject of marriage and divorce is assigned to the Dominion Parliament, and that of the solemnization of marriage to the legislature of the province. The former body, under this distribution, deals with the capacity to contract marriage, and it is provided that under such power it has enacted (R. S. C., c. 105) that "a marriage is not invalid merely because the woman is a sister of a deceased wife of the man, or a daughter of a deceased wife of the man". The provincial statute (R.S.N.S., 1900,
c. 111) deals with the mode of solemnizing a marriage within the province. It provides that every marriage shall be solemnized by a minister of a church or religious denomination, being a man and resident in Canada, who is recognized as duly ordained according to the rites and ceremonies of the church or denomination to which he belongs. Persons belonging to the society known as the Salvation Army may be married by any duly appointed male commissioner or staff officer of the society. No person shall officiate at the solemnisation of any marriage unless publication has been made of the banns of the marriage or a licence has been obtained for the solemnisation of the marriage by the parties. The banns shall be published in any church at the place in which one of the parties resides by the officiating clergyman in an audible voice during the time of Divine service, and if there is more than one public service in the church on any Sunday, such publication shall be made at three several services held on two or more Sundays; otherwise the publication may be at two services on two Sundays. Every marriage shall be solemnised in the presence of two witnesses. After the solemnisation of the marriage the clergyman solemnising the same shall make out a certificate containing the date of the marriage, the place thereof, the date of the publication of the banns, the church in which and the clergyman by whom the banns were published, the names of the witnesses and his own name, and the religious denomination to which he belongs. The marriage register giving the above particulars, and also the names, ages, residences, etc., of the parties and their parents shall also be filled up. Returns in the prescribed form shall be made by the clergyman to the nearest issuer of marriage licences within ten days after the solemnisation. Forms for that purpose are furnished by the issuer of marriage licences. Large penalties are provided for solemnising marriage without banns of marriage or licence, for refusing or delivering the banns for the same reason under an illegal licence, and for failing to return the marriage register.

XII. Divorce.—In Nova Scotia there is a court for divorce and matrimonial causes, and it has jurisdiction over all matters relating to prohibited marriages and divorce, and may declare any marriage null and void for impotence, adultery, cruelty, or kindred within the degrees prohibited by the Act made in the thirty-second year of King Henry the Eighth, entitled "An Act concerning pre-contracts, and touching degrees of Consanguinity"; and whenever a sentence of divorce shall be given, the court may pronounce such determination as it shall think fit on the rights of the parties or either of them to custody or dower. In the provinces of the dominion in which no divorce courts exist, applications for divorce are made to Parliament, and the Pope is not considered by the members of the Senate of Canada. In Nova Scotia there is an appeal from the decision of the judge of the Divorce Court to the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia sitting in banc. When the final decree is for the dissolution of the marriage, the statute enables either of the parties to marry again as if the prior marriage had been dissolved by death; but no clergyman shall be liable to any penalty for refusing to solemnise the marriage of either of the parties who have been divorced. In cases of divorce the wife and husband are not competent to testify, but in proceedings by the wife, on account of adultery coupled with cruelty, the husband and wife are competent and compellable to give evidence of or relating to such cruelty.

XIII. Religious Orders, Schools, etc.—Several of the public schools of the province are taught by members of the religious orders. In such cases the teachers must be licensed in the same way as other public teachers, and they are paid out of the public funds. Besides the public schools there are many excellent private schools taught by members of religious orders. These do not receive any assistance from the public treasury. The public schools are maintained by a grant from the government and by the local rates levied upon the property holders of the section or municipality. They are otherwise free and all children of school age are entitled to be admitted to them.
or improper: but there are severe expressions in the letters. It seems that Novatian got into some trouble during the persecution, since Cornelius says that St. Moses, the martyr (d. 250), seeing the boldness of Novatian, separated him from communion, together with the five priests who had been associated with him.

At the beginning of 251 the persecution relaxed, and St. Cornelius was elected pope in March, "when the chair of Fabian, that is the place of Peter, was vacant," with the consent of the bishop of Carthage, and of the bishops present (Cyprian, Ep. iv, 8-9). Some days later Novatian set himself up as a rival pope. Cornelius tells us Novatian suffered an extraordinary and sudden change; for he had taken a tremendous oath that he would never attempt to become bishop. But now he sent two of his party to summon three bishops from a distant corner of Italy, telling them they must come to Rome in haste, in order that a division might be healed by their mediation and that of other bishops. These simple men were constrained to confer the episcopal order upon him at the tenth hour of the day as of these returned from the church bewailing and confessing his sin, "and we despatched" says Cornelius, "successors of the other two bishops to the places whence they came, after warning them." To ensure the loyalty of his supporters Novatian forced the Vatican and the bishop of Carthage, who was in communion, to swear by the Blood and the Body of Christ that they would not go over to Cornelius. Cornelius and Novatian sent messengers to the different churches to announce their respective claims.

From St. Cyprian's correspondence we know of the careful investigation made by the Council of Carthage, with the result that Cornelius was supported by the whole African episcopate. St. Dionysius of Alexandria also took his side, and these influential adhesions soon made his position secure. But for a time the whole Church was torn by the question of the rival popes. We have few details: for he had written that Novatian "assumed the primacy" (Ep. ixi, 8), and sent out his new apostles to many cities to set new foundations for his new establishment; and, though there were already in all provinces and cities bishops of venerable age, of pure faith, of tried virtue, who had been proscribed in the persecution, he dared to create other false bishops over their heads (Ep. iv, 24) thus claiming the right of substituting bishops by his own authority as Cornelius did in the case just mentioned. There could be no more startling proof of the importance of the Roman See than this sudden revelation of an episode of the third century: the whole Church convulsed by the claim of an antipope; the recognised impossibility of a bishop being a Catholic and legitimate pastor if he is on the side of the wrong pope; the uncontested claim of both rivals to consecrate a new bishop in any place (at all events, in the West) where the existing bishop resisted their authority. Later, in the same way, in a letter to Pope Stephen, St. Cyprian urges him to appoint (so he seems to imply) a new bishop at Arles, where the bishop had become a Novatianist. St. Dionysius of Alexandria wrote to Pope Stephen that all the Churches in the East and beyond, which had been split in two, were now united, and that all their presbyters were now rejoicing exceedingly in this unexpected peace—Antioch, Caesarea of Palestine, Jerusalem, Tyre, Laodicea of Syria, Tarsus and all the Churches of Cilicia, Caesarea and all Cappadocia, the Syriac and Arabia (which were depopulated by the Roman Church), Mesopotamia, Pontus and Bithynia, "and all the Churches everywhere", so far did the Roman schism cause its effects to be felt. Meanwhile, before the end of 251, Cornelius had assembled a council of sixty bishops (probably all from Italy or the neighbouring islands), in which Novatian was enominated. Other bishops who were not present added their signature, and the entire list was sent to Antioch and doubtless to all the other principal Churches.

It is not surprising that a man of such talents as Novatian should have been conscious of his superiority to Cornelius, or that he should have found priests to assist his ambitious views. His main attack was in the confessors yet in prison, Maximus, Urbanus, Niconostatus, and others. Dionysius and Cyprian wrote to remonstrate with them, and they returned to the Church. A prime mover on Novatian's side was the Carthaginian priest Novatus, who had favoured laxity at Carthage out of opposition to his bishop. In St. Cyprian's earlier letters about Novatian (xlv-xlviii, i), there is not a word about any heresy, the whole question being as to the legitimacy of the name of Peter. In Ep. lii, the words "sacramentum immo hereticum furare" refer to the wickedness of opposing the true bishop. The same is true of "heretica pravitas nocens factio" with Ep. lii. In Ep. lv, Cyprian found it necessary to send his book "De lapsis" to Rome, so that the question of the lapsed was already prominent, but Ep. iv is the earliest in which the "Novatian heresy" is such as is argued against. The letters of the Roman confessors (Ep. liii) and Cornelius (xlix, l) to Cyprian do not mention it, though the latter speaks in general terms of Novatian as a heretic or as a heretic; nor does the pope mention it in his letter to Novatus in the letter of Antioch (Eusebius, VI, xiii), from which so much has been quoted above. It is equally clear that the letters sent out by Novatian were not concerned with the lapsus, but were "letters full of calumnies and judgements sent in large numbers, which threw nearly all the Churches into disorder" (Cornelius, Ep. xlix). The first of those sent to Carthage consisted apparently of "bitter accusations against Cornelius" (St. Cyprian thought it so disgraceful that he did not read it to the council (Ep. xiv, 2). The messengers from Rome to the Carthaginian Council broke out into similar attacks (Ep. xlvii). It is uncertain in this point, because it is so frequently overlooked by historians, who represent the sudden but short-lived disturbance throughout the Catholic Church caused by Novatian's ordination to have been a division between bishops on the subject of his heresy. Yet it is obvious enough that the question could not present itself: "Which is preferable, the doctrine of Cornelius or that of Novatian?" If Novatian were ever so ordained, to examine whether this ordination was legitimate or not, and whether his accusations against Cornelius were false or true. An admirable reply addressed to him by St. Dionysius of Alexandria has been preserved (Eusebius, VI, xiv): "Dionysius to his brother Novatian, greeting. If it was against your will, as you say, that you were led, you will prove it by retiring of your free will. For you ought to have suffered anything rather than divide the Church of God; and to be martyred rather than cause a schism would have been no less glorious than to be martyred rather than commit idolatry, nay in my opinion it would have been a yet greater act; for in the one case one is a martyr for one's own soul alone, in the other for the whole Church". Here again there is no question of heresy.

But yet within a couple of months Novatian was called a heretic, not only by Cyprian but throughout the Church, for his severe views about the restoration of those who had lapsed in the persecution. He held that idolatry was an unpardonable sin, and that the Church had no right to forgive those who had fallen into it. They might repent and be admitted to a lifelong penance, but their forgiveness must be left to God; it could not be pronounced in this world. Such harsh sentiments were not altogether a novelty. Tertullian had resisted the forgiveness of adultery by Pope Callistus as an innovation. Hippolytus was equally inclined to severity. In var-ous places and at various times laws were made which punished certain sinners, either with the denying of Communion till the hour of death, or even with refusal of Communion in the hour of death. Even St. Cyprian approved the latter course in the case of those who refused to do penance and only repented on their death-bed; but this was because such a repentance seemed of doubtful sincerity. But severity in itself was but cruelty or injustice; there was no heresy until it was denied that the Church has the power to grant absolution in certain cases. This was Novatian's heresy; and St. Cyprian says the Novatians held no longer the Catholic creed and baptismal interrogation, for when they said "Dost thou believe in the remission of sins, and everlasting life, through Holy Church?" they were liars.

Writings.—St. Jerome mentions a number of writings of Novatian, only two of which have come down to us, the "De Cibis Judaicis" and the "De Trinitate". The former is a letter written in retirement during a time of persecution, and was preceded by two other letters on Circumcision and the Sabbath, which are lost. It interprets the unclean animals as signifying different classes of vicious men; and explains that the greater liberty allowed to Christians is not to be a motive for luxury. The book "De Trinitate" is a fine piece of writing. The first eight chapters concern the transcendence and greatness of God, who is above all thought and can be described by no name. Novatian goes on to prove the Divinity of the Son at great length, arguing from both the Old and the New Testament, and adding that it is an insult to the Father to say that a Father who is God cannot beget a Son who is God. But Novatian falls into the error made by so many early writers of separating the Father from the Son, so that he makes the Father address to the Son the command to create, and the Son obeys; he identifies the Son with the angels who appeared in the Old Testament to Agar, Abraham, etc. It pertains to the person of Christ that he should be God because he is the Son of God, and that He should be an Angel because He announces the Father's Will" ("paterna dispositionis annuntiatio est"). The Son is the second Person after the Father", less than the Father in that he is originated by the Father; He is the imitator of all His works, and is always obedient to the Father, and is one with Him "by concord, by love, and by affection".

No wonder such a description should seem to opponents to make God threefold; and consequently, after a chapter on the Holy Ghost (xxix), Novatian returns to the subject in a kind of appendix (xxx-xxx). Two kinds of heretics, he explains, try to guard the unity of God, the one kind (Sabellians) by identifying the Son with the Father, the other (Ebonites, etc.) by denying that the Son is God; thus is Christ again crucified between two thieves, and is reviled by both. Novatian declares that there is indeed but one God, unbegotten, invisible, immense, immortal; the Word (Sermo), His Son, is a substance that proceeds from Him (substantia prolatas), whose generation no apostle nor angel nor any creature can declare. He is not a second God, because He is eternally in the Father, else the Father would not be eternally Father. He proceeded from the Father, when the Father willed (this "syntovatais" for the purpose of creation is evidently distinguished from the eternal begetting to the Father), and remained with the Father. If He were also the unbegotten, invisible, incomprehensible, there might indeed be said to be two Gods; but in fact He has from the Father, and is of the Father, but one origin (origo, principium), the Father. "One God is demonstrated, the true and eternal Father, from whom alone this energy of the Godhead is sent forth, being handed on to the Son, and again by communion of substance it is returned to the Father." In this doctrine there is much that is incorrect, yet much that seems meant to express the constabulastica of the Son, or at least its transference out of the substance of the Father. But it is a very unsatisfactory unity which is attained, and it seems to be suggested that the Son is not immense or invisible, but the image of the Father capable of manifesting Him. Hippolytus is in the same difficulty, and it appears that Novatian borrowed from him as well as from "Tertullian and Justin. It would seem that Tertullian and Hippolytus understood somewhat better than did Novatian the traditional distinction between the essence of the Son and that of the Father, and that only three were led astray by their acquaintance with the Greek theology, which interpreted of the Son as God Scriptural expressions (especially those of St. Paul) which properly apply to Him as the God-Man. But at least Novatian has the merit of not identifying the Word with the Father, nor Sonship with the prolation of the Word for the purpose of Creation, for he plainly teaches the eternal generation. This is a notable advance on Tertullian.

On the Incarnation Novatian seems to have been orthodox, though he is not explicit. He speaks correctly of the one Person having two substances, the Godhead and Humanity, in the way that is habitual to the most exact Western theologians. But he very often speaks of "the man" assumed by the Divine Person, so that he has been suspected of Nestorianism. This is an opposite attack to that which is now making the "man" so far from being a distinct personality that He is merely flesh assumed ("caro, or substantia carnis et corporis"). But there is no real ground for supposing him to have meant to deny an intellectual soul in Christ; he does not think of the point, and is only anxious to assert the reality of our Lord's flesh. The Son of God, he says, joins to Himself the Son of Man, and by this connexion and mingling he makes the Son of Man become Son of God, which He was not by nature. This last sentence has been described as Adoptionism. But the Spanish Adoptionists taught that the Human Nature of Christ as joined to the Godhead is the adopted Son of God. Novatian only means that before its assumption it was not by nature the Son of God; the form of words is bad, but there is not necessarily any heresy in the thought. Newman, though he does not make the best of Novatian, says that he "approaches more nearly to doctrinal precision than any of the writers of the East and West" who preceded him (Tractate theological and ecclesiastical, p. 230).

The two pseudo-Cyprianic works, both by one author, "De Spectatulis" and "De bono pudicitiae", are attributed to Novatian by Weyman, followed by Demmler, Bardenhewer, Harnack, and others. The pseudo-Cyprianic "De laude martyr" has been ascribed to Novatian by Harnack, but with less probability. The pseudo-Cyprianic sermon, "Adversus Judaeos", is by a close friend or follower of Novatian, not by himself, according to Landgraf, followed by Harnack and Jordan. In 1900 Mr Batifoll with the help of Dom A. Wilmart published, under the title of "Tractatus Origines de libris SS. Scripturarum" twenty sermons which he had discovered in two MSS. at Orleans and St. Omer. Weyman, Hauseleiter, and Zahn perceived that these curious homilies on the Old Testament were written in Latin and the pseudo-Cyprianic "De laude martyr" was written in Greek. They attributed them to Novatian with so much confidence that a disciple of Zahn's. H. Jordan, has written a book on the theology of Novatian, grounded principally on these sermons. It was, however, not the case that this former was more developed and later character than that of Novatian. Funk showed that the mention of competentes (candidates for baptism) implies the fourth century. Dom Morin succeeded to the Son, and again by communion of substance it is returned to the Father." In this doctrine there is much that is incorrect, yet much Novatus's translation of Origen on Genesis. But these resemblances must be resolved in the sense that the "Tractatus" are the originals for finally Dom Wilmart showed that Gregory of Elvira is their true author, by a comparison especially with the five homilies of Gregory on the Canticule of Canticles (in Heine's "Bibliotheke Aeneotorum," Leipzig, 1844). The following extract from a letter of Wilmart to Dom Harnack, dated 9th September, 1894, will show how true these statements are.

"The fathers of Novatus named themselves sacerdos, or Puritans, and affected to call the Catholic Church the Apostolistic, Synodical, or Capitolinum. They were found in every province, and in some places were very numerous. Our information about them is from the "History" of Socrates, who is very favourable to them, and tells us much about their bishop, especially those of Constantine. The chief works written against them are those of St. Cyril, the anonymous "Ad Novatianum," (attributed by Harnack to Sixtus II, 257-8), writings of St. Pachom of Barcelona and St. Ambrose (De simplicitate), "Contra Novatianum," a work of the fourth century among the works of St. Augustine, the "Heresies" of Epiphanius and Philastrius, and the "Questiones" of Ambrose. In the East they are mentioned especially as Athanasius, Basil, Gregory of Nazianzos, Chrysostom. Eulogius of Alexandria, not long before 600, wrote six books against them. Refutations by Rutilius of Autun and Eusebius of Mena are lost.

Novatian had refused abolution to idolaters; his followers extended this doctrine to all "mortal sins" (idolatry, murder, and adultery, or fornication). Most of them forbade second marriage, and they made much use of Tertullian's works; indeed, in Phrygia they were associated with the Montanists. A few of them did not rebaptize converts from other persuasions. Theodoret says that they did not use confirmation (which Novatian himself had never received). Eulogius of Alexandria, who most of all attacked and reviled the Montanists, did not rebaptize them, and went on to be consecrated bishop. His pool of converts was small, he was content with fewer. They were all scattered in the provinces, and were not recognized by the Church as a party. They reformed the Church in almost everything, including monasticism in the fourth century. Their bishop at Constantinople was invited by Constantine to the Council of Nicæa. He was appointed the bishop, though he would not consent to union. On account of the homoeouion the Novatians were persecuted like the Catholics by Constantius. In Alexandria the Novatians were by the people called the "Arian," and were accused by the emperor to conform to the official arianism. Constantinople the Great, who at first treated them as heretics, not heretics, later ordered the closing of their churches and cemeteries. After the death of Constantius they were protected by Julian, but the Arian Valens persecuted them once more. Honorius included them in a law against heretics in 412, St. Innocent I closed some of their churches in Rome. St. Celestine expelled them from Rome, as St. Cyril had from Alexandria. Earlier St. Chrysostom had shut up their churches at Ephesus, but at Constantinople they were tolerated, and their bishops were called by Socrates to have been highly respected. The work of Eulogius shows that there were still Novatians in Alexandria about 600. In Phrygia (about 374) some of them became autokrites. Novatianism was called Protopenismin; they included some converted Jews. Theodotus made a stringent law against this sect, which was imported to Constantinople about 391 by a certain Sabasius, who adhered to Novatianism.

John Chapman.

Novatian, Saint, who is mentioned on 20 June with his brother, the martyr Timotheus, was the son of St. Judas and Claudia Rufina, and the brother of St. Pudentiana and Praxedes. His paternal grandfather was Quintus Cornelius Pudens, the Roman senator, who with his wife, Priscilla, was among St. Peter's earliest converts in Rome and in whose house the Apostle dwelt while in that city. A position of the superstructure of the modern church of St. Pudentiana (Via Urbana) is thought to be part of the senatorial palace or of the baths built by Novatian.

Novena (from novem, nine), a nine days' private or public devotion in the Catholic Church to obtain special graces. The octave has more of the festal character; to the novena belong the petitions in the Act of Grace, the prayers of the Church, the prayers of prayer. "The number nine in Holy Writ is indicative of suffering and grief" (St. Jerome, in Ezech., vii, 24;—P. L., XXV, 238, cf. St. John, xii, 52). The novena remains today recommended by ecclesiastical authority, but still has no proper and fully set place in the liturgy of the Church. It has, however, more and more been prized and utilized by the faithful. Four kinds of novenas can be distinguished: novenas of mortifying, of preparation, of prayer, and the indulged novenas, though this distinction is not exclusive.

The Jews had nine days' religious celebration or nine days mourning or feast on the ninth day after the death or burial of relatives and friends. They held the number seven more sacred than any other. On the contrary, we find among the ancient Romans that the official nine days' religious observance was called Propitiation. The number nine is related in Livy (I, xxxi). After a shower of flowers on the Alban Mount, an official sacrifice, whether because of a warning from above or of the augurs' advice, was held on nine days, with the avow evil. From then on the same novena of sacrifices was made whenever the like wonder was announced (cf. Livy, XXI, ixi; XXVI, vii, xxvi, xxxiii etc.).

Besides this custom, there also existed among the
How that of a nine days' mourning, with a special feast on the ninth day after death or burial. This, however, was rather of a private or family character (cf. Homer, Iliad, XXIV, 664, 784; Virgil, Aeneid, V, 64; Tertullian, apud Eusebius, 12:2). The Romans also celebrated their own saintly deceased, a yearly novena (13 to 22 Feb.) for the commemoration of all the departed ones of their families (cf. Mommers, "Corpus Inscriptionum Latinarum," I, 188 sq.). The celebration ended on the ninth day with a sacrifice and a joyful banquet. There is a reference to these customs in the laws of the Emperor Justinian ("Corpus Juris Civilis Justiniani," II, 1757, 976, tit. xix, "De sepulchro et votis"). The relatives of the deceased are forbidden to trouble the heirs of their debtor for nine days after his death. St. Augustine (P. L., XXXIV, 596) warns Christians not to imitate the pagan custom, as there is no example of it in Holy Writ. Later on, the same was done by the Pseudo-Alexinus (P. L., CL, 1278), invoking the authority of St. Augustine, and still more sharply by John Beleth (P. L., CCL, 190) in the twelfth century. Even Durandus in his "Rationale" (Naples, 1478), writing on the Office of the Dead, remarks that "some did not approve this, to avoid the appearance of aping pagan customs".

Nonetheless, in Christian mortuary celebrations, one finds that of the ninth day with those of the third and seventh. The "Constitutiones Apostolicæ" (VIII, xiii; P. G., 1, 1147) already speak of it. The custom existed specially in the East, but is found in the Franks and Anglo-Saxons. Even if it was connected with an earlier practice of the pagans, it nevertheless had in itself no vestige of superstition. A nine days' mourning with daily Mass was a distinction, naturally, which could be shared by none but the higher classes. Princes and the rich ordered such a celebration for themselves in their wills; even in the wills of cardinals and cardinals such orders are found. Already in the Middle Ages the novelty of Masses for popes and cardinals was customary. Later on, the mortuary celebration for cardinals became constantly more simple, until finally it was regulated and fixed by the Constitution "Præcipienti" of Benedict XIV (25 Nov., 1741). For deceased sovereigns pontiffs the nine days' mourning was retained, and so came to be called simply the "Pope's Novenas" (cf. Mahillon, "Glossarium Italicum," II, 1, 361; P. L., 1689, 559 sqq.; "Ordinum Roman. XV"); P. L., LXXXVIII, 1853; Const. "In eligendis" of Pius IV, 9 Oct., 1562). The usage still continues and consists chiefly in a novena of Masses for the departed. A rescript of the Sacred Congregation of Rites (22 Apr., 1903) imposes that such novenas of mourning, officia novendiale ex testamento, were generally known and allowed in the churches of religious (Decr. Auth. S. R. C., 604). They are no longer in common use, though they have never been forbidden, and indeed, on the contrary, novendiales precum et Missarum devotiones pro defunctis were approved by Gregory XVI (11 July, 1833) and indulgenced for a confirmandity at the convent of our Lady of Our Lady. And this usage, because of the people who took part in the celebration, was permitted to continue (28 Sept., 1658; Decr. Auth., 1063). A French Ordinarius (P. L., CXLVII, 123) prescribes that the preparation for Christmas on the ninth day should begin with the O antiphons and that each day, at the Magnificat, the altar and the choir should be inconsecrated. The Ordinarius of Nantes and the Antiphonary of St. Martin of Tours, in place of the seven common O antiphons, have nine for the nine days before Christmas, and those were sung with special solemnity (Martene, "De Antiq. Ecles. Ritibus," III, Venice, 1783, 30). In Italy the novena seems to have spread only in the seventeenth century. Still, the "Praxis ceremomianarum seu sacrorum Romanse Ecclesie Rituum accuril tractatio" of the Theatine Piscarasc Castaldo, a book approved in 1526 by the author's father general (Naples, 1645, p. 389 sqq.), gives complete directions for the celebration of the Christmas novena with Exposition of the Blessed Sacrament. The author remarks that this novena in commemoration of Our Lord's nine months in the womb was solemnly celebrated in very many places in Italy. And in the beginning of the eighteenth century the Christmas novena held such a distinguished place that in the Congregation of Propagation of the Faith (7 July, 1718), in a special case, allowed for it alone the solemn celebration with Exposition of the Blessed Sacrament (Decr. Auth., 2290).

But before this, at least in Italy, the custom had sprung up among religious of preparing for the feast of their founder with a novena of Masses, and these Missae novendiales votivas were also (2 Sept., 1690) declared permissible (Decr. Auth., 1843). In general, in the middle of the seventeenth century, numerous noblemen were held especially in the churches of religious and to the Saints of the various orders (cf. Prola, "De novendialibus supplicationibus", Rome, 1724, passim). Two hundred years later, on the occasion of the 300th anniversary of the Mass votivas novendiales B. M. V. (Decr. Auth., 3922 V, n. 3). At least in this way, then, the novena is recognised even in the Liturgy.

At the same time as the novena of preparation, the proper novena of prayer arose, among the faithful, it would seem, who in their need turned to the saints with a novena, especially to recover health. The original home of this novena must have been France, especially in the region of Languedoc and the South of the country. Specially noteworthy up to the year 1000 are the novenas to St. Hubert, St. Marcoul, St. Mommolus. St. Mommolus (or Mumolus) was considered the special patron for head and brain diseases: the novena to him were made especially in the Holy Cross Monastery of Bordeaux, where the saint was buried (Mahillon, "Acta Sacrorum O. B. S.", II, Venice, 1733, 645 sqq.; "Acta SS.", August, II, 351 sqq.; Du Cange, "Glossarium", s. v. "Novena"). St. Marcelou procured for the kings of France the power to cure scrofula by a touch of their hand. For this purpose, shortly after their coronation and anointing at Reims, the kings had to go in person on pilgrimage to the tomb of St. Marcoul at Corbeby and make a novena there. Those who were to be healed had to make a similar novena known as the novena to St. Hubert, which continues even to our day. This is made against madness by people bitten by a mad dog or wolf (Acta SS., November, I, 587 sqq.).

The last-named novena was attacked in later times, particularly by the Jansenists, who considered it superstitious (cf. "Acta SS.", loc. cit., where the attack is met and the novena justified). Before this, in the fourteenth century, it had given warning against the superstitious abuse of this novena. But he does not reject novenas in general and we see from his works that in his time they were already widespread (Opera, Paris, 1606, II, 328; II, 385, 389).

But notwithstanding Grenet’s warning, novenas were from that time on ever more and more in favour with the faithful, to which many, even miraculous, effects of the novenas contributed not a little. Benedict XIV (De canon., Sanct., lib. IV, p. 112; c. xii, n. 12) tells of a number of such miracles added in the processes of canonisation. Catholics know from their own experience that the novena is no pagan, superstitious custom, but one of the best means to obtain signal heavenly graces through the intercession of Our Lady and all the saints. The novena of prayer is thus a kind of prayer which includes in it, so to speak, a pledge of being heard, confidence and perseverance, two most important qualities of efficacious prayer. Even if the employment of the number nine in Christianity were connected with a similar use in paganism, the use would still in no way be blameable or at all superstitious. Not, of course, that every single variation or addition made in whatever private novena must be justified or defended. The holiest custom can be abused, but the use of the number nine cannot only be justified but even interpreted in the best sense.

The number ten is the highest, the numerus maximus, simply the most perfect, which is fitting for God; the number nine, which is the number of imperfection, which is fitting for mortal kind. In some such way the Pythagoreans, Philo the Jew, the Fathers of the Church, and the monks of the Middle Ages, philosophised on the meaning of the number nine. For this reason it was adapted for use when man’s imperfection turned in prayer to God (cf. Jerome, loc. cit.; Athenagoras, “Legat. pro Christianis,” P. G., VI, 992; Pseudo-Ambrosius, P. L., XCVI, 10 sqq., 381; Rabanus Maurus, P. L., CLX, 948 sq., CXI, 491; Angelomus Monach., In lib. Reg. IV, P. L., CXV, 346; Philo the Jew, “Lucturationes”, Basle, 1554, p. 283).

The first day of mourning and the Mass on the ninth day it was remembered in the Middle Ages that Christ gave up the ghost in prayer at the ninth hour, as in the penitential books (cf. Schmitz, “Die Bussbücher und die Bussübungen”, 1, 1896, 380, 534 at 673), or remarked that, by means of Holy Mass on the ninth day, the departed were to be raised to the ranks of the nine choirs of angels (cf. Beleth, loc. cit.; Durandus, loc. cit.). For the origin of the novena of prayer we go to the fact that the number nine was used in the Synagogue, like None in the Christian Church, was a special hour of prayer from the beginning, so that it was reckoned among the “apostolic hours” (cf. Acts, iii, 1; x, 30; Tertullian, “De ejusm.”, c. x, P. L., II, 966; cf. “De oratione”, c. xxv, 1133). The Church, too, in the Breviary, has for centuries invoked the Almighty in nine Psalms and honoured Him in nine Lessons, while from ancient times the Kyrie has been heard nine times in every Mass (cf. Durandus, “Rationale, De nona”; Bona, “Opera”, Venice, 1764; “De divina psalmodia”, p. 401).

As has been said, the simplest explanation of the Christmas novena are the nine months of Christ in the womb. But for every novena of preparation, as also for every novena of prayer, not only the best explanation but also the best model and example was given by Christ Himself to the Church in the first Pentecost novena. He Himself expressly exhorted the Apostles to make this preparation. And when the young Church had faithfully persevered for nine full days, the Holy Ghost came as the precious token of this first Christian novena for the feast of the establishment and foundation of the Church. If one keeps this mind and remembers besides that novenas in the course of time have brought so many, even miraculous, answers to prayer, and that finally Christ Himself in the revelation to Blessed Margaret Mary Alacoque recommended the special celebration of nine successive first Fridays of the month (cf. Vermeersch, “Pratique et doctrine de la dévotion au Sacré Cœur de Jésus”, Tournai, 1906, 555 sqq.), one must wonder that the Church waited so long before positively approving and recommending novenas rather than that she first took this step towards the collection of précis historiques”, Brussels, 1859, “Des neuvaines” 157 sqq.).

Not until the nineteenth century did the Church formally recommend novenas. The first book of Indulgences. This brings us to the last kind of novenas, those which are indulgenced. Apparently Alexander VII in the middle of the seventeenth century granted Indulgences to novenas in honour of St. Francis Xavier made in Lisbon (cf. Prola, loc. cit., p. 79). The first novena indulged in the city of Rome, and even there for only one church, was the novena in preparation for the feast of St. Joseph in the church of St. Ignatius. This was done by the Briefs of Clement XI, 10 Feb., and 4 March, 1713 (cf. Prola, loc. cit.; Benedict XIV, “De canonis.”, loc. cit.). The Franciscans, who used before this to have a novena for the feast of the Immaculate Conception (cf. Decr. Auth. S. R. C., 2472) received special Indulgences for it on 10 Apr., 1764 (Resc. Auth. S. C. Indulg., 215). Not until later, especially from the beginning of the nineteenth century, were novenas enriched with Indulgences in common for the whole Church. They number in all thirty-two, intended for the most part as novenas of preparation for definite feasts.

They are in detail as follows: one in honour of the Most Holy Trinity, which may be made either prior to the feast of the Holy Trinity (first Sunday after Pentecost) or at any other time of the year; two to the Holy Ghost, one to be made prior to the feast of Pentecost for the reconciliation of non-Catholics (this is also made publicly in all parochial churches), one at any time of the year; two novenas to the Infant Jesus, one to be made before the feast of Christmas and the other at any time during the year; three to the Sacred Heart, one prior to the feast of the Sacred Heart (the Friday after the octave of Corpus Christi), one at any time during the year, and the third that of the nine first Fridays, which is based on the promise made to Blessed Margaret Mary by the Sacred Heart assuring the grace of final perseverance and the reception of the Sacraments before death to all who should make the Holy Conception, the first Friday of every month for nine consecutive months; it is customary to offer this novena in preparation for the sins of all mankind; eleven novenas in honour of the Blessed Virgin, viz., in honour of the Immaculate Conception, the Nativity of Mary, her Presentation at the Temple, the Annunciation, the Visitation, the Maternity of Mary, her Purification, her Seven Dolours, the Assumption, the Holy Heart of Mary, and the Holy Rosary; one novena each in honour of the Archangels Michael, Gabriel, and Raphael, and one in honour of the Guardian Angel, two to St. Joseph, one consisting of the recitation of prayers in honour of the seven sorrows and seven joys of the foster-father of Christ, prior to the feast of St. Joseph (19 March) and one at any time during the year; one novena each in honour of St. Francis of Assisi, at any time during the year, St. Vincent de Paul, St. Paul of the Cross, St. Stanislas Kostka, prior to his feast (13 November), St. Francis Xavier, and one for the Holy Souls.

The novena in honour of St. Francis Xavier, known as the “Novena of Grace”, originated as follows: in 1833 Father Mastrilli, S.J., was at the point of death as the result of an accident, when St. Francis Xavier to whom he had great devotion, appeared to him and urged him to devote himself to the missions of the Indies. Father Mastrilli then made a vow before his provincial that he would go to the Indies if God spared his life, and in another apparition (3 Jan., 1634) St. Francis Xavier exorted him of a renewal of this promise, foretold his martyrdom, and restored him to health so completely that on that same night Father Mastrilli was in a condition to write an account of his cure. The next morning, he celebrated Mass on the altar of the saint and to resume his community life. He soon set out for the Japanese missions where he was martyred, 17 October, 1637. The renown of the missionary spread throughout Italy, and inspired with confidence in the power and goodness of St. Francis Xavier, the faithful implored his assistance in a novena with such success that it came to be called the "novena of grace". This novena is now made publicly in many countries from 4 to 12 March, the latter being the date of the canonization of St. Francis Xavier together with St. Ignatius. The conditions include a visit to a Jesuit church or chapel. The indulgence may be gained on any day of the novena, and those who are prevented by illness or another legitimate cause from communicating during the novena may gain the indulgence by doing so as soon as possible. All of these novenas without exceptions are to be made, in private or in public, with pious exercises and the reception of the Sacraments, and for those usually a daily partial Indulgence can be gained and a plenary Indulgence at the end of the novena. The Indulgences and the conditions obtaining are accurately given in detail in the authentic "Raccolta" and in the works on Indulgences by Reningo and Hilgers, which have appeared in modern languages. The novena, in a certain extent official, have but contributed to increase the confidence of the faithful in novenas. Hence, even the private novenas of prayer flourish in our day. Through the novena to Our Lady of Lourdes, through that to St. Anthony of Padua or some other saint, the faithful seek and find help and relief. The history of novenas is not yet written, but it is doubtless a good part of the history of childlike veneration of Our Lady and all the saints, of lively confidence in God, and especially of the spirit of prayer in the Catholic Church.

Novice.—I. Definition and Requirements.—The word novice, which among the Romans meant a newly acquired slave, and which is now used to denote an inexperienced person, is derived from the canonical Latin name of those who, having been regularly admitted into a religious order and ordinarily already confirmed in their vocation by a certain period of probation as postulants, are prepared by a series of exercises and tests for the religious profession. In Greek, the novice was called ἀρρεφός, a beginner. The religious life, recommended by Jesus Christ is encouraged by the Church and any person is allowed to become a novice who is not prevented by some positive legal impediment. No minimum or maximum age is fixed by canon law for admission into the novitiate. Those, however, who have not arrived at puberty cannot enter without the consent of their parents or guardians; and canon law ("Si quis", 1; "De regularibus", 111, 31) grants to parents one year to compel the return of a child who has entered without their consent. As the Council of Trent fixed at sixteen the earliest age for the profession which follows the novitiate, we may conclude that the novice must have completed his fifteenth year if the religious order requires one year of novitiate; or, his fourteenth if the two years are required, and this opinion is confirmed in respect to Regulars, properly so-called, by the decree of the Sacred Congregation of Religious dated 16 May, 1675, and for none by that of the Sacred Congregation of Bishops and Regulars dated 28 May, 1689. According to the rules of procedure, published by the latter congregation, 26 June, 1901, no person may be admitted into a new congregation under the age of fifteen years without special permission of the Holy See. The constitution of Clement VIII, "Cum ad Regularum", of 19 March, 1603, requires the age of nineteen full years for the reception of lay-brothers, but this constitution has not been celebrated in its full effect. Canon law distinctly gives to clerics the right to enter religion (cf. Clerici, unici, c. XIX, 11; Alienum, 1. codem, q. 2; Benedict XIV, C. "Ex quo ducuntur", 14 January, 1747; the recent constitution of Bishops and Regulars of 20 December, 1859; Nilles, "De libertate clericorum religionem ingressi"). Even those who have obtained a bursae for study, or who have been maintained at the expense of the seminary retain this right, although it is admitted that the founder of a bursa, or the donor of money for educational purposes may impose certain reasonable conditions for the use of his gifts, and may stipulate for instance that the cleric shall undertake to serve the diocese for a certain number of years, or not to enter into religion without the consent of the Holy See. Although the consent of the bishop is not canonically required, the cleric is recommended to inform the bishop of his intention to enter a religious order, and a similar notification is required of any cleric or priest occupying any office or benefice. The bishop in fact must be in a position to fill the vacancy. For the entry into religion of a cleric, bishop consecrated on his ordination by the Holy See, the consent of the pope is required. This does not apply to a bishop who has lawfully resigned his see, but some authors consider that it does apply to titular bishops. However general may be the freedom to enter a religious order, no person is allowed to do this to the detriment of another's right. Thus a married man, at least after the consummation of marriage, cannot enter into religion, unless his wife has by her misconduct given him the right to refuse cohabitation forever, or unless she consents to his entrance, and agrees to make a vow of chastity or to enter into religion herself, in conformity with canonical rules. The liberty of a married woman is similarly limited ("Preterea", 1; "Cum vis", 4; "Ad Apostolam", 13; "Significavit", 18; "De conversione conjugatorum", 111, 32). Parents may not enter into religion without making suitable provision for the education and future of their children; nor children who are under the obligation of maintaining their parents, if their religious profession would prevent them from providing their parents with due and grave necessity. Debtors also are forbidden, at least those who may be expected to be able to pay their debts within a reasonable time (this is a disputed point but we give the most commonly accepted opinion, which is that of St. Alphonsus, "Moral Theology", bk. IV, 5, n. 71). Moreover, a positive order of Sixtus V (Cum de omnibus, 1857), modified to a certain extent by Clement VIII (In Suprema, 1602), forbids the profession of persons involved in debts by their own fault. Canon law also excludes persons branded with infamy and those connected with any criminal proceeding, also those under an obligation to render accounts of a complicated nature. (C. Clement VIII. "In Suprema", 1602.) An illegitimate child is not necessarily excluded, but he cannot be received into any order in which his father is professed (C. Gregory XIV. "Circumscripta", 15 March, 1591).

The canonical regulations spoken of above, concern those religious orders in which solemn vows are taken. Religious congregations are governed generally by the natural law and their own approved constitutions. According to the "Norma" (Regulations) of 1901, the Holy See imposes the following disallowances, and reserving to itself the right of dispensation: illegitimacy, not removed by legitimation; age, below fifteen at above thirty years; vows binding a person to another.
order; marriage; debts or liability to render accounts; and for nuns, widowhood. More recently, the decree "Ecclesia Christi" of 7 September, 1909, with which must be read the declarations of 4 January and 5 April, 1910, renders invalid, without the permission of the Holy See, the admission of any person who has been expelled from a college for immorality or other grave fault, or of a person who has been dismissed for any cause whatever from another religious order, a society, or any institution, for the teaching of ecclesiastical, religious, or religious. A person who has obtained a dispensation from his vows cannot enter into any order but the one which he left. This decree applies both to religious orders and to congregations with simple vows, at least to those which are not diocesan, and whose effect has been extended by the order of 4 January, 1910, to religious communities of women. Only formal expulsion renders admission invalid, but the fact of leaving college or other institution under circumstances which would make it equivalent to expulsion makes it illicit, and the Holy See requires superiors to make such inquiries as are necessary to prevent the admission of undesirable persons. Another decree of 7 September, 1910, "In articulo", while not rendering the reception invalid, forbids the admission of a young man who presents himself in order to become a religious cleric, unless he has gone through a course of at least four years of classical studies. (For these decrees and their explanation see "De religiosis et missionariis", vol. V.)

Besides the taking of the habit, exact information must be secured to make sure of the qualities and good intentions of the candidates. These precautions are happy substitutions for the rude test that had to be undergone in former times (see Postula). Besides being dictated by the natural law, they have been sanctioned for the orders of men by a Constitution of Sixtus V, "Cum de omnibus", 1587, and by another Constitution of Sixtus V, "Beneficii et ad regi

of regulars, the priest who is master of novices is the only ordinary confessor. The novice is bound to obey the superior who has jurisdiction over him, and power as head of the house. He is bound by any private vows he may have taken in the order, but he is not annulled by the superior in so far as they are contrary to the rules of the order or the exercises of the novice. The training of the novices is entrusted to an experienced religious, ordinarily distinct from the local superior. The latter, therefore, is obliged to respect the prerogatives of the novice-master, remains the real immediate superior of the novices, and outside that part of the house which is called the novitiate, the direction of the entire community belongs exclusively to him. By canon law, the novice retains full and entire liberty to leave his order and incur no pecuniary responsibility by the mere fact of leaving it. Vows of devotion do not change the juridical condition of the novice, and they cease to bind if he is legally expelled. As soon as one has made up his mind to leave, it becomes his duty to inform the superior; and if he fails to do so, he becomes liable to be required the order for any unnecessary expense it may incur on his behalf after his decision. This is only natural justice. The order is obliged to restore to him his personal property and anything he may have brought with him. As the order is not bound to the choice by any contract it may dismiss him. According to the regulations of 28 June, 1901, in new congregations governed by simple vows, the dismissal of a novice must be approved by the superior-general of the congregation. Dismissing a novice without sufficient cause would be an offence against charity and equity, and a superior guilty of such an offence would fail in his duty to his order.

Although the reception of a novice should be gratuitous, the Council of Trent (c. 16, Sess. 25, "De regularibus") permits the order to stipulate for the payment of his expenses while in the novitiate. In order to ensure the complete liberty of the council forbids him to make any renunciation of his property or any important gift, and annuls such renunciation if made. Parents also, to whose property the novice had a right of succession, are debarred from making any considerable donation. By common law, however, a novice may legally renounce his property within the two months immediately preceding his profession, and this renunciation should also be authorized by the bishop or his vicar. This formality of authorization is not always insisted upon in practice. The renunciation may extend to property of which he is already possessed, or to such as must necessarily devolve upon him in the future; but not necessarily so to such as he has only an expectation of receiving. He is free to make over his property to his family, his order, or any pius work, or even to provide for the services and masses after his death. Although the renunciation takes effect only from the date of his profession, and becomes null and void if that profession does not take place, it is not revocable at the pleasure of the novice before his profession, unless he has reserved to himself the right to change the disposition of his property. If no renunciation has been made at the time of solemn profession, canon law assigns the property either to the monastery or to the natural heirs of the religious. Canon law requires that solemn profession shall be preceded by a period of simple vows; before making these vows, the novice is bound to declare to whom he commits the administration of his properties, and of dispensations from rules and precepts of the Church. Novices benefit also by any exemption attached to the order to which they belong. The jurisdiction communicated by the superior of the congregation suffices to absolve them. It follows apparently that a confessor approved only by the ordinary of the place could not give them valid absolution, though this point is disputed. According to the common law novice to alienate or retain his property is provided for by their constitutions. Generally speaking, the novice is bound, before taking his vows, to declare how he wishes his property to be administered, and the income expended. According to the Regulations of 1901, he may, even after making his vows, be authorized by the superior-general to modify these dispositions. The renunciation of property, though not made null and void, is forbidden to the novice. The Holy See does not approve that any obligation should be imposed upon the novice to give even the income of his property to his order; he remains free to apply it to any reasonable purpose. Solemn profession vacates all ecclesiastical benefits of which the novice was possessed; the perpetual vows of congregations governed by simple vows vacate residential benefits; that is to say, benefits which require residence are vacated by the simple profession, which prepares the way for solemn profession, or by the temporary vows which precede perpetual vows.
NOVICE 146 NOVICE

III. Exercises.—Except in the case of some special privilege of the religious order (as with the Society of Jesus) or some unavoidable obstacle, the novice should wear a religious habit, though not necessarily the special habit of novices. It is the duty of the novice, under the guidance of the novice-master, to form himself spiritually, to learn the rules and customs of his order, and to try himself in the difficulties of the religious life. The rule ordinarily prescribes that at the outset of his religious career he shall pass some days in spiritual exercises, and make a general confession of the sins of his whole life. By the Constitution “Cum ad regulum” of 19 March, 1603, renewed under the Urban VIII in the Decree “Sacra Congregatio” of 1624, Civil Consistory of 1661, and approved by the Holy See, some very wise rules in which he directed that there should be a certain amount of recreation, both in the house and out of doors; and insist on the separation of the novices from older religious. For a long time, studies, properly so called, were forbidden, at least during the first year of novice; but a recent decree dated 27 August, 1946, while maintaining the principle that the whole year of the novice should be devoted especially to the formation of the religious character, recommends certain studies to exercise the mental faculties of the novices, and enable their superiors to form an opinion of their talents and capacities without involving any excessive application, such as the study of the mother-tongue, Latin and Greek, repetition of work previously done, reading the works of the Fathers, etc., in short, studies appropriate to the purpose of the order. Novices, therefore, are bound to give up one hour regularly to private study on all days except feast-days, and also to receive lessons limited to one hour each, not oftener than three times a week. The manner in which the novices apply themselves to these studies is to be taken into account when the question arises of their being admitted to profession (see the decree annotated in Vermeesch, “Periodica de religiosis et missionariis”, vol. V, 1910, n. 442, pp. 195, 197). According to the practice of the older orders the novice receives a religious name, differing from his baptismal name.

IV. Duration.—For all religious orders, the Council of Trent prescribes a full year in the novice, under penalty of nullity of profession. In those orders which have a distinctive habit, the novice commences with the assumption of the habit; in those which have no habit, it commences from the time when the novice is received into the house lawfully assigned for the purpose by competent authority. This year must be continuous without interval, in which case the bond between the order and the novice is broken by voluntary departure or legal dismissal; and also when, independently of the wish of either superior or novice, the latter is compelled to live for any considerable time in the world. A dismissal is considered to take effect when once the novice has crossed the threshold of the house; in case of a voluntary departure, a novice who has left the house, but has kept his religious habit, and after one or two days' absence, is considered as having given way to a temporary desire for change, not sufficient to cause him to lose the benefit of the time already spent in the novitiate. An interruption makes it necessary that the novitiate should begin afresh as if nothing had previously been done, and it differs in this respect from suspension, which is, so to speak, an interval between two effective periods of novitiate. The time which passes during the suspension does not count, only the time passed before the suspension being added to that which follows. The novitiate is suspended when a novice is withdrawn for a certain time from the superior’s direction, but without changing his condition. This would happen in the case of a temporary mental aberration, or an expulsion for some reason shown afterwards to be unfounded, and therefore annulled. It is generally held that if a novice quits his order after having finished his novitiate, and is subsequently readmitted, he has not to begin his novitiate afresh, unless it appears that there has been some serious change in the conditions of this consecutive Council of Trent does not strictly apply to congregations governed by simple vows, but the constitutions of some congregations ordinarily require a year of novitiate at least. The “Normes” of 1901 make a complete and continuous year of the novitiate one of the conditions of a valid profession.

The practice of the Holy See has been of late years to interpret this continuity much more strictly than was formerly the case. Some persons consider that one whole day passed outside the novitiate, even for some good reason, and with the permission of the superior, is sufficient to render ineffective the whole of the previous probation, but this is too rigorous an interpretation of the rule. To avoid all danger of offending against canon law, superiors will do wisely not to grant permission to pass the night out of the novitiate, except in the most exceptional cases and for a very short time. By the Constitutions of Clement VIII, “Regulares discipline” of 12 March, 1596, and of Innocent XII, “Sanctissimus” of 20 June, 1699, the novitiate house must be approved by the Holy See, and the novitiate cannot be validly passed elsewhere. These directions refer to Italy and the adjacent islands, and do not apply to all religious orders. Nevertheless some authors consider them to be of universal application. The law of the Holy See is interpreted by simple vows approved by the Holy See ordinarily to reserve to the Holy See the approbation of the novitiate house. Pius IX, in an Encyclical letter of the Sacred Congregation of Bishops and Regulars dated 25 April, 1851, required that in all novitiates there should be a common life; pocket-money and the separate use of chattels of whatever kind (peculium) was forbidden. One part of the novitiate house should be reserved for the novices, and strictly separated from the rest of the dwelling. The novitiate cannot validly be commenced except in the house lawfully set apart for the purpose. Some authors strictly require that the novices shall never be lodged elsewhere; but, although in the orders whose novitiate is bound to be approved by the Holy See, residence in this house is rigorously insisted upon, it does not seem possible that a few days' absence should lessen the value of the probation.

V. History.—The institution of a time of probation, in order to prepare the candidate who has already been admitted into the religious profession, goes back to very ancient times. According to Mgr Ladeuze (Le cénobitisme Pachomien, p. 282), in spite of the testimony of the MS. life of St. Pachomius (MS. 381, "Patrologia", IV, Paris), the novitiates
Nubia did not exist in the monastery of St. Paemonius as a general institution; but from the fifth century at least it has been the rule for the Coptic monks to pass three years in the country. (See the "Coptic Ordinal" in the Bodleian Library of Oxford; beware in "Revue de l’Orient chrétien", II, 1906, pp. 65, 140.) This term of three years was required also in Persia in the sixth century (Laboureur, "La Christiannisation de Perse", p. 80). Judging by that he borrowed it from the rulers of the saints, "Sancimus ergo, sacras sequentes regulas" (Novella V., "de monachis", c. 2, preface and f. 1). Many Western orders, notably that of St. Benedict, were content with one year. St. Gregory the Great in his letter to Fortunatus, Bishop of Naples (bk. X, Letter 24, in Migne, P. L., LXXVII, col. 1082–7) required only two years. Many of the monks spent the time of the diocesan ordination of the abbot. Common law did not prescribe any term of novitiate and this omission led to the frequent shortening, and occasionally to the entire abolition of the preparatory probation. Innocent III ("C. Apostolicus", 17, "de regularibus" (III, 31)) directs that the novitiate shall be dispensed with in exceptional circumstances, and forbids the Mendicant Orders to make their profession within one year. Pius V, with the Council of Trent (Seers, S.S., c. xv, "De regularibus") makes a year’s novitiate an indispensable condition of valid profession. In the East, since the fourth or fifth century, the novices of Palestine, Egypt, and Tabennisi have been accustomed to give up their secular dress, and put on the habit given them by the community. This habit is distinguished from that of the professed by the absence of the cuculla or cowl. Those of St. Basil kept their habits. This practice, sanctioned by St. Hilary (Novella, V. c. 21), was also that of St. Benedict and the Benedictines, but the contrary use has for a long time prevailed. andria Monophysites, and in this way became and remained Jacobites or Copts. In the following centuries numerous churches and monasteries were built even in Upper Nubia and Sennar, the ruins of which yet remain. Other documents show that Nubia was divided into three provinces with seventeen bishops: Maracu with the suffragan Dioceses of Korta, Ibrahim, Bucora, Dunkala, Sai, Temmus, and Suekkr; Abadia with Borra, Gisara, Martin, Ambida, Bluna, and Menkesi; Nixamatis with Soper, Couchier, Takki, and Amankul. Yet Christianity was in continual danger from the Mohammedans. Nubia succeeded in freeing itself from the control of Egypt, which became an independent Mohammedan kingdom in 969, but in 1173 Saladin's brother Schem Eddawlah Turanschah advanced from Yemen, destroyed the churches, and carried off the bishop and 70,000 Nubians. At the same time Northern Nubia was conquered. In 1275 the Mameluke Sultan Djihan Behars sent an army from Egypt into Nubia. Dongola was conquered, the Christian king David was obliged to flee, and the churches were plundered. The inhabitants escaped forcible conversion to Mohammedanism only by payment of a head-tax. Nubia was divided into petty states, chief of which was Sennar, founded in 1438 by the negro Funji. For some time Sennar ruled Shendi, Berber, and Dongola. In the eighteenth century the King of Sennar obtained for a time Kordofan also. From the Middle Ages there is little information as to the position of Christianity; Islam became the supreme force, partly by the amalgamation of the native with the Arabian tribes.

In 1821 Sennar and the dependent provinices submitted to Mohammed Ali, the founder of modern Egypt. The commanding position of the capital, Kharloutm, led the Holy See to hope that the conversion of Central Africa could be effected from Nubia. On 26 December, 1845, the Propaganda erected a vicariate, confirmed by Gregory XVI, 14 April, 1846. The Austrian imperial family contributed funds and the mission was under the protection of the Austrian consul at Kharloutm. Missionary work was begun by the Jesuits Rylko (d. 1849) and Knollheinrich (d. 1850), who pushed forward as far as 4° 10' north of the equator, Kircher, and several secular priests (among whom were Haller, d. 1854, and Gerbl, d. 1857). They founded stations at Heiligenkreuz on the Abiad (1855), and at Santa Maria in Cibodoro (1851). In 1850 the missions were transferred to the Franciscans. Father Daniel Combioni (d. at Kharloutm, 1881) founded an institute at Veron for the training of missionaries to labour among the negroes of Southern Sudan.

The Pious Mothers of the Negro Country (Pia Madre dello Ssigrito), founded in 1867, devoted itself to conducting schools for girls and dispensaries. The Mahdi, Mohammed Ahmed, in 1880 conquered Kordofan, in 1883 vanquished the Egyptian army, and on 26 January, 1885, destroyed Kharloutm. A number of priests and sisters were held for years in captivity; the name of Christian seemed obliterated. After the overthrow of his successor, Caliph Abdallah, by the English under Lord Kitchener, 2 September, 1898, the mission was re-established. In 1899 a mission had been opened at Assuan. In 1899 Mr. Rovere accompanied Father Weffer and Father Hubertus to the mission station at Odmurum, and in 1900 founded the mission near the Shilluk and re-established the station at Kharloutm. Under his successor, Geyer, stations were opened in 1904 at Halfeya, Ltd. Atiko, Kavango; in 1905 at Atuli among the Djiar, at Wau in Bahr el Ghazal, and the mission at Sokkur, opened in 1885, was resumed. The Sons of the Sacred Cross, as the Missionaries of the interior had been called from 1887, founded a station at Port Sudan.

Starting from Kharloutm the missionary territory is divided into a northern and a southern district. The majority of the population in the north is Mohamme-

Nueva Cáceres, Diocese of (Nová Cáceres), created in 1505 by Clement VIII; it is one of the four suffragan sees of the Archdiocese of Manila, Philippine Islands. It comprises the provinces of Camarines Sur, Camarines Norte, Albay, and Tayabas in the southern part of Luzon, the islands Ticao, Masbate, Burias, and Cantaduane, also numerous smaller islands off the coast of Southern Luzon. It includes a territory of 13,632 square miles, and has a population of nearly 600,000. The cathedral and episcopal residence are situated in the town of Nueva Cáceres, the capital of Camarines Sur. The territory now included in the diocese was first visited by Augustinian friars, who had accompanied the Spanish Legado Urdaneta in the expedition of 1565. When the missionaries began their labours, they found the natives given over to gross idolatries and superstitions (adoration of the sun, moon, and stars, ancestor worship, and the propitiation of a multitude of deities by strange sacrifices; nor did they seem to have any idea of a supreme being. So fruitful, however, was the apostolic zeal of the missionaries that, within a few years, many thousands of converts were made in Albay, in Camarines Sur, and in Masbate. Assisted by heroic Catholic laymen, they gathered the natives into villages or reductions, where they instructed them in the truths of religion and taught them the advantages of a settled civilized life. The Augustinians had begun the spiritual conquest of the diocese, but, being few in number, they were unable to attend to so extensive a territory. In 1597 the Franciscans were called to assist them. The arrival of the latter gave a new impulse to the work of evangelization. Missions and reductions were multiplied in Albay, in Camarines Sur, and in Masbate; and new foundations were established in the Province of Tayabas. The ranks of the missionaries were strengthened from time to time by workers from Spain and Mexico; as early as 1595 the Church had made so much progress in these parts that in 1595 created the Diocese of Nueva Cáceres, taking the name of the town of Nueva Cáceres founded in Camarines Sur in 1579 by Francisco de Nande, second Governor-General of the Philippine Islands. The first bishop was Francisco de Ortega, an Augustinian friar who had laboured for several years in the Province of Manila. He took possession of his diocese in 1600. The present bishop (Rev. John B. McGinley, O. F. M., 1910) is his twentieth and seventeenth successor.

From the beginning until 1890, the greater number of parishes and missions were cared for by the Franciscans and the Augustinians. Although the latter had resigned during the first years in favour of the Franciscans, they returned to the diocese some years later and converted to the faith the whole of Camarines Norte. Each parish had as its parish priest a friar, assisted, according to the importance and population of the district, by one or more native secular priests. Only in later years were the latter placed in full charge of important parishes. As late as 1897, out of a total of 90 parishes, 43 were in charge of friars. The bishops were also generally chosen from the various religious orders, though on several occasions members of the secular clergy held the see, the most noted being (1723) the saintly Bishop de Molina, a native of Iloilo, whose name is still held in veneration. The Lazarists came in 1870, under Bishop Gainza, and were placed in charge of the diocesan seminary then in process of construction. The same prelate introduced the Sisters of Charity and placed them in charge of the diocesan academy and normal school which he had founded. In 1886 the Capuchins arrived and were given several missions. In 1898, on account of the revolution against Spanish rule and the feeling against the franciscans, most of these religious were withdrawn from their parishes and missions, and secular clergy placed in charge. The present (1908) statistics of the diocese are as follows: 268 priests, of whom 25 are regulars, the religious who are not natives 116 (sisters 9, brothers 3); 122 parishes with resident priests; without resident priests, 6; parochial schools 180, with 46,000 children in attendance (24,000 boys and 22,000 girls); one hospital; one academy for girls, with 200 in attendance; a diocesan seminary, preparatory and theological, with 80 students; a college for secular students attached to the seminary, with 300 students. The total population of the diocese is nearly 600,000, of which number less than 1000 are non-Catholics.

Nuestra Segovia, Diocese of (Nove Segobie), in the Philippines, so called from Segovia, a town in Spain. The town of Nueva, or New, Segovia was the seat of the Province of Cagayan, and was founded in 1581, while the city of Manila was the old capital of the isle of Luzon. The town was then a point well adapted for a capital, and it was regarded as a suitable location for a city. It was also the seat of the bishops of the diocese of Cagayan. The town was renamed Segovia in 1581, after the city of Segovia in Spain. The city was founded by Spanish colonists in the early 16th century, and it became the capital of the Province of Cagayan. The name of the city was changed from Nueva a Segovia in 1581, after the city of Segovia in Spain. twenty seminarians; there is also a girls' college founded by the last Spanish bishop, Monsignor Henvia Campomanes, who had to flee in 1698. It is in charge of the Sts. Peter and Paul of Chartres. The Dominican Fathers have a boys' college in Dagupan, Province of Pangasinan, and the Dominican Sisters have a girls' college in Lingayen, the capital of the same province. In 1910 a parochial school and college, under Belgian sisters, was opened at Tagudin, a town of the Mountain Province, with an attendance of 305 girls, who receive manual as well as intellectual training. A similar institution is projected for the sub-province of Abra, and will be entrusted to German sisters. Gradually parochial schools are being organized, but in many cases it has been found extremely difficult to sustain the expense. The Spanish government supported religion in all its works; but since the separation of Church and State the people, unaccustomed to contribute directly to the support of religion, find the maintenance of ecclesiastical institutions a difficult undertaking. At least Sunday schools are possible, and gradually they are coming into vogue. In Vigan, out of a population of 16,000, about 2000 go to Sunday school. There are not and never were almshouses or asylums of any kind. The people are very charitable towards the poor and afflicted, who have the custom of going at stated times in a body to the homes of the well-to-do, where they receive some gifts and where they then publicly recite the rosary for the spirit of their benefactors. Up to 1903 nearly all the bishops of Nueva Segovia were Spaniards. In that year Right Reverend D. J. Dougherty, D.D., an American, was appointed. He was transferred to the Diocese of Jarabacoa, Dominican Islands, and Right Reverend J. J. Cazeau, D.D., the present (1910) incumbent, like the former bishop an American, succeeded him.

Nugent, Francis, priest of the Franciscan Capuchin Order, founder of the Irish and the Spanish Provinces of said order; b. in 1569 at Breffinville, near Armagh, Ireland, according to some; according to others, at Moyrath, County Meath; d. at Charleville, France, in 1635. His father was Sir Thomas Nugent of Moyrath, and his mother was the Lady Mary, daughter of Lord Dowlon. At an early age he was sent to France to receive an education which the Penal Laws denied him at home. Before the age of twenty he obtained the degree of doctor at the Universities of Paris and Louvain, and occupied chairs in these two centres of learning, prior to his entrance into religion. He acquired a profound knowledge of Greek and Hebrew, and could speak a number of European languages fluently. In 1589 he joined the Capuchin Franciscan Province, taking the name of Francis. In due course he was professed and ordained priest. Towards the close of 1594, or the beginning of 1595, he was sent to France to guide the destinies of the French provinces then being formed, and established communities at Mentz and Charleville. Meanwhile he continued to deliver lectures in philosophy and theology at Paris. In 1596 he went as custos-general of France to the general chapter at Rome, and was appointed commissionary general of the Capuchins at Venice. Three years later, being again in the Eternal City, he took part in a public dissertation in theology at which Clement VII himself presided. Father Francis maintained his thesis with skill and eloquence, and was enthusiastically awarded the palm of victory.

At the general chapter of 1599 he was relieved of the provinciat and returned to Belgium, where he remained in absentia. In 1611, at the earnest request of John Zwickhard, Archbishop of Mainz, seven friars of this province were sent to establish the order in the Rhine country, and Father Francis was appointed their commissionary general. He founded a convent at Paderborn in 1612, and two years later communities were settled at Essen, Münster, an Aachen. He also established the Confraternity of the Passion at Cologne, and amongst his first protectors were two graces, Prince Albert of Bavaria and Count Marko von Hohenzollern, the dean of the cathedral. In 1615 he began a monastery at Mains, and Pope Paul V nominated him vicar Apostolic and commissionary general with full power to establish the order in Ireland. That country was then passing through a period of terrible persecution, but the Capuchins braved every danger, mingled with the people and ministered to their spiritual needs. Meanwhile in 1618, the monastery of Charleville, in Upper Champagne, became a training-school for friars intended for the Irish mission, and facilities for the same purpose were offered by the Flandres-Belgian Province to a fresh band of workers soon sent to Ireland. An Father Nugent was thus enabled to found the first monastery in Dublin in 1624. The Archbishop of Dublin, Dr. Fleming, in 1629 addressed a letter commanding the Capuchin Fathers specially mentioning "their learning, prudence, and earnestness." Two years later Father Nugent founded a monastery at Slane, in the diocese of his friend, Dr. Dease, who had previously been commissioned for the merits of the Capuchins. Owing to falling health he retired in 1631 to Charleville. He is generally credited with having procured the foundation at Lille of a college of a special nature for their benefactors. Up to 1635 nearly all the bishops of Nueva Segovia were Spaniards. In that year Right Reverend D. J. Dougherty, D.D., an American, was appointed. He was transferred to the Diocese of Jarabacoa, Dominican Islands, and Right Reverend J. J. Cazeau, D.D., the present (1910) incumbent, like the former bishop an American, succeeded him.

Nugent, James, philanthropist, temperance advocate and social reformer, b. 3 March, 1822, at Livespool; d. 27 June, 1905, at Formby, near Liverpool. Educated at Ushaw, 1838-43, and the English College, Rome, 1843-6; he was ordained at St. Nicholas's, Liverpool pool, on 30 August, 1846. After being stationed at Blackburn and Wigan, he was sent to Liverpool 1 January, 1849. In 1851 he introduced the teaching Sisters of Notre Dame, now directing an English Catholic training college for teachers at Mount Pleasant. In 1853 he opened the Catholic Institute, in which Dr. Newman delivered in October, 1853, his lectures on the Turks. In 1863 he was appointed chaplain of Walton Prison, and held the office twenty-two years. In 1865 he established the Refuge for Homeless Boys, which from 1865 to 1905 trained 2000 boys. In 1870 he founded the "Northern Press", which in March 1872, became the "Catholic Times". In February, 1872, he organized for the spread of temperance the League of the Cross. This he considered his greatest work. In 1870 he began a series of visits to America. After retiring from the chaplaincy of Walton Prison in 1874, he turned his attention to parochial work and inaugurated the new mission of Blandellsands, which he resigned in 1857. To prove drunkenness he instituted a series of Saturday night free concerts, which gradually became a civic institu lation and in 1891 established in Bevington Bush a Refuge for Fallen Women and a Night Shelter for homeless women which (1891–1905) received 2300 poor women. In 1892 he appointed him as a denunciator. In memory of his golden jubilee as a priest he purchased for Temperance meetings and concerts, the Jubilee Hall in Burling St. The citizens of Liverpool on 5 May, 1897, presented to him at an unexpected public meeting his portrait now in the Liverpool Art Gallery and over £1300 with which he began the House of Providence, West Dingle, for young unmarried mothers with their first babies; 200 such cases were sheltered from 1897–1903. In 1904 at the age of eighty-two, he visited America with Abbot Gasquet but took ill at St. Paul, Minnnesota, he hurried home to die. On 8 December, 1906, there was erected near St. George's Hall, a bronze statue commemorating him as: Apostle of Temperance, Protector of the Orphan Child, Consul of the Prisoneer, Reformer of the Criminal, Saviour of Fallen Womanhood, Friend of all in Poverty and Affliction, An Eye to the Blind, A Foot to the Lame, the Father of the Poor.

JAMES HUGHES.

Numbers, the number of the fourth book of the Pentateuch (q. v.).

Numbers, Use of, in the Church.—No attentive reader of the Old Testament can fail to notice that certain sacredness seems to attach to particular numbers, for example, seven, forty, twelve, etc. It is not merely the frequent recurrence of these numbers, but their ritual or ceremonial use which is so significant. Take, for example, the swearing of Abraham (Gen., xxi, 28 sqq.) after setting apart (for sacrifice) seven ewe lambs, especially when we remember the etymological connexion of the word nabiha (2223) with the oath, (2227) seven. Traces of the same mystical employment of numbers lie much upon the surface of the New Testament also, particularly in the Apocalypse. Even so early a writer as St. Irenæus (Herc. V, xxx) does not hesitate to explain the number of the beast 666 (Apos., xiii, 18) by the word ΛΑΤΕΙΝΟΣ since the numerical value of its constituent letters yields the same total (50+1+530+5+10+50+70+200=866). While some mystics of our own day are inclined to solve the mystery upon the same principles by simply substituting for Latinus the words Nero Caesar written in Hebrew characters which give the same result. Of the ultimate origin of the numerical significance attached to numbers something will be said under Symbolism. Suffice it to note here that although the Fathers repeatedly condemned the magical use of numbers which had descended from Babylonian sources to the Pythagoreans and Gnostics of their time, and although they denounced any system of philosophy which rested upon an exclusively numerical basis, still they almost unanimously regarded the numbers of Holy Writ as full of mystical meaning, and they considered the interpretation of these mystical meanings as an important branch of exegesis. To illustrate the view which with they proceed it will be sufficient to refer to one or two notable examples. St. Irenæus (Herc., I, viii, 5 and 12, and II, xxxiv, 4) discusses at length the Gnostic numerical interpretation of the holy names Jesus as the equivalent of 965 and he claims that by writing the name in Hebrew characters an entirely different interpretation is necessitated. Again St. Ambrose commenting upon the days of creation and the Sabbath remarks: "The number seven is good, but we do not explain it after the doctrine of Pythagoras and the other philosophers, but rather according to the manifestation and division of the grace of the Spirit; for the prophet Isaiah has enumerated the principal gifts of the Holy Spirit as seven" (Letter to Horentinus). Similarly St. Augustine, replying to Tichonius the Donatist, observes that "it Tichonius had said that these mystical rules open out some of the hidden recesses of the law, instead of exposing the mysteries of the law, he would have spoken truth" (De Doctrina Christiana, III, xiii.). Many passages from St. Chrysostom and other Fathers might be cited as displaying the same love and showing the same reliance on the great Christian teachers of the early centuries to push this recognition of the mystical significance of numbers to extremes.

On the other hand there can be no doubt that influenced mainly by Biblical precedents, but also in part by the prevalence of this philosophy of numbers all around them, the Fathers down to the time of Bede and even later gave much attention to the sacredness and mystical significance not only of certain numbers in themselves but also of the numerical totals given by the constituent letters with which words were written. A conspicuous example is supplied by one of the earliest of Christian documents not included in the Canon of Scripture, I. e., the so-called Epistle of Barnabas, which Lightfoot is inclined to place as early as A. D. 70–79. This document appears to Gen., xiv, 14, and xviii, 23, as mystically pointing to the name and self-oblation of the coming Messiah. Therefore, says the writer, "that Abraham who first appointed circumcision, looked forward in spirit unto Jesus when he circumcised, having received the ordinance of the Scriptures sowing and laboured in the household of eighteen males and three hundred". What then was the knowledge given unto him? Understand ye that He saith "the glory be first, and then after an interval of three hundred". In the eighteen I stands for 10, H for 8. Here thou hast Jesus (ΗΙΟΣΟΣ). And because the cross in the T was to have grace, he saith also "three hundred". So he revealed Jesus in two letters and in the remaining one the cross" (Ep. Barnabas, 1x). It will, of course, be understood that the numerical value of the Greek letters Τ and Χ, the first letters of the Holy Name, is 10 and 8=18, while Τ, which stands for the form of the cross, represents 300. At a period, then, when the Church was forming her liturgy and when Christian teachers so readily saw mystical meanings underlying everything which had to do with numbers, it can hardly be doubted that the liturgical purpose must constantly have guided the repetition of oaths and prayers in the ceremonial of the Holy Sacrifice and indeed in all public worship. Even in the formulæ of the prayers themselves many of the formulas of this kind of symbolism. In the Gregorian Sacramentary (Muratori, "Liturgia Romana Vetus", II, 364) we find a form of Benediction in some codices (it is contained also in the Legatio Missarum ad Gaudem, in the Circumcision or Octave of the Nativity), which concludes with the following words: "Quo sic in senarii numeri perfectione in hoc seculo vivatis, et in septenario inter beatorum spirituum agnitione requestatia quatenus in octavo resurrectione renovati; jubilate remissione ditati, ad gaudio sine fine manuara perpetiatis. Amen".

We are fairly justified then when we read of the threefold, fivefold, and sevenfold liturgies, of the number of the repetitions of Kyrie eleison and Christe eleison, of the number of the crosses made over the oblatas in the canon of the Mass, of the number of the unisons of the prayers in the coronation of a king (in the ancient form in the so-called Egbert Pontifical these prayers have been carefully numbered), of the intervals assigned for the saying of Masses for the dead, of the number of the lessons or the prophecies read at certain seasons of the year, or of the absolutions pronounced over the remains of bishops and prelates, or again of the number of deacons who accompany the pope and of the acolytes who bear candles before him—we are justified, we say, in assigning some mystical meaning to all those things, which may not perhaps have been very closely conceived by those who instituted these ceremonies, but which nevertheless had an influence in determining their choice why the ceremonies should be performed in this particular way and otherwise. (For explanation of the mystical significance commonly attached to the use of numbers see Symbolism.)

HERBERT THURSTON.

Numismatics 'from the Greek νομισμάτικη, "legal currency"—is the science of coins and of metals. Every coin or metal being a product of the cultural, economic, and political conditions under which it originated, this science is divided according to the various civilized communities of mankind. It is not only a distinct science, but also, in its respective parts, a branch of all those sciences which are concerned with the history of nations and of their culture—classical archeology, history in its narrower sense, Orientalism, etc. Practically, only ancient, modern, and possibly Oriental numismatics are of importance. Furthermore, a distinction should be made between numismatography, which is chiefly descriptive, and numismatology, which views the coin from its artistic, economic, and cultural side.

The dependence of theoretical numismatics on the pursuit of coin-collecting is clearly seen in the history of the science. The earliest publications of any importance were written to meet the needs of collectors (e.g., the various cabinets of Taler, Groschen, and ducats, and the Münzbildschauen, or "coin-portfolios"), whereas the foundations for a scientific treatment of ancient numismatics were not supplied until 1790, by Eckhel, and for modern not until the nineteenth century by Mader, Grote, and Lelewel. (It is worth remembering that St. Thomas Aquinas, in "De regimine principum," II, xiii, xiv, treated the subject of money and coinage, and this work was for many years the authority among canonists.) The oldest collection of coins of which we have certain knowledge dates back to the fifteenth century, and was made by Petrarch; his example found numerous imitators. Hubert Goetz, in 1556-60, visited the various collections of Europe, of which there are said to have been 950. In comparison with private collections, which are a rule scattered after the death of their owners, the collections of rulers, states, or museums, possess paramount importance, and furnish the most reliable basis for numismatic investigations. As early as 1750 Francis I of Austria in two works of great beauty, "Münzzeichen" and "Münnoyez en or" and "Münnoyez en argent," made known the treasures of his collection; and in recent years the great catalogues, especially those of the British Museum, have become the most important sources of information in this science. The needs of both collectors and theoretical students have called into being a large number of numismatic societies, as well as about 100 technical periodicals, in large part published by these societies. From the meetings of the German Society of Numismatics, held from year to year in different cities, there have developed international congresses: Brussels, 1892; Paris, 1900 (Records and Transactions, published by Comte de Castelanne and A. Blanchet; Rome, 1903; (Atti del congresso internazionale di scienze storiche, 6 vols.); Brussels, 1910.

I. COINS.—Coins may be defined as pieces of metal that serve as legal tender. The term includes ordinary currency, commemorative or presentation pieces stamped by public authority in accordance with the established standard, etc., but not paper money or private coinage. To the last class we refer the English tokens which were largely circulated as a result of the insufficient supply of fractional coin about the year 1800; furthermore, the pieces called mercurius, issued, especially by church corporations, as vouchers of money, and afterwards for value in general, like jeté or counters, and Rechnungsmünzen. When each individual is no longer able to wrest from the earth his own subsistence, they are forced to exchange his labour for distributing its products. This is at first effected by barter of commodities, which requires a universal available medium of exchange usually found in cattle in Homer the equipment of Mesalans is valued at steers; that of Glauce, at 100). But as it is in a primitive men have used hides, pelts, cloth, etc., for this purpose. Soon, however, it becomes necessary to fix a measure of value that can be employed universally, and for this gold, silver, and copper have been used from very early times: in comparatively recent years after experiment with many other metals, nickel has been added to these. The first stage of metallic money is reached with the weighing out of pieces of metal any shape; but, as only the gross weight can be determined by this procedure, and not the degree of fineness (a very essential factor in the case of the precious metals), the necessity arises of certifying fineness of the stamp of public authority, and this stamp makes the lump of metal a coin. The employment of one of the metals mentioned soon proves insufficient: it is impossible to put into circulation gold coins; sufficiently small denominations of gold metal, to issue coins of sufficiently high values. It is necessary, therefore, to make use of two or three metals at the same time. This may be done either by employing the one precious metal as a measure of value and the other, together with copper, only as commodity or subsidiary coin, or else by using both metals concurrently as measures of value at a rate fixed by law (bimetals), a course however, which has frequently caused difficulties on account of fluctuations in the rate of exchange of the two precious metals.

In form, coins are usually circular, sometimes oval and quadrangular; these last are particularly common in emergency coinage, and in Sweden had grown to an immense size and great weight. There are also found especially in the Far East, coins of the most eccentric shapes. In addition to the device and inscription, coins frequently bear what are called mint marks / mint-masters' marks which deserve special mention. Mint-masters and die-sinkers have in many cases been accustomed to distingish their works by certain marks or letters; and the mints distinguish their respective coins either by letters, indicating the place of issue by conventional and arbitrary marks, / by some other means—sometimes scarcely perceptible to the uninitiated—such as the placing of a dot beneath a particular letter of the inscription. In this way the various issues of coins, otherwise alike, are kept distinct.

The science of numismatics is materially advance by finds of coins in large quantities: in addition to knowledge of previously unknown types, such discoveries afford an instructive insight into the actual circulation of coins at given periods and the extent to which certain coinages were current beyond the confines of their own states, and help us to assign undated varieties, especially those of the Middle Ages, to some particular mint-master or precise period. From the study of the science, as well as in the classification of coins, it is the practice to follow, chronologically, the great eras: the ancient, medieval, and modern; giving, graphically, the different political divisions of the respective times. For the Greek coins, Eckhel has adopted an exemplary system which is still in use. Beginning at the Pillars of Hercules, he takes up the countries of the world, as known to the ancients, in the order of their positions around the Mediterranean first those of Europe, then Asia as far as India and lastly Africa from Egypt back to the Strait of Gibraltar.

A. Greek Coins.—The term Greek is always understood in ancient numismatics to include all coins except those of Rome origin and the Italian Greeks. The monetary unit is the talent of 60 minae (neither the talent nor the mina being represented by any coin), or 600 drachmas, each being equal to 6 obols. The various currencies are the most common cases based on the Persian system of weight. The Persians had two different standards of weight for the precious metals: for gold, the Euboan; for silver, the Babylonian. The gold doric, the common gold coin, corresponding to the Greek silver drachmas, weighed 8.833 grammes (about 1291 grains); the silver drachm (shekel), 5.57 grammes (nearly 87 grains). As the value of silver to that of gold was, in antiquity, as 1 to 10, the gold doric is the equivalent of 15 silver drachmas. Other standards of coinage were the Phocaea, the Eginetan, the Attic, the Corinthian, the Ptolemaic, and the cistophoric standard of Asia Minor; some of these, however, may be derived from the Persian standard. By the substitution of the lighter Attic standard for the old Eginetan Solon brought about the partial abolition of debt. The most abundantly coined pieces were the tetradrachm (25-25mm. in diameter) and the didrachm; pieces of ten, and, ten, and twenty, drachms are exceptional, and a forty-drachma piece is a rarity. In the downward scale the division extends to the quarter-obolus (= 1/8 drachma). In Greek Asia Minor coins made of a mixture of gold and silver (electrum) were used. In Greece the silver coinage greatly predominated; copper coins do not antedate 400 B.C., while gold was but rarely minted. The coinage of the Persians, on the other hand, was very rich in gold, and it was their example that influenced Philip II of Macedon and Alexander the Great. With a few exceptions the highest degree of fineness was aimed at, the gold doric being 97 per cent fine.

In the early times the coinage was done with a single die; the reverse of the blank metal was held fast by a peg, generally square, in the anvil, and so received its impress in the form of a quadrangular depression (impressus square); in time this square came to be adorned with lines, figures, and inscriptions. In Southern Italy two dies that fitted into each other were employed, so that the coins present the same design in relief on the obverse and depressed on the reverse (nummus incus). The inscriptions are in different languages, according to nationalities. Bilingual inscriptions—e. g., Greek-Latin and inscriptions in which the language and type do not correspond—e. g., Greek in Cyproite characters, also occur; and even the Greek characters undergo numerous changes in form in the course of time. The right of coinage being a privilege of sovereignty, the inscriptions first mention the name of the sovereign under whose authority the coin was struck; in Greece, until the time of Alexander the Great, this was the community. The names of the officials who had charge of the coinage are also found; and later coins also show the year, frequently reckoned from the Seleucid era, 312 B.C. The oldest coins had their origin on the Aeginian coasts, perhaps in Lydia, as Herodotus tells us; however, Eginus, to whose king, Pheidon, the Parian chronicle ascribes them, possibly earlier than 600 B.C. Various islands of the same sea furnish coins bearing designs not very dissimilar to those of Rome, but the coins of Southern Italy are of not much later date, as is proved by the fact that specimens are extant from the city of Sybaris, which was destroyed in 510 B.C. The early coins of Greece proper and Asia Minor are thick pieces of metal, resembling flat-iron shaped bulla, and, naturally, small objects, devices, plants and animals, which soon become typical of particular localities; these are succeeded by the heads and figures of deities and men, sometimes united in one piece. About 400 B.C., now, the art of die-cutting reached its fullest development, attaining a degree of excellence unequalled by any later race: Syracuse holds the first place; after it in order come Arcadia, Thebes, Olynthus, etc.

Of the non-Hellenic peoples whose coins are included in the Greek series, the most important for us are the Jews. At first they made use of foreign coins, but, as one of the results of the national rise under the Maccabees against the Syrians, the high priest Simon, received from Antiochus VII (139-38 B.C.) the right of coinage. Simon minted copper and silver. To him is ascribed the "Shekel Israel": obverse legend (Shekel Israel) and a cup or chalice above which is a date (1-5, reckoning from the conferring of the right of coinage); reverse, legend (Jerusalem the Holy) and a lily-stalk with three buds. The rest of the Maccabees—John Hydranius, Judas Aristobulus, Alexander Janneus, Mattathias Antigonus, and so on—coined copper exclusively with inscriptions in old Hebrew or in Hebrew and Greek. After these came the copper coins of the Idumæan prince Herod and his successors. In the time of Christ Roman coins were also in circulation. This is proved by the story of the tribute money. "And they offered him [Christ] a penny. And Jesus saith to them, Whose image and inscription is this? They say to him, Caesar's. (Matt. xxii, 19-21). It was only during the two revolts of the Jews against the Romans in A.D. 66-70 and 132-135, that silver was again coined under Eleazar and Simon and Bar-Cochba respectively. The Bar-Cochba inscription differs from the first century after Christ there occurs the name Gondophare, or some similar name, supposed to be identical with that of one of the three Magi, Caspar.

B. Roman Coins.—In Italy the earliest medium of exchange was copper, which had to be weighed at each transaction (as rude). At first it was used in pieces of irregular form, later in clumsy bars. The introduction of true coins with marks indicating their value and the emblems of the city belongs to a much later date. The monetary unit was the as of 12 ounces (10.527 oz. Troy), equal to a Roman pound (libra—hence, libral standard); usually, however, the weight of an as was only 10 ounces (about 3½ oz. Troy). The divisions of the as (the semis = ½, triens = ¼, quadrans = ¼, sextans = ¼, and uncia = ½), in order that they might be more readily distinguished, were marked on a side with small balls as they contained ounces. On the one side was the representation of the prow of a ship, the characteristic device of the city of Rome, on the other, the head of a divinity, which varied with the denomination of the coin. The coins were round, in high, but somewhat clumsy, relief, and cast; some were minted in Campania.

From 268 B.C. the weight of the as steadily decreased; the libral standard became first a triental, then an uncial, and finally even a semisncial standard—½ uncia of the original weight. While this reduction of the standard facilitated the manufacture of coins of larger values (duodecans, decusius, equal to 2, 3, and 10 as respectively), it resulted in giving to copper coins a current value far above their intrinsic worth and furthered the introduction of stamped, instead of cast, coins. According to Livy, the silver coins were minted in 268 B.C., this first silver piece was the denarius, equal to 10 as. It was followed by the minor denominations, the quinarius (¼ denarius) and sextarius (¼ denarius). Besides these, the eactiorius (¼ denarius) was coined for the purpose of some of the provinces as a commercial currency. The denarius, weighing at first ½ uncia of a pound was reduced in 217 B.C. to ¼ uncia, the silver used being almost pure. The obverse shows Olynthus, des Rome; the reverse, the two Dioscuri; of these stamps the former more particularly precious in use for many years. The mint was managed by a distinguished personage
and under whose name several marks were affixed.
Those marks were of various kinds of gold and silver but mostly of copper. The value of copper and gold was also determined by the weight and quality of the coin, which was usually about 12 grains. The value of copper was about 120 gold coins for each silver coin, which was about 500 copper coins. The value of silver was about 1,000 gold coins for each silver coin, which was about 2,500 copper coins.
The weight of copper was about 500 grains, and the weight of silver was about 1,000 grains.

The silver coins were divided into several types,

about 30 grains in weight, and the semis, which was about 15 grains in weight. The denarius was sides the Italian testone and the French franc, the German Taler was the most important. In 1485 the Archduke Sigismund of the Tyrol caused the issue of a new silver coin weighing 2 Loth, and of a fineness of 15 Loth; its value at the rate of exchange of that time corresponded to that of the gold gulden and it was therefore called Guldenprochen. The example of the Tyrol was soon followed by many nobles who had the right of coining; the Joachimstaler (shortened to Taler), made in the mint of the counts of Schlick, at Joachimstal, originated the name of Taler (Dollar), which has been retained to the present day. Among the most interesting of the coins of this kind are the Rubentaler, coined by Leonard of Keutschach, Arch-age, thereby causing serious losses to those of their subjects who were engaged in trade. The cities, therefore, which had not yet obtained the right of coining, endeavoured to gain some control over the system, either by obtaining for themselves the right of coining or by farming mints, or by inducing the owners of mints to exercise their privileges in a more reasonable manner.

Of the German medieval coins, the "bracteates" (Lat. bractea, "a thin sheet of metal") deserve special mention. They were not personal ornaments, like the Scandinavian bracteates of earlier times, but genuine coins. As the denier had become thinner and thinner in the course of the eleventh century, it was bishop of Salzburg, and named from his armorial bearings, a turnip (Rübe); these are counted among the rarest and most frequently counterfeited coins of the Middle Ages.

The monetary systems of the German Empire during the Middle Ages are of the greatest interest with respect not only to the number of its types of coin, but also the peculiarity of its evolution. Charlemagne, it is true, had established uniformity of coinage and had caused the right of coining to be acknowledged as exclusively belonging to the sovereign; but his weaker successors were gradually compelled to yield this, as well as most of the other royal prerogatives, to the feudal lords, whose power continued to increase as that of the paramount government weakened. Among these feudalities were, not only all archbishops and bishops, but also the leading abbots and abbesses within the empire. The evolution was gradual. At first permission was granted to hold a fair (mercatus), levy a tax (telonium), and erect a mint (moneta) at some place belonging to one of the feudalities. At first the mint may have been only an exchange, the profits of which, however, in the Middle Ages were often very considerable, and accrued to the lord. Then he was permitted to have coins struck bearing his portrait, but had to maintain the uniform standard. At length these feudal lords obtained the privilege of coining without any restrictions. When this was done uniformity in the currency of the empire was at an end, a great diversity in the coineage was rendered possible, and the right of coining, instead of being a prerogative of the emperor, became a privilege of every feudatory. These sought to exploit this privilege as a productive source of income by constantly debasing and changing the coin-replaced, early in the twelfth century, in some parts of Germany, by very thin but rather large silver coins, made with one die, showing the same design, in relief on one side and depressed on the other. These coins, especially in the beginning, were carefully executed and not without artistic merit. The city of Halle in Swabia (Wurttemberg) issued a small fractional coin which had a wide circulation, and was called Heller from the place of its origin. In some respects the evolution of French coinage resembles that of German: here too we find, in the tenth century, coinages of lay and ecclesiastical barons (the archbishops of Vienne, Arles, Reims, etc. in particular), characterized by a fixed type (type immobile) which is maintained unaltered for a long period. But by the close of the Middle Ages this coinage is confined to a very few powerful feudalities and in comparison with the royal coinage, is no longer of importance. From France we have the chaise d'or, a gold coin that was also largely minted in other countries; it represents the king seated upon a Gothic throne. In England sterlings and nobles were struck, both of them often counterfeited. Coins of the archbishops of Canterbury and York are extant. In Italy, because of its numerous political divisions, we find a diversity of coinages similar to that of Germany. The scarcity of coins of ecclesiastical mints is noticeable: with the exception of some isolated examples and the series of Aquileia, Trent, and Trieste, we have only the papal coinages, which, following chiefly the Byzantine model, begin with Adrian I, but do not become important until Clement V (the first of whose coins, however, were struck at Avignon). While eastern Europe was for the most part under the influence of Byzantine, the Crusaders nevertheless brought Western types into the states founded by them in the Orient. Mohammedan coinage appears only about the year 700; these coins, because the Koran forbids pictorial representations, bear only texts from the Koran and, generally, precise statements concerning the mint, the mint-master, and the date of coinage.

D. Modern Coins.—With the beginning of modern times, partly as the result of the discovery of America and the exploitation of its silver deposits, large silver pieces appear everywhere in great numbers. As a natural consequence of this, we find greater care bestowed upon the execution of the work, more legible characters in the inscriptions, and increased attention to the pictorial representations (portraits and coats-of-arms). Several of the Renaissance issues, particularly the papal coins, are reckoned among the foremost works of art of that time. In the course of the last few centuries, countries which had not come under the influence of the civilization of the Middle Ages enter into numismatic relations with the others, e.g., Russia and the Far East, China having coins of the most extraordinary shapes, some perforated, some in the form of tuning-forks, sabres, etc.; Siam, lumps of twisted silver wire.

While during the earlier centuries the monetary systems of the older civilized countries of Europe generally developed along the lines established in the course of the Middle Ages, the great political and economic revolutions of the nineteenth century brought into being new forces which had their effect on the monetary systems. While the changed relations of the German-speaking peoples resulted in a variation of their curiae (the mark in Germany, krone in Austria, gulden in Holland, franc in Switzerland), the unification of Italy, on the other hand, resulted in a uniform Italian monetary system (lira). But economic conditions have produced even more lasting results than political. On the 23rd of December, 1865, France, Italy, Belgium, and Switzerland formed the Latin Union, which was joined in 1868 by Greece, agreeing upon a uniform regulation of the coinage of these states on the basis of the French monetary system. This system has now been adopted by a large number of states, which have not themselves joined the Latin monetary Union—Rumania, Bulgaria, Servia, Finland, Spain, and, at least nominally, many of the Central and South American republics, which were formerly Spanish colonies, and furthermore a number of smaller European states. Austria-Hungary and Russia are also approximating to this system. Another monetary union was formed in 1873 and includes Sweden, Denmark, and Norway, the monetary union being the Scandinavian Krone. The Portuguese monetary system is still in force in Brazil, its former colony. Even without any formal convention, a coin may gain currency in foreign lands. Thus the Mexican dollar, which in name and value is an offshoot of the German monetary system, is current coin on the farther shore of the Pacific Ocean, in the maritime provinces of China, in Japan, Siam, and part of the Malay Archipelago; it influences and even many of the African maritime provinces. The Indian rupee, too, has gained currency on the shores of the ocean opposite the land of its origin, on the coasts of South Africa, Southern Asia, and the Malay peninsula. A good example of the crossing of economic and political interests is furnished by Canada, where the English sovereign is legal tender, although Canadian currency follows the standards of the United States.

While the coins now in circulation in Austria and Hungary are valid as currency in Liechtenstein and Montenegro and vice versa, an Austrian coin long since put out of circulation in Austria itself, known as the Maria-Teresien taler, and bearing the date 1780, is even now the most important commercial currency in Central Africa, the Sudan, Tripoli, and Arabia. The high degree of perfection which had been attained during the last decades in the technique of coinage gave rise, on the one hand, to a number of experiments with coinage (coins made of aluminum, Russian coins of platinum, Belgian pierced coins, English coins of two metles) most of which, however, had no decisive success. On the other hand, it is quite possible to pay greater attention to the artistic side of coinage, as is evidenced by the latest issues of the French and Italian mints.

II. MEDALS.—The term medal (medalia in Florence = i denier) is applied to pieces of metal, usually circular, which, though issued by a mint, are not intended as a medium of payment. Their material, form, mode of manufacture, and historical evidence prove that they were originally coins, though altered conditions and needs, both artistic and cultural, have made them independent. Their purpose is to commemorate important events in the history of a nation, so much so that attempts have been made to write histories based upon and illustrated by the series of medals of some individual or of a whole country. Occasions for the issue of medals are found in an accession to the throne, a declaration of war, a confirmation of a treaty, the conclusion of a peace, or an alliance, the completion of a public building; it has also been very extensively used by sovereigns for presentation to persons whom they wished to honour, and in such cases was often a veritable gem of the goldsmith's art. On the other hand, a medal has often been presented by subjects to their sovereign on such occasions as his marriage, in token of homage. But as an expression of the culture of a people the private medal possesses much greater interest, and in this field the German medal of the Renaissance and the following centuries furnishes the most numerous examples. Portrait medals played the part now taken by photography. Medals stamped with coats-of-arms also serve to represent private individuals, and are sometimes put to practical use as tokens, buttons for livresses, etc. They were not used for betrothals, or marriages, silver or golden weddings, births and baptisms, and there are a large number of sponsors' christening gifts in the shape of coins or medals (patrofennisse) made expressly for the purpose and inscribed with the names of the infant and the godparent, the place and date of baptism, and generally a pious maxim. These Patrofennisse were often put into rich settings to be worn as ornaments, and were handed down as heirlooms from generation to generation. Not only the entrance into life but also death is recorded in medals; and many such pieces contain detailed biographical notices.

Very often the medal serves a religious purpose; in Kremnitz and especially in Joachimstal extensive series of such religious coinages were struck. Typological representations found great favour, the one side showing the Old Testament type, the other the New Testament antitype. The Reformation produced many medals embossed with Biblical phrases. A favourite subject on religious medals was the head of Christ: the city of Vienna has four future medallists bearing this design as public marks of distinction. At Easter medals with the Paschal Lamb, at Christmas others with the Infant Jesus, were given as presents. Of the saint St. George was frequently represented, on the Georgstaler and Georgiusdecac, and a superstition prevailed that the wearing of a medal with the image of St. George was a protection against wounds. A similar superstition was connected with the representation of St. Roch and St. Sebastian or of St. Rosalia, as also of the cross with the brazen serpent, as a protection against the plague. There is also an interminable series of wholly superstitious amulets, astrological and alchemistic coins, which profess to be the product of an alchemistic transmutation from a base into a precious metal. The imperial coin-cabinet at Vienna contains one of these pieces, probably the largest medal in existence, weighing about 15 lbs. avoirdupois; and adorned with the portraits of forty ancestors of the Emperor Leopold I, in whose presence the transmutation is supposed to have taken place. Thus the numerous and manifold purposes of which the medal has been employed faithfUly reflects the cultural conditions which led to its coinage and are a source of information that has not yet been fully appreciated.

True medals were unknown to antiquity; their functions were in many respects—particularly as memorial of important events—performed by coins. In contrast with the monotonous and generally inartistic coins of the present day, the coins of antiquity, and more particularly those of Greece, were masterpieces of the art of the die-engraver, who was not compelled to seek other opportunities to display his skill. Among the Romans conditions were analogous, with the exception that the medallions of the emperors approximate somewhat to the character of our medals, although they are, as a rule, duplicates of the legal monetary unit; the token (tessera), struck for the games, and the contorniates are even more closely related to the medal. The few gold issues of the Emperor Louis the Pious (814-40) also resemble medals, and in the further course of the Middle Ages we meet with a large number of coins which were evidently intended to commemorate some event in history, although their devices are often very difficult to explain; there is many a puzzle here still awaiting solution. As the symbol of Henry the Lion, the powerful Duke of Bavaria and Saxony, the lion plays an important role on his coins. But his adversary, Otto of Wittelsbach, who, when Henry the Lion had been outlawed, received the Duchy of Bavaria, employed this symbol also and issued deniers which picture him in pursuit of a lion or with the severed head of a lion in his hand. Coins are also very frequently used to commemorate encomiums, and these bear a representation of the liege lord from whom the kneeling vassal receives the gonfalon. A Polish briate perpetuates the memory of a pilgrimage of Duke Boleslay II to the tomb of St. Adalbert in Gnesen. A denier of Ladislau I of Bohemia shows the repulsive head of Satan with a descriptive legend on one side, and on the other a church. Luscinia was able to account for this device as follows: after a succession of serious elemental disturbances in Bohemia there came, in the midst of a terrible hurricane, a meteoric shower, during which many persons declared they beheld Satan in human form near the castle; this denier was then struck, bearing on either side the head of Satan and the Church of God. Such coins as these in some measure serve the purpose of commemorative medals.

The first true medal appeared in Italy towards the close of the fourteenth century. Francesco II Carrara, Lord of Padua, had two medals struck, in imitation of the ancient Roman medallions: one, in memory of his father, Francesco I, recalls the later medalterially diminished by that fact. Both in composition and in execution he has hardly been equalled, as, for instance, in his representations of the nobler animals, the lion, eagle, horse.

Pisano travelled through the whole of Italy, and portrayed the prominent princes and influential men of his time; he made the medallic art so popular that the forgers, in all the important art centres of Italy, engaged in the manufacture of medals. Such were Matteo de' Pasti, an admirably artist at the court of Rimini; the Venetians Giovanni Boldo and Gentile Bellini, the latter of whom made a portrait-medal for the sultan Mehemet; the Mantuan Sperandio, the most prolific medallist of the fifteenth century, and many others. At this time, too, the stamped medal returns to prominence. In Rome Benvenuto Cellini and, after him, Caradosso, and especially the masters of the papal mint are deserving of mention. The imitations of the bronze coinages of the Roman emperors by Cavino are truly admirable. Finally, in the somewhat later period, Italian medallists are found in the service of foreign princes: Jacopo da Trezzi in the Netherlands, the two Abondio in Germany. The Italian medal exerts the most powerful influence upon the development of the older French productions. The Italian Laurana in the latter half of the fifteenth century struck the first French medals, and the works of the next period clearly show Italian characteristics. Not until the seventeenth century did a new style appear, in which the drapery especially is admirably reproduced; the most prominent artists were Jean Richier, at Metz, and later, Guillaume Duprè and Jean Warin.

In Germany, the earliest large silver pieces were coined at Hall in the Tyrol, under the influence of the Hall marriage; and to Gian Marco Cavallio, who was invited to Hall as engraver to the mint, these coins owe their important position in the history of art and their demonstrable influence upon many of the medals of Germany. These, the oldest specimens of the German medallic art, being at the same time coins, were stamped; but, like the Italian, the German medal does not reach its highest perfection in stamped, but in cast pieces. A considerable number of models made of boxwood, of Kehlheim stone, and, later, of wax are still extant. These portraits in wood or stone were at first regarded as final, and only by degrees did they come to be used as models for casting in metal. These cast medals, which made their appearance at the art-centres of Germany (in the beginning of the sixteenth century, Augsburg and Nuremberg) likewise owe their origin to the Italian medal. But only their origin; the further development of the German medal follows entirely original and independent lines until it reaches a degree of excellence, on a level with the Italian. It is true that the Germans fail to produce the magnificent designs with their wealth of figures that we find on the reverse of Italian medals; instead, we find, more commonly, excellent representations of coats of arms. The great strength of the German medal lies in the loving care bestowed upon the execution of the accurate portraits on the obverse; and this accords with the purpose of the medal, which was much more widely distributed among the prominent families of the middle classes than was the case in Italy.

The German medal reaches its prime soon after the year 1500, considerably later than the Italian: among the oldest examples that have come down to us are those of Albrecht Dürer. Many of the artists give us no clue at all to their identity or sign themselves by marks or symbols that are often difficult to interpret. It has now become possible, however, to assign definitely a long series of very valuable medals to Peter Flötner, a master of Nuremberg, who must therefore be considered as one of the foremost of all medallists; he is closely followed by Matthias Gebel. Other noteworthy medallists of this period are Hans Daucher, most of whose work was done for the Court of the Palatinate; Hans Schwart of Nuremberg, the "best counterfeiter in wood", who executed a large number of works for the members of the Diet of Augsburg of 1518; Jacob Stampfer, in Switzerland; Friedrich Hagenauer, one of the most popular artists; Joachim Deschler, who finally settled in Austria, where, especially in the mints of Vienna, Kremsnitz, and Joachimsthal, a large number of medals were struck at this period, not all of them, however, to the advantage of the medallic art; Hans Reinhard, from whom we have a number of very carefully chased pieces, and Tobias Wolf, both in Saxony. By the end of the sixteenth century the German medal has clearly passed its zenith and becomes dependent upon foreign, and, at first, especially Italian, works. In the Netherlands the art attained a high degree of perfection. The great names here are Stephanus Hollandicus and, somewhat later, Konrad Bloc, both of the second half of the sixteenth century, and Peter van Abeele of the seventeenth century. In England the medallists are for the most part foreigners; of the native artists, who do not appear until very late, the most deserving of mention are Th. Simon and William and L. C. Lyon. Caspar and Simon Pense on the other hand attain great artistic skill in the production of very carefully engraved small, thin silver pieces. The other states are of less importance; they employed for the most part foreign artists. The high artistic level which the medal attained in Italy and Germany at the beginning of the modern age could not be maintained permanently. For while excellent pieces of work were produced here and there, medals as well as coins, as works of art, deteriorated more and more. Not until after the middle of the nineteenth century did the art receive a fresh impetus and that first in France. Considering merely its external manifestations, it is possible even to fix the exact date of the beginning of this movement. On 2 May, 1888, the chemist Dumas, president of the Comité Consultatif des Graveurs de the Paris mint delivered an address pointing out the defects which prevented the artistic development of the medal, and, as president of the mint, appealing for their amendment. He particularly mentioned the frequent use of the lettering, the polishing, the high rim etc. If this address dealt rather with the outer form, a new view of the true purpose of the medal had already been gradually created. Following the productions of C. Paul Duvin, Chapuz, above all Herbert Ponsarnes (the first to oppose the polishing of medals) and later Degeorges, Chaplains, and Daniel Dupuis, Oscar Roty, by far the most distinguished of the French medalists, won distinction. He excels not only as a portraitist, but more particularly in the composition of the reverse: his fine allegories (e.g., on the medal for merit in connexion with the education of girls—the Republic teaching maidens, the future mothers of France) recall the artists of the Quattrocento, which he carefully studied, but did not, as a rule, directly imitate. Just as the execution of the medal is preceded by long and careful deliberation as to how the fundamental idea he wished to work out (Ponsarnes seems to have led the way in this) so the execution itself receives to the very last moment the most careful attention. Only the artist’s hand must touch his work.

The French medal has thus attained great results, even when judged merely on its technical merits.

Independently of the French movement, a medallistic revival has begun in Austria. Anton Scharff brought about a restoration of the medallistic style and an emancipation from the rigid conventual forms; working side by side with him are Josef Thaunthaym, the elder, Stefan Schwartz, a master of the technique of the chiselled medal, and Franz Xavier Pawlik. Recently Rudolf Marschall has won a high reputation as a portraitist, and received the commission to execute medals for both Leo XIII and Pius X. The French and Viennese medallists have called forth in other countries an activity which has already resulted in many beautiful specimens of medallistic art.

RUDOLF MARSHALL

Gold Medal of Leo XIII by Rudolf Marshall

Nunc Dimittis (The Cantiche of Simeon), found in St Luke’s Gospel (ii, 29–32), is the last in historical sequence of the three great Canticles of the New Testament, the other two being the Magnificat (Cantiche of Mary) and the Benedictus (Cantiche of Zachary). All three are styled, by way of eminence, the "Evangelical Canticles" (see CANTICLE). The title is formed from the opening words in the Latin Vulgate, "Nunc dimittis servum tuum, Domine" etc. ("Now thou dost dismiss thy servant, O Lord" etc.). The circumstances under which Simeon uttered his song, petition, thanksgiving, and prediction, are narrated by St Luke (ii, 21–35) (see CANDLEMASS). The words following those quoted above, "according to thy word in peace", are explained by v. 20: "And he had received an answer from the Most High, that he should not see death, before he had seen the Christ of the Lord." Brief though the Cantiche is, it abounds in Old Testament allusions. Thus, in the following verses, "Because of the enemy and the salvation" alludes to Isaias, li, 10, rendered afterwards by St Luke (iii, 6), "And all flesh shall see the salvation of God". Verse 31, "Verily he hast prepared before the face of all peoples" accords with the Psalms.
ist (xxvii. 2); and verse 32, "A light to the revelation of the Gentiles, and the glory of thy people Israel," recalls Isaiah, xii. 6.

The text of the Nunc Dimitis is given in full in the brief evening prayer found in the Apostolic Constitution, Book VII, xvi. 1, P.G. 1, 1057. In the Roman Office, the canticle is assigned to Complin. If St. Benedict did not originate this canonical Hour, he gave to it its liturgical character; but he nevertheless did not include the Canticle, which was afterwards incorporated into the official Roman Rite, where it is preceded by the beautiful responsory, "In manus tuas, Domine, commendo spiritum meum." Into thy hands, O Lord, I commend my spirit;" etc.—all this harmonizing exquisitely with the spirit of the Nunc Dimitis and with the general character of the closing Hour of the Office. In the blessing of the candles on the feast of the Purification of the Blessed Virgin, the Canticle, of course, receives great prominence, both in its text and in the references to Simon in the preceding prayers. Its last verse, "Iamne ad revelationem," etc., forms the Antiphon which not only precedes and follows the Canticle, but also precedes every verse of it and the Gloria Patri in Votive Mass. The opening notes of the concluding antiphon, "Iamne ad revelationem," are further emphasized by the lighted candles of Candlemas. The complete Canticle also forms the Tract in the Mass of the feast, when the 2 February follows Septuagesima.

II. T. HENRY.

Nuncio, an ordinary and permanent representative of the pope, vested with both political and ecclesiastical powers, accredited to the court of a sovereign or ecclesiastical territory, with the duty of guarding the interests of the Holy See. The special character of a nuncio, as distinguished from other papal envoys (such as legates, collectors), consists in this: that his office is specifically defined and limited to a definite territory (his nunciature), wherein he must reside, his mission is general, embracing all the interests of the Holy See; his office is permanent, requiring the appointment of a successor when one incumbent is recalled, and his mission includes both diplomatic and ecclesiastical powers. Nuncios, in the strict sense of the word, first appear in the sixteenth century. The office, however, was not created at any definite moment or by any one papal ordinance, but gradually developed under the influence of various historical factors into the form in which we find it in the sixteenth century. The first permanent representatives of the Holy See at secular courts were the aposiopetici, etc. (q. v.; see also Legate) at the Byzantine Court. In the Middle Ages the popes sent, for the settlement of important ecclesiastical or political matters, legates (legati a littere, q. v.); with definite instructions and at times with ordinary jurisdiction. The officials, sent from the thirteenth century for the purpose of collecting taxes either for the Roman Court or for the crusades, were called nuntii, nuntius apostolici. During the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries this title was given also to papal envoys entrusted with certain other affairs of an ecclesiastical or diplomatic nature. Frequently they were given the right of granting certain privileges, favours, and benefits. During the Great Western Schism and the period of the reform councils (fifteenth century), such embassies were more frequently resorted to by the Holy See. Then were established the permanent diplomatic legations of temporal sovereigns. They finally arose in the sixteenth century the permanent nunciatures of the Holy See.

The exact date of the establishment of many of the nunciatures is not easy to determine, as it is impossible to fix exactly in all cases when an earlier type of papal envoy was replaced by a nuncio proper, and especially as in the beginning we find interruptions in the succession of envoys who, owing to their powers and their office, must be regarded as real nuncios. The necessity of resisting Protestantism was a special factor in the increase of the nunciatures. After the Council of Trent they became the chief agents of the pope in their efforts to check the spread of heresy and to carry out true reform. The fact that in 1537 the papal correspondence with foreign powers, previously carried on by the pope's private secretary, was handed over by Paul III to the vice-chancellor, Cardinal Alexander Farnese, was the chief reason for the increase in the number of nuncios, which led to the permanence of nunciatures. Thereby the political correspondence of the Holy See lost its somewhat private character, and was entrusted to the nuncio, in whose hands the nuncio was henceforth to be in constant communication. The popes also employed extraordinary envoys for special purposes: Angelo Leonini, sent to Venice by Alexander VI in 1500, is commonly regarded as the first nuncio, as we understand the term to-day. In Spain the collector-general of the papal exchequer, Giovanni Ruffo del Teodoli, was also given diplomatic powers: he resided in the country, and discharged despatched by the Holy See to offices from 1506 to 1518 or 1519. As his successors were appointed collectors-general with fiscal, and political representatives with diplomatic powers, so that from thenceforth the Spanish nunciation may be regarded as permanent. The beginning of a papal nunciature in Germany dates from 1511 when Julius II sent Lorenzo Campeggio to the Imperial Court. His mission was ratified in 1513 by Leo X, and from 1530 he resided in Vienna. He often accompanied Emperor Charles V, even when he resided outside the Empire. Another German nunciature was established in 1524, when Lorenzo Pimpinelli was sent to the court of King Ferdinand of Austria. The first real nuncio in France was Leone Ludovico di Canossa (1514-17). The French nunciation continued from the Council of Trent to the Revolution. After the Council of Trent a number of new nunciatures were created. In Italy diplomatic representatives were appointed for Piedmont, Milan, Tuscany (Florence), and for Naples, where the nunciation underwent the same development as in Spain. The nunciature entrusted with the duty of collecting the papal taxes received also diplomatic powers, and was recognized in this capacity by Philip II in 1569. Portugal and Poland likewise received permanent nuncios shortly after the Council of Trent. To foster Catholicism and to re-establish the nunciation. New nunciatures were erected in the eastern parts of the German Empire. Thus, in 1573, Bartolomeo Portia was made nuncio of Salzburg, Tyrol, and Bavaria, although no further successor was appointed after 1538. In 1580 Germano Malaspina was appointed first nuncio of Styria, but this nunciation was discontinued in 1621. Bishop Bonomini arrived in Switzerland in 1579, and up to 1581 with great success introduced ecclesiastical reforms. In 1586 Giovanni Battista Sambonio succeeded him, whereupon the Swiss nunciation became permanent.
In Cologne a nunciature was erected in 1684 for northwestern Germany and the Rhine, but in 1596 the Netherlands was detached from the Nunciature of Cologne and received its own nuncio, who was to reside in Brussels (Nunciature of Flanders). The jurisdiction of the Nunciature of Flanders extended also to the English missions. Thus, toward the end of the sixteenth century, nunciatures were fully developed. At this point concerning the rights of the pope in the erecting of nunciatures and the competency of the nuncios themselves arose in 1785, when Pius VI determined to establish a new nunciature in Munich at the request of Charles Theodore, Elector of Bavaria. The elector desired the appointment of a special nuncio because princes subject to the emperor alone were bishops of Bavarian dioceses, but did not reside in Bavaria, thus greatly impeding the exercise of ecclesiastical administration. The three spiritual electors (the Archbishops of Cologne, Mainz, and Trier) protested on the ground that thereby their metropolitan rights would be violated. The pope, however, appointed Zoglio, titular Archbishop of Athens, as nuncio, and to him Charles Theodore ordered his clergy to have recourse in future in all ecclesiastical matters within his jurisdiction. The three electors, imbued with Febronianism (q. v.), formed a coalition with the Archbishop of Salzburg, hoping to recover the former primitive metropolitan rights by ignoring the nuncio and by giving decisions and granting dispensations on their own authority, even in cases canonically reserved to the pope. At first, they would not even consult them, they appealed to Joseph II, who, in accordance with his principles, heartily approved of their efforts, pledged them his full support, declared that he would never allow the jurisdiction of the bishops of the empire to be curtailed, and that consequently he would recognize the nuncio only in their political character. At the Congress of Ems (q. v.), the three electors archbishops presented their credentials. Despite this protest, Paces and Zoglio continued to exercise their spiritual jurisdiction in Cologne and Munich respectively, received appeals from the decisions of ecclesiastical courts, and granted dispensations in cases reserved to the pope. On the other hand the four archbishops arbitrarily extended their own authority, granting dispensations from solemn religious vows as well as from matrimonial impediments, and granting ecclesiastical tribunals of their own. The emperor brought the controversy before the Imperial Diet of Ratisbon in 1788, but without definite results. The archbishops, opposed both by the French and by other countries, a papal delegations being asked to renew communications with the pope, who, on 14 Nov., 1789, issued an extensive document giving a detailed exposition of the rights of the Holy See and those of its envoys (C. D. N. Fit pp. VI. Con some sa ad Metropolitane Mognutini, Treviren, Colonion, et Salissurgen., supra Nuntiaturis apostolicis, Rome, 1789). Frederick William II, King of Prussia, also recognized the jurisdiction of the Nuncio of Cologne in the territory of Cleves, and in Mann his ambassadors opposed the pretensions of the emperor. The French revolution ended the dispute. Owing to the political development of Italy in the nineteenth century, the nunciatures disappeared completely. With the dissolution of the Holy Roman Empire the Imperial German nunciature became the Austrian nunciature, when Francis II assumed the title of Emperor of Austria. The partition of Poland ended the nunciature there. The first state outside of Europe to receive a papal representative was Brazil. At first an internuncio was assigned to that country, but of later years a nuncio has resided there. At present there are four papal nunciatures of the first class, four of the second, two internunciatures, and several delegations. The nunciatures of the first class are: (1) Vienna; (2) Paris, where the nunciature was re-established after the Revolution, after Cardinal Caprara had first been sent thither as legatus a latere by Pius VII. Since the rupture of diplomatic relations between France and the Holy See in 1904, this office has had no incumbents; (3) Madrid, where in 1833 the Council of Trent, has been the permanent residence of the papal nuncio for Spain. It has a special tribunal, the Rota, which serves only as a court of appeals from the diocesan and metropolitan courts, but cannot handle any cases of first instance. Litigants are free to appeal from its decisions to the sovereign pontiff; (4) Lisbon, which had at first a nunciature only of the second class. It included a special court for ecclesiastical matters, but this was abolished at the beginning of the nineteenth century. From the second half of the sixteenth century Portugal always had a nuncio, although disputes arose at different times. The nunciatures of the second class are: (1) the Swiss nunciature which, in the eighteenth century, comprised the Dioceses of Constance, Basel, Constance, Sion, and Lausanne. Since the religious troubles of 1793 there has been no incumbent; (2) since the beginning of the nineteenth century the only nunciature in Germany has been that of Munich (the last nuncio of Cologne was Annibale della Genga, later on Pope Leo XIII); (3) Brussels, the residence of the Nuncio of Belgium, the successor to the former Nuncio of Flanders. During the time of the French occupation this position was vacant. It was only in 1829 that Coppabi was sent to Brussels as internuncio; in 1914, it was again raised to a nunciature. The first nuncio was appointed in 1843 by Gioacchino Pecci, afterwards Leo XIII. In 1880 the Liberal Ministry severed all diplomatic relations with the Holy See; the old status was restored, when in 1885 the Catholic party regained power; (4) Brazil. In 1807 Lorenzo Capei, the Nuncio of Portugal, followed John VI in his flight to Brazil. In 1829 a special internuncio, Felice Os- sani, was appointed for Brazil, and in 1840 the nunciation of diplomatic relations between the Holy See and the other states of South America. In 1902 the papal Internuncio of Brazil was raised to the dignity of nuncio.

The internunciatures are: (1) the Internunciature of Holland and Luxemburg. Since the separation of these countries, the internuncio receives distinct credentials for the two governments. From the time of the Peace of Conventions at the Hague, Holland has only a chargé d'affaires; (2) the Internunciature of Argentina, Uruguay, and Paraguay, which was erected in 1900. There had been accredited to these countries a papal delegate since 1847, and since 1871, Mgr. Baril, had been sent in 1851 to what was then New Granada. The Apostolic delegations form a lower rank of papal representatives of diplomatic and ecclesiastical character. There are five Apostolic Delegations in South and Central America: (1) Chile, (2) Columbia, (3) Costa-Rica, (4) Ecuador, Bolivia, and Peru, (5) San Domingo, Haiti and Venezuela, all erected during the nineteenth century. Owing to repeated religious troubles these delegations have often been vacant. Costa-Rica has been without a delegate for a considerable period. It is necessary to distinguish these Apostolic delegations of a diplomatic character from those which are merely ecclesiastical.

The powers to papal nuncios correspond to the two-fold character of their mission. As the diplomatic representatives of the pope, they treat with the sovereign or head of republic to whom they are accredited. With their mission they are given special credentials as well as special instructions, whether of a public or of a private nature. They also receive a secret code and enjoy the same privileges as ambassadors. Their appearances in public are regulated in conformity with general diplomatic customs. They also have certain distinctions, especially that of being ex-officio dean of the entire diplomatic body, within their nunciature, and therefore on public occasions take precedence of all diplomatic representatives. In turn nuncios and delegates enjoy a similar right of precedence over all other diplomatic representatives of equal rank. This privilege of papal envoys was expressly recognized by the Congress of Vienna in 1815 and is universally observed. Nuncios enjoy the title of "Excellency" and the same special honours as ambassadors. In addition to their diplomatic position nuncios also have an ecclesiastical mission, and possess ordinary ecclesiastical jurisdiction. The latter point is especially stated in the "Responso" of Pius VI to the Rhenish archbishops, and was reaffirmed by Pius IX in a letter to Archbishop Darboy of Paris in 1863, as also in a letter of 15 April, 1888, to the Cardinal Secretary of State Jacobini addressed to Spain.

The ample ecclesiastical faculties, granted in the Middle Ages to the legates a latere and other papal envoys, had led to abuses: the Council of Trent, therefore, enacted that papal envoys (legati a latere, nuncios, gubernatores ecclesiasticus, aut ali quorumcumque facultatem vigerent) were not to impede bishops or to disturb their ordinary jurisdiction or to proceed against ecclesiastical persons until the bishop had first been applied to and had shown himself negligent (Sess. XXIV, cap. xx de refer.).

From the special faculties in conferring ecclesiastical benefices and in granting spiritual favours, the nuncios had the power of instituting proceedings and giving decisions in cases of ecclesiastical administration and discipline reserved to the pope. The nuncio's special courts, principalia, were the representatives of the pope, and as such are the organs through which he exercises his ordinary and immediate supreme jurisdiction. It is their special duty to supervise ecclesiastical administration and to decide on the reports to the cardinal secretary of state; they grant dispensations in cases reserved to the pope, carry on the process of information for the nomination of new bishops, give permission for reading forbidden books, and enjoy the privilege of granting minor indulgences. In special cases they are delegated for the settlement of important ecclesiastical affairs. In virtue of their position certain ecclesiastical honours are due to them as laid down in the ceremonial Epigraphon: Pius X introduced a change in the practice hitherto followed with regard to nuncios, so that now they hold their position longer than formerly, and a nuncio of the first class, after his recall, is not regularly raised to the cardinalate.

Although the individual dispatches vary greatly in worth, yet, as a whole, the nunciature reports form a very important source from the sixteenth century (especially during the sixties and seventies of the century) both for the history of the Church and for political history. Only a very small proportion either of the reports made by papal legates in the second half of the fifteenth century or of the documents of the sixteenth century have been preserved. From the second decade of the sixteenth century a much greater number survive, and from the middle of the century, the reports of individual nuncios frequently exist in unbroken sequence. Most of the manuscript reports are in the Vatican archives, and are classified in sixteen series, according to the nunciatures. The classification does not agree, however, with the present arangement of the nunciatures given as follows: Spain, Portugal, France, Belgium, England, Germany (the imperial nunciature), Cologne, Bavaria, Switzerland, Poland, Savoy, Genoa, Venice, Florence, Naples, and Malta. Individual reports are also in other divisions of the archives. The nunciature reports brought together in the archives of the Vatican show serious gaps, especially for the sixteenth century. The reason is that the diplomatic correspondence of the Curia in that era was not systematically brought together and preserved in a papal archive, but was frequently purloined by the copyists, cardinal favourites, and their secretaries, just as the letters dispatched from Rome were retained by the nuncios and their heirs, and thus became dispersed to some extent in family archives. For example, the greater part of the nunciature reports pertaining to the reign of Paul III (1534-40) are now in the state archives of Naples, to which they came along with the archives of the Farmese family. Other collections of reports are to be found in various Italian archives. The reports preserved are either the original drafts made by the nuncios themselves, or the original letters drawn up in accordance with these, or copies of the original letters. As regards the reports written in cipher, a key can generally be found.

On account of the great historical importance of the nunciature reports an effort has been made, since the opening of the Vatican archives for general research, to pub-

Nunez, Pedro, mathematician and astronomer, b. at Alcacer-do-Sol, 1492; d. at Coimbra, 1577. He studied ancient languages, philosophy, and medicine at Lisbon and mathematics at Salamanca. In 1519 he went as inspector-general of the school of arts at Goa, India, returning to become in 1529 royal cosmographer. After lecturing for three years at Lisbon, a professorship of higher mathematics was established for him at the University of Coimbra, and he continued to teach from 1544 to 1562. His utterances on science plunged him into discussions with foreign savants, particularly the French mathematician, Oronce Fine. Having been in the reigning family, he was enabled to spend his last years in ease.

To mathematics, astronomy, and navigation, Nunez made important contributions. He devised a method for obtaining the highest common divisor of two algebraic expressions. In his "De crepusculis liber unus" (Lisbon, 1542; "De arte navigandi") he announced a new and accurate solution of the astronomical problem of minimum twilight and suggested an instrument for the measurement of the angles. The instrument consisted essentially of forty-six concentric circles divided into quadrants by two diameters at right angles to each other, each quadrant being divided into equal parts, the number of parts diminishing from ninety for the outermost arc to forty-five for the innermost. If one side of any angle is made to coincide with one of the radii, the vertex of the angle falling at the centre of the circles, the other side of the angle will fall on or near some point of division of one of the arcs. If then a is the number of parts intercepted and n is the whole number of parts in the relevant arc, the magnitude of the angle will be 90 x n degrees. In "De arte navigandi" he announced his discovery of "rumbus," a method of cutting the meridians at a constant angle. His collected works were published under the title "Petri Nonni Opera" (Basle, 1592). Among them are: "Tratado da esfera com a theoria do sol e da lua e o primeiro livro da geographia de Claudio Ptolomeo Alexandrino" (Lisbon, 1537); "De crepusculis liber unus" (Lisbon, 1542); "De arte atque ratione navigandi" (Coimbra, 1549); "De erratis Orontii Finei" (Coimbra, 1549); "Annotatio in extrema verba capitii de climatibus" (Cologne, 1666); "Livro de algebra em arithmetic e geometria" (Antwerp, 1567); "Accuracy e Mechanica de Aristoteles e its theories do planetas de Purbach com a arte de Navegar" (Combra, 1578).

HISP. L. ORIGIN AND HISTORY.—The institution of nuns and sisters, who devote themselves in various religious orders to the practice of a life of perfection, dates from the first ages of the Church, and women may claim with a certain pride that they were the first to embrace the religious state for its own sake, without regard to missionary work and ecclesiastical functions proper to men. St. Paul speaks of widows, those who were called to certain kinds of church work (I Thess. 4: 9), and of virgins (I Cor. 7: 25) whom he describes as "those who devoted their chastity and their devotion to the service of the Lord. In the earliest times Christian women directed their fervor, some towards the service of the sanctuary, others to the attendance of poor. The virgins were remarkable for their perfect and perpetual chastity which the Catholic Church has consecrated by the ceremony of profession (Mat. 19: 8)."

In the earliest times they were the called to the profession of Christian women. St. Athanasius, in his "Apologia ad Constantium" (sec. 33), mentions the "sisters of the Church" ("Apolog. ad Constantum")." (Pont. 3: 52, 500). St. Cyprian describes a virgin who had broken her vows as an adulteress (Ep. 62. Migne. P. L. 4, 370). Tertullian distinguishes between those virgins who took the veil purely in the assembly of the faithful, and others known to God alone: the veil seems to have been simply that of married women. Virgin vowed to the service of God, at first continued to live with their families, but as early as the end of the third century there were community houses known as parabatas; and certainly at the beginning of the same century the virgins formed a special class in the Church, receiving Holy Communion before the laity. The office of Good Friday in which the virgins are mentioned later, the Litany of the Saints, in which they are invoked with the widows, show traces of this classification. They were sometimes united among the deaconesses for the baptism of adult women and to exercise the functions which St. Paul had reserved for widows of sixty years.

When the persecutions of the third century drove many into the desert, the solitary life produced many heroines; and when the monks began to live in monasteries, there were also communities of women. St. Pachomius (292-346) built a convent in which a number of religious women lived with his sister. St. Jerome made famous the monastery of St. Paula at Bethlehem. St. Augustine addressed to the nuns a letter of direction from which subsequently his rule was taken. There were monasteries of virgins or nuns at Rome, throughout Italy, Gaul, Spain, and the West. The great founders or reformers of monastic or more generally religious life, saw their rules adopted by women. The nuns of Egypt and Syria cut their hair, a practice not introduced until later into the West. Monasteries of women were generally situated at a distance from those of men; St. Pachomius insisted on this separation, also St. Benedict. There were, however, common houses. It was also an advantage for women and the other for men, more frequently adjoining houses for the two sexes. Justinian abolished these double houses in the East, placed an old man to look after the temporal affairs of the convent, and appointed a deacon or a young woman, who ministered to the world, took vows of obedience, dressed in black, but were not bound to give of their property. Conti and a certain religious profession was founded of married women whose husbands were in Sacred Orders, or even received episcopal consecration.

Here in the sixth century the list of women went to the service of God included these various classes of virgins, whose solemn profession was made to the bishop, those bound by religious vows living in common, without religious prejudice. Deaconesses engaged in the service of the church, wives or widows of men in Sacred Orders. In times sometimes occupied a few years, in others the closure strictly kept in the East, was not considered indispensable in the West. Other monasteries allowed the nuns to go in and out. In Gaul and Italy the novitiate lasted one year for the first and three years for the others. In early times some gave Christian education to orphans, girls brought by their parents, and especially to those desiring to embrace a religious life. Some took the veil of virgins of their own accord, or desired to embrace the religious life, there were other sisters by their parents before they were old enough to be received. the Order of Mercy by St. Mary of Cervellone. St. Pius V took more radical measures by his constitution “Circa pastoralis”, of 25 May, 1568. Not only did he insist on the observance of the constitution of Bologna VIII, and the decree of Trent, but he compelled the tertiaries to accept the obligation of solemn vows with the pontifical enclosure. For nearly three centuries the Holy See refused all approbation to convents bound by simple vows, and in the case of most of these congregations, Carmelites, Poor Clares, Dominicans, Reformed Cistercians of La Trappe, Redemptoristines etc., or are founded independently, like the Ursulines, Visitandines, and recent religious congregations. In the regulations of 28 June, 1901, Art. 19, 52, the Holy See no longer approves of double foundations, which establish a certain subordination of the sisters to similar congregations of men.

(3) As regards their juridical condition, we distinguish: (a) nuns properly so-called, having solemn vows with papal enclosure, whose houses are monasteries; (b) nuns belonging to the old approved orders with solemn vows, but taking only simple vows by special dispensation of the Holy See; (c) sisters with simple vows dependent on the Holy See; (d) sisters under diocesan government. The house of sisters under simple vows, and the congregations themselves are canonically called conservato. These do not always fulfill all the essential conditions of the religious state. Those which do are more correctly called religious congregations than the others, which are called saepe congregatonese, saepe societates, religious congregations or parties. Nuns of the Latin Church only are considered here.

III. NUNS PROPERLY SO CALLED.—Nuns properly so-called are subject to the religious law which prevents the religious from going out (except in very rare cases, approved by the regular superior and the bishop), and also the entrance of strangers, even females, under pain of excommunication. No married woman or lay citizen is admitted to the enclosure. The right of visitation is preserved, no regulation parlor is not free, and interviews with regulars are subject to stringent rules. Though some mitigations have been introduced partly by local usage, and in certain countries, especially in the two Sicilies, the constitution “Exposit debuit” (1 January, 1883) of Gregory XIII requires that they should be re-elected every three years (see Periodica de Religiosis, n. 420, vol. 4, 158). The election must be confirmed by the prelate to whom the monastery is subject, the pope, the bishop, or the regular prior. The bishop presides over the ballot, except in the case of nuns subject to regulars, and he has always the right to be present at the election. The president collects the votes at the gratia on having jurisdiction, the abbess exercises authority over all in the house, and commands in virtue of their vows. Monasteries not exempt are subject to the jurisdiction of the bishop; exempt monasteries are placed, some under the immediate authority of the Holy See, others under that of a regular First Order. In the absence of any other formal direction, the Holy See is understood to delegate the bishop the annual visitation of monasteries immediately subject to the pope, to the exclusion of other superiors. This visitation is made by the regular prior in the case of monasteries dependent on a First Order; but the bishop has in all cases authority to insist on the maintenance of the enclosure, and to control the temporal administration; he also approves the confessors. The erection of a monastery requires the consent of the bishop, and (at least in practice nowadays) of the Apostolic See. The bishop, by himself, or in consultation with the regular superior, determines the number of nuns who can be received according to the amount

the Order of Mercy by St. Mary of Carollenos. St. Pius V took more radical measures by his constitution "Circa pastoralis" of 23 May, 1568. Not only did he connect the constitution of Bonsi-face VIII, and the decree of the Council of Trent, but compelled the tertiaries to accept the obligation of solemn vows with the pontifical enclosure. For nearly three centuries the Holy See refused all appro-bation to convents bound by such vows, and the new constitution of 1568 by his constitution "Pastoralis" of 31 May, 1631 abolished an English teaching congregation, founded by Mary Ward in 1609, which had simple vows and a superior general. This strictness led to the foundation of pious associations called secular because they had no perpetual vows, and leading a common life intended for their own personal sanctification and the practice of charity, e. g. the Daughters of Charity, founded by St. Vincent de Paul. The constitution of St. Pius V was not always strictly observed; communities exist-approved by bishops, and soon tolerated by the Holy See, new ones were formed with the sanction of the diocesan ordinaries. So great were the services rendered by these new communities to the poor, the sick, the young, and even the missions, that the Holy See expressly confirmed several constitutions, but for a long time refused to approve the congregations themselves, and the formulas of commendation or ratification contained this restriction cieti tunc approbationem consentiunt (without approbation of the constitution). As political difficulties rendered less easy the observance of solemn vows, especially for women, the Holy See from the end of the eighteenth century declined to approve any new congregations with solemn vows, and even suppressed in certain countries, Belgium and France, all solemn professions in the old orders of women. The constitution of Benedict XVI, "Quemvis jusrio" of 30 April, 1749, on the subject of the Congregation of English Virgins was the prelude to the legislation of Leo XIII, who by his constitution "Conditae" of 8 December, 1900, laid down the laws common to congregations with simple vows, dividing these into two great classes, congregations under diocesan authority, subject to the bishops, and those under pontifical law.

II. VARIOUS KINDS OF NUNS.—(1) As regards their object they may be purely contemplative, seeking personal perfection by close union with God; such are most of the strictly enclosed congregations, as Premonstratensian Canonesses, Carmelites, Poor Clares, Carmelites, Redemptorists, etc., or they may combine this with the practice of works of charity, foreign missions, like the White Sisters of Cardinal Leviger, and certain Franciscan Tertiaries; the education of young girls, like the Ursulines and Visitandines; the care of the sick, orphan, lunatic, and aged persons, like many of the congregations called Hospitalers, Sisters of Charity, Daughters of St. Vincent de Paul, and Little Sisters of the Poor. When the works of mercy are corporal, and above all carried on outside the convent, the congregations are called active. Teaching communities are classed rather among those leading a mixed life, devoting themselves to works which in themselves require union with God and contemplation. The constitution "Conditae" of Leo XIII (8 December, 1900) charges bishops not to permit sisters to open houses as hotels for the entertainment of strangers of both sexes, and to be extremely careful in authorising congregations which are on alms, Orange sick persons at their homes, or maintain infirmaries for the reception of infirm persons of both sexes, or sick persons. The Holy See, by its Constitutions (Normem 28 June, 1891) declares that it does not approve of congregations whose object is to render certain services in seminaries or colleges for male pupils, or to teach children or young people of both sexes; and it disapproves their undertaking the direct care of young infants, or of lying-in women. These services should be given only in exceptional circumstances. (2) As regards their origin, congregations are either connected with a first order of congregation of men, as in the case of most of the older congregations, Carmelites, Poor Clares, Dominicans, Reformed Cistercians of La Trappe, Redemptorists etc., or are founded independently, like the Ursulines, Visitandines, and so on. In all cases, even from 1901, Art. 19, 52, the Holy See no longer approves of double foundations, which establish a certain subordination of the sisters to similar congregations of men. (3) As regards their juridical condition, we distinguish (a) nuns properly so-called, having solemn vows with papal enclosure, whose houses are monasteries; (b) nuns belonging to the old approved orders with solemn vows, but taking only simple vows by special dispensation of the Holy See; (c) sisters with simple vows dependent on the Holy See; (d) sisters under diocesan government. The house of sisters under simple vows, and the congregations themselves are canonically called conservatories. This does not always fulfill all the essential conditions of the religious state. Those which do are more correctly called religious congregations than the others, which are called piae congregations, piae société (pious congregations or pious societies). Nuns of the Latin Church only are considered here.

III. NUNS PROPERLY SO CALLED.—Nuns properly so-called have solemn vows, with a strict enclosure, regulated by pontifical law which prevents the religious from going out (except in very rare cases, approved by the regular superior and the bishop), and also the entrance of strangers, even for a short time, under pain of excommunication. Even admission to the grated parlour is not free, and interviews with regulars are subject to stringent rules. Though some mitigations have been introduced partly by local usage, partly (in the case of certain convents in America) by express concession of the Holy See. The building should be so arranged that the inner courts and gardens cannot be overlooked from outside, and the windows should not open on the public road. By the fact of their enclosure, these monasteries are independent of one another. At the head of the community is a superior often called the abbess, appointed for life by the chapter, at least outside Italy, for in Italy, especially in the two Sicilies, the constitution "Exposit debitum" (1 January, 1883) of Gregory XIII requires that they should be re-elected every three years (see Con. Periods. De Religiouss, 420, vol. 4, 135). The election must be confirmed by the prelate to whom the monastery is subject, the pope, the bishop, or the regular prelate. The bishop presides over the ballot, except in the case of nuns subject to regulars, and he has always the right to be present at the election. The president collects the votes at the grating. Without having jurisdiction, the abbess exercises authority over all in the house, and commands in virtue of their vows. Monasteries not exempt are subject to the jurisdiction of the bishop; exempt monasteries are placed, some under the immediate authority of the Holy See, others under that of a regular First Order. In the absence of any formal direction, the Holy See is understood to delegate to the bishop the annual visitation of monasteries immediately subject to the pope, to the exclusion of other superiors. This visitation is made by the regular prelate in the case of monasteries dependent on a First Order; but the bishop has in all cases authority to insist on the maintenance of the enclosure, and to control the temporal administration; he also approves the confessors. The creation of a monastery requires the consent of the bishop, and (at least in practice nowadays) of the Apostolic See. The bishop, by himself, or in consultation with the regular superior, determines the number of nuns who can be received according to the amount

NUNS. I. ORIGIN AND HISTORY. The institution of nun and sisterhoods, who devote themselves in various religious orders to the practice of a life of perfection, dates from the first ages of the Church, and women may claim with a certain pride that they were the first to embrace the religious state for its own sake, without regard to missionary work and ecclesiastical functions proper to men. St. Paul speaks of widows, who were called to certain kinds of church work (I Tim., v., 9), and of virgins (I Cor., vii.), whom he praises for their continence and their devotion to the things of the Lord. In the earliest times Christian women directed their fervor, some towards the service of the sanctuary, others to the attainment of perfection. These virgins were remarkable for their perfect and perpetual chastity which the Catholic Apologists have extolled as a contrast to pagan corruption (St. Justin, "Apol., I, c. 15; Migne, "P. G.", VI, 350; St. Ambrose, "De Virg.", I, c. 2; Migne, "P. L.", XVI, 193). Many also practiced poverty. From the earliest times they were called the spouses of Christ, according to St. Athanasius, the custom of the Church ("Apol. ad Constant.," sec. 35; Migne, "P. G.", XXV, 636). St. Augustine describes a virgin who had broken her vows as an adulteress ("Ep. 62," Migne, "P. L.", IV, 370). Tertullian distinguishes between those virgins who took the veil publicly in the assembly of the faithful, and others known to God alone; the veil seems to have been simply that of married women. Virgins vowed to the service of God, at first continued to live with their families, but as early as the end of the third century there were community houses known as "venerandae," and certainly at the beginning of the same century the virgins formed a special class in the Church, receiving Holy Communion before the laity. The case of God's favor in which the virgins are mentioned after the portion, and the Library of the Holy Sainte, in which they are invoked with the widows, show traces of this classification. They were sometimes admitted among the deaconesses for the baptism of women and to confess the sins of others. St. Paul had reserved for widows of sixty years.

When the persecutions of the third century drove many into the desert, the solitary life produced many heroines; and when the monks began to live in monas teries, there were also communities of women. St. Pachomius (292-346) built a convent in which a number of religious women lived with his sister. St. Jerome made famous the monastery of St. Paula at Beth dale. St. Augustine addressed to the nuns a letter of direction from which subsequently his rule was taken. There were monasteries of virgins or nuns at Rome, throughout Italy, Gaul, Spain, and the West. The great founders or reformers of monastic or more generally religious life, saw their rules adopted by women. The nuns of Egypt and Syria cut their hair, a practice not introduced until later into the West. Monasteries of women were generally situated at a distance from those of men; St. Pachomius insisted on this separation, also St. Benedict. There were, however, common houses, one wing being set apart for women and the other for men, or more frequently adjoining houses for the two sexes. Justinian abolished these double houses in the East, placed an old man to look after the temporal affairs of the convent, and appointed a priest and a deacon who were to perform their duties, but not to hold any other communication with the nuns. In the West, such double houses existed among the hospitalers even in the twelfth cen tury. In the eighth and ninth centuries a number of clergy of the principal churches of the West, without being bound by religious profession, chose to live in community and to observe a fixed rule of life. This canonical life was led also by women, who retired from the world, took vows of poverty, of chastity, and obedience, and dressed in black, but were not bound to give of their property. Continence and a certain religious profession were required of married women whose husbands were in Sacerdotal Orders, or even received episcopal consecration.

Hence in the ninth century the list of women vowed to the service of God included these various classes: virgins, whose solemn consecration was reserved to the bishop, nuns bound by religious profession, canonical cases living in common without religious profession, deaconesses engaged in the service of the church, and wives or widows of men in Sacred Orders. The nuns sometimes occupied a special house; the enclosure strictly kept in the East, was not considered indispensable in the West. Other monasteries allowed the nuns to go in and out. In Gaul and Spain the novitiates lasted one year for the cloistered nuns and three years for the others. In early times the nuns gave Christian education to orphans, young girls brought by their parents, and especially girls inclined to embrace a religious life. Those who took the veil of virgins of their own accord, or who had been educated to embrace the religious life, there were others offered by their parents before they were old enough to be consulted. In the West under the discipline in force for several centuries, the nuns were bound for life by the offering made by their parents. The profession itself might be expressed or implied. One who put on the religious habit, and lived for some time among the professed, was herself considered as professed. Besides the taking of the veil and simple profession there was also a solemn consecration of virginity which took place much later, at twenty-five years. In the thirteenth century, the Mendicant Orders appeared characterized by a more rigorous poverty, which excluded not only private property, but also the possession of certain kinds of property in common. Under the direction of St. Francis or Assisi, St. Clare founded in 1212 the Second Order of Franciscans. St. Dominic had given a constitution to nuns, even before instituting his Friars Preachers, approved 22 December, 1216. The Carmelites and the Hermits of St. Augustine also had corresponding orders of women; and the same was the case with the Clerks Regular dating from the sixteenth century, except the Society of Jesus.

From the time of the Mendicant Orders, founded specially for preaching and missionary work, there was a great difference between the orders of men and women, arising from the strict enclosure to which women were subjected. This rigorous enclosure usual in the East, was imposed on all nuns in the West, first by bishops and particular councils, and afterwards by the Holy See. Boniface VIII (1294-1303) by his constitution "Periculo" inserted in Canon Law [c. un, De statu regularium, in VI (III, 16)] made it an inviolable law for all professed nuns; and the Council of Trent (Sess. XXV, De Reg. et Mon., c. v) confirmed that constitution. Hence it was impossible for religious to undertake works of charity incompatible with the enclosure. The education of young girls alone was permitted to them, and that under somewhat inconvenient conditions. It was also impossible for them to dispose of the property of the Mendicant Orders, that is to say to have a superior general over several houses and members attached to a province rather than to a monastery. The difficulty was sometimes avoided by having sisters living in the same house by simple vows, and dispersed from the enclosure. The Breviary commemorates the services rendered the Order of Mercy by St. Mary of Corrivelle. St. Pius V took more radical measures by his constitution "Circa pastoralis", of 25 May, 1566. Not only did he insist on the observance of the constitution of Boniface VIII, and the decrees of the Council of Trent, but he also compelled the tertians to accept the obligation of solemn vows with the pontifical enclosure. For nearly three centuries the Holy See refused all approbation or consent to convents bound by simple vows, and the regulation of 28 June, 1901, Art. 19, 52, the Holy See no longer approves of double foundations, which establish a certain subordination of the sisters to similar congregations of men.

(3) As regards their juridical condition, we distinguish (a) nuns properly so-called, having solemn vows with papal enclosure, whose houses are monasteries; (b) the nuns belonging to the regular approved with solemn vows, but taking only simple vows by special dispensation of the Holy See; (c) sisters with simple vows dependent on the Holy See; (d) sisters under diocesan government. The house of sisters under simple vows, and the congregations themselves are canonically called conservatoriae. These do not always fulfill the essential conditions of the religious state. Those which do are more correctly called religious congregations than the others, which are called piae congregations, piae societates (pious congregations or pious societies). Nuns of the Latin Church only are considered here.

III. NUNS PROPERLY SO-CALLED.—Nuns properly so-called are never subjected to pontifical law, but are more properly regulated by pontifical law which prevents the nuns from going out (except in very rare cases, approved by the regular superior and the bishop), and also the entrance of strangers, even making the pain of excommunication. Even admission to the grated parlour is not free, and interviews with regulars are subject to stringent rules. Though some mitigations have been introduced partly by local usage, partly (in the case of certain convents in America) by express concession of the Holy See. The building should be so arranged that the inner courts and gardens cannot be overlooked from outside, and the windows should not open on the public road. By the fact of their enclosure, these monasteries are independent of one another. At the head of the community is a superior often called the abbess, appointed for life by the chapter, at least once in thirty years, seeking perfect personal perfection by close union with God; such are most of the strictly enclosed congregations, as Premonstratensian Canonesses, Carmelites, Poor Clares, Cistercians, Redemptoristines; or they may combine their common with the authority of works of charity, foreign missions, like the White Sisters of Cardinal Lavergne, and certain Franciscan Tertiaries; the education of young girls, like the Ursulines and Visitandines; the care of the sick, orphans, lunatics, and aged persons, like many of the congregations called Hospitalarias, Sisters of Charity, Daughters of St. Vincent de Paul, and Little Sisters of the Poor. When the works of mercy are corporal, and above all carried on outside the convent, the congregations are called active. Teaching communities are classed rather among those leading a mixed life, devoting themselves to works which in themselves require union with God and contemplation.

The constitution "Condite" of Leo XIII (8 December, 1900) charges bishops not to permit sisters to open houses as hotels for the entertainment of strangers of both sexes, and to be extremely careful in authorizing congregations which live on alms, or nurse sick persons at their homes, or maintain infirmaries for the reception of infirm persons of both sexes, or sick persons. The Holy See, by its Regulations (Normes) of 28 June, 1910, demands that it does not approve of congregations whose object is to render certain services in seminaries or colleges for male pupils, or to teach children or young people of both sexes; and it disapproves their undertaking the direct care of young infants, or of lying-in women. These services should be given only in exceptional circumstances. (2) As regards their origin, congregations are either connected with a first order or congregation of men, as in the case of most of the old congregations. NUMB. I. ORIGIN AND HISTORY.—The institution of nuns and sisters, who devote themselves in various religious orders to the practice of a life of perfection, dates from the first ages of the Church, and women may claim with a certain pride that they were the first to embrace the religious state for its own sake, without regard to missionary work and ecclesiastical functions proper to men. In the earliest times Christian women directed their fervor, some towards the service of the sanctuary, others to the attainment of perfection. From the earliest times they were called the spouses of Christ, according to St. Athanasius, the custom of the Church ("Apologie Constantien", sec. 56; Migne, "P. L.", XXV, 330). St. Cyprian describes a virgin who declared her vows as an adulteress ("Ep. 62", Migne, "P. L.", IV, 370). Tertullian distinguishes between those virgins who took the veil publicly in the assembly of the faithful, and others known to God alone; the veil seems to have been simply that of married women. The order of Good Friday in which the virgins are mentioned after the porters, and the Litany of the Saints, in which they are invoked with the widows, show traces of this classification. They were sometimes admitted among the deaconesses for the baptism of adult women and to exercise the functions which St. Paul had reserved for widows of sixty years.

Many took the veil of virgins of their own accord, or decided to embrace the religious life, there were others offered by their parents before they were old enough to be consulted. In the West under the discipline in force for several centuries, these obligations were considered as a bond for life by the offering made by their parents. This rigorous enclosure usual in the East, was imposed on all nuns in the West, first by bishops and particular councils, and afterwards by the Holy See. Boniface VIII (1294-1303) by his constitution "Peregrinum" inserted in Canon Law (e. un, De statu regularum, in VI* (III, 16)) made it an inviolable law for all professed nuns; and the Council of Trent (Sess. XXV, De Reg. et Mon., c. v) confirmed that constitution. Several Orders for religious to undertake works of charity incompatible with the enclosure. The education of young girls alone was permitted to them, and that under somewhat inconvenient conditions. It was also impossible for them to organize on the same lines as the Mendicant Orders, that is to say to have a superior general over several houses and members attached to a province rather than to a monastery. The difficulty was sometimes avoided by having tertiary sisters, who were to perform their duties by simple vows, and dispensed from the enclosure. The Breviary commemorates the services rendered the Order of Mercy by St. Mary of Carmelh. St. Pius V took more radical measures by his constitution "Circa pastoralis," of 25 May, 1568. Not only did he insist on the observance of the canonicals of Bona face VIII, and the decrees of Council of Trent, but compelled the tertiaries to accept the obligation of solemn vows with the pontifical enclosure. For nearly three centuries the Holy See refused all appro bation to convents bound to these simple vows, and the reform of VIII by his constitution "Pastoralis" of 31 May, 1631 abolished an English teaching congregation, founded by Mary Ward in 1609, which had simple vows and a superior general.

This strictness led to the foundation of pious as sociations called secular because they had no per petual vows, and leading a common life intended for their own personal sanctification and the practice of charity, e.g. the Daughters of Charity, founded by St. Vincent de Paul. The constitution of St. Pius V was not always strictly observed; communities exis ted approved by bishops, and soon tolerated by the Holy See, new ones were formed with the sanction of the diocesan ordinaries. So great were the services rendered by these new communities to the poor, the sick, the young, and even the missions, that the Holy See was slowly corrected its errors. The regulars, and for a long time refused to approve the congregations the mives, and the formula of commendation or ratifica tion contained this restriction 'icta tamen approbationem corrigere' (without the obligation of the con gregation). As political difficulties rendered less easy the observance of solemn vows, especially for women, the Holy See from the end of the eighteenth century decided to approve any new congregations with solemn vows, and even suppressed in certain countries, Belgium and France, all solemn professions in the old orders of women. The constitution of Benedict XVI, "Quasvixi, justum" of 30 April, 1748, on the subject of the Congregation of English Virginia was the prelude to the legislation of Leo XIII, who by his constitution "Conditas" of 8 December, 1900, laid down the laws common to congregations with simple vows, dividing these into two great classes, congregations under diocesan authority, subject to the bishops, and those under pontifical law.

II. VARIOUS KINDS OF NUNS. (1) As regards the objects they may be purely contemplative, seeking personal perfection by close union with God; such are most of the strictly enclosed congregations, as Pre carmelitane Canoneces, Carmelites, Poor Clares, Co
cess, Redemptoristesses; or they may combine this with the practice of works of charity, foreign missions, like the White Sisters of Cardinal Lavergne, and certain Franciscan Tertiaries; the education of young girls, like the Ursulines and Visitandines; the care of the sick, orphans, lunatics, and aged persons, like many of the congregations called Hospitalers, Sis ters of Charity, Daughters of St. Vincent de Paul, and Little Sisters of the Poor. When the works of mercy are corporal, and above all carried on outside the con vent, the congregations are called active. Teaching communities are classed rather among those leading a mixed life, devoting themselves to works which in themselves require union with God and contemplation. The constitution "Conditas" of Leo XIII (8 December, 1900) charges bishops not to permit sisters to open houses as hotels for the entertainment of strangers of both sexes, and to be extremely careful in authorising congregations which live on alms, Fiaurse sick persons at their homes, or maintain infirmaries for the reception of infirm persons of both sexes, or sick persons. The Holy See, by its Regulations (Nor mas of 28 June, 1901), declares that it does not appro
ove of congregations whose object is to render cer tain services in seminaries or colleges for male pupils, or to teach children or young people of both sexes; and it disapproves their undertaking the direct care of young infants, or of lying-in women. These services should be given only in exceptional circumstances. (2) As regards their origin, congregations are either connected with a first order or congregation of men, as in the case of most of the older congregations, Carmelites, Poor Clares, Dominicans, Reformed Cistercians of La Trappe, Redemptoristesses etc., or are founded independently, like the Ursulines, Visitandines, and the like. The Holy See, by its appro bation or simple vows, and the regulations of 1901, Art. 19, 52, the Holy See no longer approves of double foundations, which establish a certain subor dination of the sisters to similar congregations of men.

(3) As regards their juridical condition, we distinguish
(a) nuns properly so-called, having solemn vows with papal enclosure, whose houses are monasteries; (b) nuns belonging to the old approved orders with solemn vows, but taking only simple vows by special dispensa tion of the Holy See; (c) sisters with simple vows de pendent on the Holy See; (d) sisters under diocesan government. The house of sisters under simple vows, and the congregations themselves are canonically called "conventuals." They do not always fulfill the essential conditions of the religious state. Those which do are more correctly called religious congrega tions than the others, which are called "piae congrega tiones," piae societates (pious societies) of the Latin Church only are considered here.

III. NUNS PROPERLY SO CALLED. Nuns prop erly so-called have solemn vows with a strict en closure, regulated by pontifical law which prevents the religious from going out (except in very rare cases, ap proved by the regular superior and the bishop), and the entrance of strangers, even female, with pained excommunication. Even admission to the grated parlour is not free, and interviews with regulars are subject to stringent rules. Though some mitigations have been introduced partly by local usage, partly (in the case of certain convents in America) by express concession of the Holy See. The building should be so arranged that the inner courts and gardens cannot be overlooked from outside, and the windows should not open on the public road. By the fact of their enclosure, these monasteries are independent of one another. At the head of the community is a su perior often called the abbess, appointed for life by the chapter, at least every sixth year, for in Italy, especially in the two Sicilies, the constitution "Expositi debitum" (1 January, 1883) of Gregory XIII requires that they be re-elected every three years (see Periodica de Religious, vol. 420, vol. 4, 139). The election must be confirmed by the prelate to whom the monastery is subject, the pope, the bishop, or the regular prelate. The bishop presides over the ballot, ex cept in the case of nuns subject to regulars, and he has always the right to be present at the election. The president collects the votes at the grating. Without having jurisdiction, the abbess exercises authority over all in the house, and commands in virtue of their vows. Monasteries not exempt are subject to the jurisdic tion of the bishop; exempt monasteries are placed, some under the immediate authority of the Holy See, others under that of a regular First Order. In the absence of any other prelate, the Holy See is understood to delegate to the bishop the annual visitation of monasteries immediately subject to the pope, to the exclusion of other superiors. This visitation is made by the regular prelate in the case of mon asteries dependent on a First Order; but the bishop has in all cases authority to insist on the maintenance of the enclosure, and to control the temporal admini stration; he also approves the confessors. The erection of a monastery requires the consent of the bishop, and (at least in practice nowadays) of the Apostolic See. The bishop, by himself, or in consulta tion with the regular superior, determines the number of nuns who can be received according to the amount Nyassa, Vicariate Apostolic of, in Central Africa, bounded north by the Ango-German frontier, east by Lake Nyassa, south by the Ango-Portuguese frontier, west by a line running northward past Lake Bangweulu. It is under the care of the White Fathers and was founded by Father Lechappée in June, 1889, at Micosa, Nyassa-land. This region passing under German control, the missionaries moved to Mambwe between Nyassa and Masangka in 1891, but, finding the region besetted by the slave-hunters, they proceeded to Gwaramba, a high plateau to the west where the Copper Belt. In December, 1894, Fr. Van Oost served at Kasaca in Punda, but finding the chief Micosa, but was expelled by Micosa's successor, K'o-Makai. Fr. Dupont, however, succeeded in forming a permanent station there in July, 1895. The natives are well-behaved; they are being taught agriculture by the Fathers. On 13 February, 1897, the mission was made a vicariate Apostolic, Fr. Joseph Dupont, b. at Gossel, Maine et Loire, France, in 1855, being appointed superior and consecrated as Bishop of Thabesi. Thus the King Monzamba was dying in 1888, he asked Mgr. Dupont to become king. The bishop accepted the post temporarily to prevent the customary beheading following the sovereign's death. In 1894 the north-eastern part of the vicariate was formed into the Prefecture Apostolic of Shiré. The population is about 4,000,000, speaking Kikamba and Kinyasa, estimated 30,000: baptized, 2,000; missionary priests, 50; Missionary Sisters of Our Lady of Africa, 68 convents, 137 churches, 9 chapels, 26 stations, 12 in Ulimba and 3 in Angonland; schools, 34; hospitals, 4.

Nyitra. See Neutral, Diocese of.

Nyassa, a titular see in Cappadocia Prima, suffragan of Caesarea. It is mentioned by Procopius (V, vii, viii, ix) in the "Historia Antonini" in the "Synedrion" = "Hieronici episcopatum" but its history and exact location are unknown. It should be sought on the south bank of the Kizil Irnak, ancient Halys, ten miles above Kessik Keupur Rampay, Asa Minor, 287, 305. Tertullian "Asa Minus", 287, 305. It is identified with Neviae. Hamilton: "Researches, II, 265" speaks of a modern village called Ntare, or Nissa, but the maps show no place of this name. Le Quien, "Oriens Christ., I, 391" names ten bishops of Nyassa. The last qualified as metropolitan in the sixteenth century, is certainly only a titular bishop. To the list may be added Ioannes, who lived in 1370 Mikloshch and Muller, "Acta patriarchatus Constantinopolitani", Vienna, 1860, I, 537. About this time Nyassa must have disappeared; but its name still recalls the memory of the glorious Doctor, St. Gregory.

Oakley, Frederick, b. 8 Sept., 1802, at Shrewsbury; d. 30 Jan., 1880, at Islington, the youngest son of Sir Charles Oakley, Bart., he graduated at Christchurch in 1824, and three years later was elected Fellow of Balliol, where he afterwards became the close friend of W. G. Ward, with whom he joined the Tractarian party. In 1839 he became incumbent of Margaret Chapel, the predecessor of the well-known All Saints, Margaret Street, London, soon noted for its high church services; he was a frequent visitor to Oxford, and stood by Ward at the time of his condemnation in 1845. He defended Tract XC and in consequence his bishop suspended him. He retired to Newman's community at Littlemore, and a few weeks later followed him into the Catholic Church. After a short course of theology at St. Edmund's College, he was ordained by Dr. Wiseman in 1847. The next thirty-three years were spent as a canon of the Westminster chapter and missionary rector of St. John's, Islington. Short-sighted, small of stature, lame, he exercised a wide influence by his personality, his writings, and the charm of his conversation. His chief works are: Before his conversion: "Aristotelian and Platonic Ethics" (Oxford, 1837); "Whitehall Sermons" (Oxford, 1837-9); "The Subject of Tract XC examined" (London, 1841); "Homilies" (London, 1842); "Life of St. Augustine" (Newman's series, Toovey, 1844). After his conversion: "Practical Sermons" (London, 1848); "The Order and Ceremonial of the Mass" (London, 1845); "The Catholic Florist" (London, 1851); "The Church of the Bible" (London, 1857); "Lyra Liturgica" (London, 1865); "Historical Notes on the Tractarian Movement" (London, 1865); "The Priest on the Mission" (London, 1871).

BERNARD WARD.

O Antiphons (Roman Breviary: Antiphons major, "greater antiphons"), the seven antiphons to the Magnificat in the ferial Office of the seven days preceding the vigil of Christmas; so called because all begin with the interjection "O!" Their opening words are: (1) "O Sapientia", (2) "O Adonai", (3) "O Radiant Jesse", (4) "O Clavi David", (5) "O Oriens", (6) "O Rex Gentium", (7) "O Emmanuel!" Addressed to Christ under one or other of His Scriptural titles, they conclude with a distinct petition to the coming Lord (e. g.: "O Wisdom... come and teach us the way of prudence"); "O Adonai... come and redeem us by thy outstretched arm"; "O Key of David... come and lead from prison the captive sitting in darkness and in the shadow of death" etc.). Couched in a poetic and Scriptural phraseology they constitute a notable feature of the Advent Offices. These seven antiphons are found in the Roman Breviary; but other medieval Breviaries added (1) "O virgo virginum quomodo fret", etc., still retained in the Roman Breviary as the proper antiphon to the Magnificat in the second Vespers of the feast Expectatio Partus BVM. (18 December), the prayer of this feast being followed by the antiphon "O Adonai" as a commemoration of the feast of the Lord, 18 Dec. (2) "O Gabriel, nutitus ecclereste", subsequently replaced, almost universally, by the thirteenth-century antiphon, "O Thomae Didymi", for the feast of the Apostle St. Thomas (21 December). Some medieval churches had twelve greater antiphons, adding to the above (1) "O Rex Pacis", (2) "O Mundi Domina", (3) "O Hierusalem", addressed respectively to Our Lord, Our Lady, and Jerusalem. GUIRANDEAU gives the Latin text of all of these (except the "O Mundi Domina"), with a neoclassical prose translation ("Liturgique Year", Advent, Dublin, 1870, 508-531), besides much devotional and some historical comment. The Parisian Rite added two antiphons ("O sanctissimus Jesus, sanctissima Maria Filiae Israel") to the seventh of the Roman Rite and began the recitation of the nine on the 15th of December. Prose renderings of the Roman Breviary O's will be found in the Marques of Bute's translation of the Roman Breviary (winter volume). GUIRANDEAU remarks that the antiphons were appropriately assigned to the Vesper Hour because the Saviour came in the evening of the world (vergente mundi secundum, as the Church sings) and that they were attached to the Magnificat to honour her through whom He came. By exception to the rule for ferial days, the seven antiphons are sung in full both before and after the canticle.

In some Churches it was formerly the practice to sing them thrice: that is, before the Canticle, before the Gloria Patri, and after the Sicut erat (GUIRANDEAU). There are several renderings into English verse, both by Catholics and non-Catholics, the most recent being that in Dom Gregory Ould's "Book of Hymns" (Edinburgh, 1910, no. 5) by W. Rooke-Ley, in seven quatrains together with a refrain-quatrain giving a translation of the versecle and response ("with vers.", etc.). The seven antiphons have been found in MSS. of the eleventh century. A paraphrase of some of these is found in the hymn "Veni, veni, Emmanuel" by Daniel in his "Chansons spirituelles" (II, 336) and translated by Neale in his "Medieval Hymns and Sequences" (3rd ed., London, p. 171) and others, and used in various hymn-books (Latin text in "The Roman Hymnal", New York, 1894, 139).

Neale supposed the hymn to be of the twelfth century, but it has not been traced back further than the first decade of the eighteenth century. For first lines of translations, see "Julian's Dict. of Hymnol." (2nd ed., London, 1907, 74, 1; 1531, 1; 1721, 1). For the Scriptural sources of the antiphons, see John, Marques of Bute, Roman Breviary, Winter, 203, also Marbach's "Carmina Scripturaria" etc. (Strasburg, 1907) under "O" in the Index Alphabeticus.

THURSTON, The Great Antiphons, Heralds of Christmas in The Month (Dec., 1905), 616-631, gives liturgical usage, literary illustrations, and peculiar customs relating to the Office (see also the view of CABROL, L'Aant Liturgique en Rome Byzantine 1905, n. 4, that they do not anticipate the ninth century, but gives much illustration (notably from The Crisis of Cipriano's written circa 800) to show that they "are much older"), and knows "no valid reason for regarding them as posterior to the rest of the Roman Antiphonary or to the time of Pope Gregory himself".

CABROL in D.Tarchon in Liturgie chrétienne, s. v. Antiphon, re- peates (col. 5299) his view, but in a footnote refers the reader to Thamini's article in The Month; BALEY, Greater Antiphons of Advent in Fray (an Anglican periodical, 6 Dec., 1905, 251-258; BALEY, O Sapientia in Church Times (13 Dec., 1907), p. 813; WITTENBERG, O Sapientia, Seven Sermons on the Ancient Antiphons for Advent (London, 1906).

H. T. HENRY.

Oates's Plot, a term conventionally used to designate a "Popish Plot" which, during the reign of Charles II of England, Titus Oates pretended to have discovered. Oates was b. at Oakham, Rutlandshire, in 1649. His father, Samuel Oates, is said to have been a ribbon-weaver in Norfolk who, having taken a degree at Cambridge, afterwards became a minister of the Established Church.

Titus Oates began his career at Merchant Taylor's School in 1665, when he was sixteen. He was expelled two years later and went to a school at Sedlescombe, near Hastings, whence he passed to Cambridge in 1667, being entered as a sizar in Gonville and Caius College, whence he afterwards migrated to St. John's. His reputation at Caius, according to a fellow student, was that of "the most illiterate dunce, incapable of improvement"; at St. John's, Dr. Watson wrote of him: "He was a great dunce, ran into debt, and, being sent away for want of money, never took a degree". "Removing from there", says Echard, "he slipped into Orders", and was preferred to the vicarage of Bobbing in Kent, on 3 July, 1673. At this time or earlier, according to the evidence of Sir Denis Ashburnham at Father Ireland's trial, "he did swear the Peace against a man" and was foresworn, but they did not proceed upon the indictment. Next year he left Bobbing with a licence for non-residence and a reputation for dishonesty, to act as curate to his father at Hastings. There father and son conspired to bring against Wm. Parker, the schoolmaster, an abominable charge so manifestly trumped up that Samuel was exonerated from his living, while Titus, charged with perjury, was sent to prison at Dover to await trial. Having broken jail and escaped to London, unpursued, he next procured an appointment as chaplain on board the king's ship "Prince", but within twelve months was expelled from the Navy.

In August, 1676, he was frequenting a club which met at the Pheasant Inn, in Fuller's Rents, and there, for the first time, he met Cutler, who conducted him into the Duke of Norfolk's household, as Protestant chaplain, followed almost immediately. On Ash Wednesday, 1677, he was received into the Catholic Church. The Jesuit Father Hutchinson (Alias Berry) was persuaded to welcome him as a repentant prodigal and Father Strange, the provincial, to give him a trial in the English College at Valladolid. Five months later, Oates was expelled from the Spanish college and, on 30 Oct., 1677, was sent back to London. In spite of his disgrace, the Jesuits provincial was persuaded to give him a second trial, and on 12 Dec. he was admitted into the seminary at St. Omer. He remained there as "a younger student" till 28 June, 1678. After being expelled from St. Omer's also, he met Tonge, probably an old acquaintance, and conceived and concocted the story of the "Popish Plot". Tonge was a "man divine, a man of letters, and of a prolix head, full of all the Romish plots and conspiracies since the Reformation". There is some evidence and considerable likelihood that he not only suggested the idea of the plot to Oates by his talk, but actually cooperated in its invention. At Stafford's trial Oates declared that he never was but a sham Catholic. If this be true, we may accept Echard's assertion as probable, that Tonge "persuaded him [Oates] to insinuate himself among the Papists and get particular acquaintance with them". Moreover, it is credibly reported that, at a great supper given in the city by Alderman Wilcox in honour of the Protestant Prince present, the latter's jealousy led to a verbal quarrel between the two informers, and Tonge plainly told Oates that he knew nothing of the plot, but what he learned from him. Tonge may or may not have helped Oates in the manufacture of his wares; but he undoubtedly enabled him to bring them to market and dispose of them to advantage. With the help of Kirkby and Wilcox and with the royal laboratory, he succeeded in bringing the plot before the careless and sceptical notice of King Charles.

Oates' depositions, as they may be read in his "True and Exact Narrative of the Horrid Plot and Conspiracy of the Popish Party against the Life of His Sacred Majesty, the Government and the Protestant Religion, etc., published by the Order of the Right Honorable the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled", are clamy, puerile, ill-written, disjointed libels, hardly worthy of notice, but for the frenzied anger they aroused. The chief items tell of a design to assassinate the king, or rather a complication of plots to do away with "48" or "the Black Bastard"—his "counterpart"—and "a series of conspiracies among the Catholic conspirators. Pickering, a Benedictine lay brother, and Grove (Honest William), a Jesuit servant, are told off to shoot him with "jointed carabines" and silver bullets, in consideration of £1,500 to be paid to Grove and 30,000 Masses to be said for Pickering's soul. To make more certain of the business, the king is to be poisoned by Sir George Wackeman, the queen's physician, at a cost of £15,000. Furthermore he is to be stabbed by Anderton and Coniers, Benedictine monks. All these methods failing, there are in the background four Irish ruffians, hired by Dr. Pogartey, who were to murder the King's Posture at Westminster and have one pound down and £80 afterwards in full discharge of their expenses. There is some frivolous talk of other assassinations—of the removal of the Prince of Orange, the Duke of Orleans, Herbert of Hereford and some lesser fry. And Oates himself is offered and actually accepts £50 to do away with the terrible Dr. Tonge, "who had barely put out the Jesuits' morals in England, but the

Summing up the plot with the help of someone more scholarly than himself, Oates makes the following declaration: "The General Design of the Pope, Society of Jesus, and their Complices, in this Plot, to the Reformation, that is, (in their sense) the Reduction of Great Britain and Ireland, and all His Majesties Dominions by the Sword (all other ways and means being judged by them ineffectual) to the Roman Religion and obedience. To effect this design; 1. The Pope hath entailed himself to the Kingdoms of England and Ireland. 2. Sent his Legate, the Bishop of Casual in Italy into Ireland to declare his TITLE, and take possession of that Kingdom. 3. He hath appointed Cardinal Howard his Legat for England to the same purpose. 4. He hath given Commission to the General of the Jesuits, and by him to White, their Provincial in England, to issue them such Commission to Captain Generals, Lieutenant Generals, etc., namely, the General of the Jesuits hath sent Commissions from Rome to Langhorn their Advocate General for the Superior Officer in Ireland, and hath given Commissions here in England to Colonels, and inferior Officers. 5. He hath by a Consult of the Jesuits of this Province Assembled at London, condemned His Majesty, and ordered Him to be assassinated, etc. 6. He hath Ordered, That in case the Duke of York will not accept these Crown as forfeited by his Brother unto the Pope, and of his Gift, and settle such Prelates and Dignitaries in the Church, and such Officers in Commands and places Civil, Naval and Military, as he hath commissioned as above, extirpate the Protestant Religion, and in order thereto, by post facto, consent to the assassination of the King his Brother, Murder of Oates, whose Towns of his, etc., by pardoning the Assassins, Murderers and Inconditaries, that then he be also poisoned or destroyed, after they have for some time abused his Name and Title to their Plot, Wrecked and divided the Kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland thereby in Civil Wars and rebellions as in his Father's Time, to make way for the French to seize these Kingdoms, and totally ruin their Infantry and Navy Forces."
caused on by Sir Ellis Layton, Mr. Coleman and others. Under ordinary circumstances so sly an act would have been brought to the ground by the first breath of criticism. But it was taken up by the Whig Party and made into what Echard calls "a political cake." Shaftesbury, their leader, used it for all its worth. It was quite commonly called "the Shaftesbury Plot." Whether, as some believe, he had a hand in constructing the plot or not, very much of the blame of its failure must rest upon the use he made of it. Chiefly by the influence and machinations of Shaftesbury and his party, Parliament was incited to declare that "there hath been and is still a damnable and hellish Plot, contrived and carry'd on by popish recusants, for the assassinating and murdering the King and for subverting the government and rooting out and destroying the Protestant Religion." Many who, with Elliot, thought Oates's stories of the "30,000 Black-bills, the Army of Spanish Pilgrims and Military commissions from General D'Oliveira (S.J.) so monstrously ridiculous that they offer an intolerable affront to the understanding of any man who has but a superficial acquaintance of the affairs of Europe," nevertheless thought also that, "because His majesty and council have declar'd there is a Popish-Plot, therefore they have reason to believe one.

Oates had now become the most popular man in the country and acclaimed himself as "the Saviour of the Nation." He assumed the title of "Doctor," professing to have received the degree at Salamanca, a city it is certain he never visited; put on episcopal attire; was lodged at Whitchurch; went about with a bodyguard; was received by the primates; sat at table with peers; and, though snubbed by the King, was solemnly thanked by Parliament for his efforts. He wrote speeches, two at £12 a week for diet and maintenance, occasional gifts of £50 or so, and drafts on the Treasury to meet his bills. Yet, Oates would have forewarned himself to little purpose but for the mysterious death of Sir Edmund Godfrey, the magistrate before whom Oates's depositions had been sworn. The Whig Party put the blame of this crime—if murder it was—upon the Catholics. Godfrey had been a friend to the Catholics rather than an enemy, and had made use of the information received from Oates to do them a service: no good could come to them, and no harm to their enemies, by robbing the magistrate of the copy of Oates's deposition which he retained. Moreover, both his pockets and his house were undisturbed by the supposed assassins. Nevertheless the unanimous verdict was murder, the murder of a good Protestant and a magistrate who had to do with the plot. "The capital and the whole nation," says Macaulay, "went mad with hatred and fear. The penal laws, which had begun to lose something of their edge, were sharpened anew. Everywhere justices were buried in searching houses and seizing papers. All the gaols were filled with Papists. London had the aspect of a city in a state of siege. The train bands were under arms all night. Preparations were made for barricading the great thoroughfares. Patrols marched up and down the streets. Cannon were planted round Whitchurch. No citizen thought himself safe unless he carried under his cloak a small flail loaded with lead to drive off the Popish assassins." For awhile, every word that Oates said was believed. The courts of law, before which the arrested Catholics were brought, were blind and deaf to his shufflings and contradictions and lies. Other disreputable witnesses were put up on the scaffold or prisons and encouraged to come forward, and were paid handsomely for bringing additional perjuries to corroborate those of their chief. The lord chief justice on the Bench would listen to nothing which discredited the king's witnesses; and although, in trials where the prisoners were denied counsel, he himself should, by ancient custom, have looked to their interests, he exerted the full authority of the Court to bring about their condemnation. Sixteen innocent men were executed in direct connexion with the Plot, and eight others were brought to the scaffold as priests in the persecution of Catholics which followed from it. The names of those executed for the plot are: in 1676 Edward Coleman (Dec. 3); in 1678, John Grove, William Ireland, S.J. (Jan. 24), Robert Green, Lawrence Hill (Feb. 21), Henry Berry (Feb. 25), Thomas Pickering, S.B. (May 14), Richard Langhorn (June 14), John Gavan, S.J., William Harcourt, S.J., Anthony Turner, S.J., Thomas Whitebread, S.J., John Fenwick, S.J. (June 20); in 1680, Thomas Thwing (Oct. 23), William Howard, Viscount Stafford (Dec. 29); in 1681, Oliver Plunket, Archbishop of Armagh (July 1). Those executed as priests were: in 1679, William Plessington (July 19), Philip Evans, John Lloyd (July 22), Nicholas Postgate (Aug. 7), Charles Mahony (Aug. 12), John Wall (Francis Johnson), O.S.F., John Kemble (Aug. 22), Charles Baker (David Lewis), S.J. (Aug. 27).

It remains to be said about the "Popish Plot" that, since the day when its inventor was discovered, no historian of any consequence has professed to believe in it. A few vaguely assert that there must have been a plot of some sort. But no particle of evidence has ever been discovered to corroborate Oates's pretensions to revelations. A contemporary Protestant historian says: "After the coolest and strictest examinations, and after a full length of time, the government could find no very little foundation to support so vast a fabric, besides down-right swearing and assurance: not a gun, sword or dagger; not a flask of powder or a dark lanthorn, to effect this villany; and excepting Oates's writings, not one scrap of an original letter or communication, among the great number by which the king was warranted in the reputation of the discoveries." Since then the public and private archives of Europe have been liberally thrown open to students, and the most of them diligently examined; yet, as Mr. Marks, also a Protestant, wrote a few years ago: "Through all the troublous times when belief in the Popish Plot raged, one searches in vain for one act of violence on the part of Catholics. After the lapse of two hundred years, no single document has come to light establishing in any one particular any single article of the eighty-one." In January, 1679, Oates, whose reputation was already declining, together with his spies, laid an indictment before the Privy Council in thirteen articles, against Chief Justice Scroggs, because of the part he took in the acquittal of Wakeman, Marshall, Runey, and Corker; and in the same year, the Rev. Adam Elliot was fined £200 for saying that "Oates was a perjur'd Rogue, and the Jesuits who suffered, justly died Martyrs." But in August, 1681, Israel Backhouse, master of Wolverhampton Grammar School, when charged with a similar libel was acquitted. In the same year, Oates was thrust out of Whitehall, and next year (Jan., 1682) Elliot prosecuted him successfully for perjury. In April, 1682, his pension was reduced to £3 a week. In June of that year he was afraid to come forward as a witness against Kearney, one of the four supposed Irish ruffians denounced by him in his depositions. Then, while King Charles was still living, he was sent to France as ambassador to the king and to Sir Lionel Jenkins against the plain speaking of Sir Roger LeStrange, and two months later (10 May), he was himself committed to prison for calling the Duke of York a traitor. On 18 June, he was fined by Judge Jeffrys £100,000 for "sacramentum magnatum." Then, in May, 1680, he was tried for perjury, and condemned to be whipped, degraded, and pilloried, and imprisoned for life. Jeffreys said of him: "He has deserved more punishment than the laws of the land can inflict." When William of Orange came to the throne, Oates left prison and entered an unsuccessful appeal in the House of Lords against his sentence. Later, he obtained a royal pardon and a pension, which was withdrawn in 1693 at the instance of Queen Mary, whose father, James II, he had scandalously attacked. After Mary's death, he was granted from the Treasury £2,500 to pay his debts and £2,500 for the life of himself and his wife. In 1690 he was taken up by the Baptists, only to be again expelled the ministry, this time for "a discrepant intrigue for wringing a legacy from a devotee". In 1691 he attempted another fraudulent plot, but it came to nothing. He died in Axe Yard, on 12 July, 1705.

Besides the "Narrative of the Horrid Plot and Conspiracy of the Papist Party" (London, 1679), Oates wrote "The Cabinet of Jesuits' secrets opened" (said to be translated from the Italian), "issued and completed by a gentleman of Quality" (London, 1679), "The Pope's Warehouse; or the Merchandise of the Whore of Rome" (London, 1679), dedicated to the Earl of Shaftesbury, "The Witch of Endor; or the witchcrafts of the Roman Jesuits, in which you have an account of the Exorcisms or conjurations of the Papists", etc. (London, 1679); "Fire and Sword", or "The Picture of the late King James drawn to the Life" (Part I, London, 1696; Parts II, III, and IV, 1697).

Oaths.—I. NOTION AND DIVISION.—An oath is an invocation to God to witness the truth of a statement. It may be express and direct, as when one swears to God Himself, or an individual, as when we swear by creatures, since they bear a special relation to the Creator and manifest His majesty and the supreme Truth in a special way: for instance, if one swear by heaven, the throne of God (Matt., v. 34), by the Holy Cross, or by the Gospels. Imprecatory oaths are also tacit (see below). To have an oath in foro interno, there must be the intention, at least implicit, of invoking the testimony of God, and a word or sign by which the intention is manifested. Oaths may be: (1) assentary—or affirmative—if we call God to witness the assertion of a past or present fact; (2) contestatory—if we call Him to witness a resolution, a promise, for which we bind ourselves to execute, or a vow made to Him, or an agreement entered into with our neighbour, or a vow made to God in favour of a third party; every promissory oath includes of necessity an assentary oath (see below). A promissory oath accompanied by a threat against a third party is said to be combinatory; (2) contestatory—or simple—if there is a mere invocation of the Divine testimony; imprecatory—or execratory—as in the formula "So help me God"; (3) promise, if at the same time we call upon God as a judge and avenger of perjury, offering Him our property and especially our life and eternal salvation, or those of our friends, as a pledge of our sincerity. Thus the expression: "Upon my soul", often used without any intention of swearing, may be either contestatory—the soul being in a special manner the image of God—or assentary—if we wish to call down upon us our Divine punishment, either temporal or eternal, in case we be wanting in sincerity; (3) private, if used between private individuals; public, if exacted by public authorities; public oaths are divided into: (a) doctrinal, by which one declares that he holds a given doctrine, or promises to be faithful, to teach, and to defend a given doctrine in the future; (b) political, which have as their object the exercise of any authority whatsoever, or submission to such an authority or laws; a judicial, which are taken in courts of justice either by the parties to the suit or the witnesses thereof.

II. LAWFULNESS AND CONDITIONS.—An oath is was no law to enforce an answer, there was no specific penalty for refusal. But those who refused to answer, were decried as traitors; and then proceeded against to the uttermost by other persecuting laws. Those who in their answers showed any loyalty to the Holy See were in the same plight, a mark for persecution till they bent or broke. But those who answered disrespectfully, were treated less cruelly.

Towards the end of Elizabeth's reign, a split began in the Catholic ranks on this subject. Some of the priests who had joined in the well-known Appeal against the archpriest Blackwell had afterwards presented to Elizabeth a "Protestation of Allegiance" (Tierney-Dodd, infra, iii, Ap. 188). Declarations of loyalty there had been before in plenty: those made by the martyrs being often extraordinarily touching. But the signatories of 1603, perhaps stimulated by Casilpine ideas, for the Protestation was drawn up in Paris, besides protesting their loyalty, went on to withhold from the pope any possible exercise of the deposing power. Before this Catholic loyalists had only denied the validity of the deposition pronounced by Pius V. Several reasons seemed to justify this Protestation, at the time it was made (see Bishop, William), though unfortunate developments followed later.

II.—OATH OF ALLEGIANCE OF JAMES I (1606) also called the OATH OF OBEDIENCE. After the Gunpowder Plot (q. v.) a systematic effort was made to persecute Catholics at every turn from the cradle to the grave, by penalizing Catholic baptisms, marriages, and burials, as well as education, acquisitions of property, &c. An attempt was also made to divide and disgrace Catholics in the matter of allegiance. It was known, from the "Protestation," that there were differences of opinion on the subject of the pope's deposing power, and an oath of allegiance was drafted to make capital out of those differences (for the authorship of the formula, see Thurston, infra, and Tierney-Dodd, iv, 71). The more important clauses are the following:—"I, A. B., do truly and sincerely acknowledge, &c. that our sovereign lord, King James, is lawful and rightful King &c. and that the pope neither of himself nor by any authority of the Church of Rome, or by any other means with any other, has any power to depose the king &c. or to authorize any foreign prince to invade him &c. or to give licence to any to bear arms, raise armies, &c. &c. &c. &c." This was not to be proposed at once to one; but was to be taken by the clergy, and by holding office under the Crown; by others, when this modulation in exacting the oath helped vent an outcry against it, and enabled the Government to deal with the recalcitrant in detail. Many elapsed, for instance, before it was imposed on students of the universities. The last laws passed against Catholics (1292-3) enjoined a set for Recusants (35 Eliz. c. 2). It comprised confession of "grievous offences against God in denying her Majesty's Government"; (2) Royalalty; (3) A clause against dispensations and indulgences, perhaps the first of its sort in oaths of allegiance. The success of Elizabeth's "settlement of" had been largely due to her alliance with the afterwards called Puritans, and they were not with the supremacy, or unaware that it was popular and tyrannical.

Order to excuse their persecutions they referred (especially after the excommunication proclaimed by Rome) by asking the accused person whether he would fight against the if he sent an army to restore Catholicism. The lie called this the "bloody question". There oaths. These we believe to be addressed to God himself and to be accepted in the precise sense of the words pronounced. If King James had made his subjects swear specifically "in the sense by him explained," the oath might perhaps have been endured, but when he made them "swear according to the plain and common sense, and understanding of the same words," to what was injurious to Catholic con- sciences, this could not be tolerated. Of the many objections raised against the oath the following are particularly chief.

A.—Objectible Words.—The most objectionable words were those in which the deposing power was sworn to be "impious, heretical and damnable." In previous centuries generations and generations of loyal subjects, and numberless patriots and lawyers, and doctors and saints of the Church (with exceptions, of course, but upon the whole in a large majority) had considered that this power was a valuable safeguard for liberty both religious and civil. In later days some people might think it out of date, inapplicable, extinct, perhaps even a mistake. But to call God to witness that one executed it as "impious, heretical and damnable," was what the Faith of the old Faith, who knew what he said and to whom he spoke, could conscientiously do. Indeed anyone who carefully weighs the terms of this oath, will see that the essence of the pontiffs' so unreasonably denied that no room whatsoever is left for the assertion of ecclesiastical liberties. This shows the affinities of the oath with Gallicanism (q. v.), which was acquiring such vogue upon the continent in those days. The Sorbonne, on 30 June, 1681, very shortly before approving the Gallican articles, censured the English oath, and found in it very little to object to (Butler, I, 351). The words here under discussion also evidently presume that he who takes the oath believes in the "Divine right of kings"!

B.—The Deposing Power.—While all Catholics would condemn the extreme statements just mentioned, as to the deposing power, there were also many at that time, and they of the highest name, who considered any denial of that power as illicit. Two or three generations only had passed since the discipline of papal deposition for extreme causes of misgovernment had been generally accepted. In some parts of Europe it was still the law. Many, and Paul V with his medieval ideals was among them, had not yet perceived that this discipline would not be in vogue again, even in Catholic countries. This explains why Bellarmine, Persons, and several other early opponents of the oath went further in their condemnation of it than later theologians would have done. At the same time it is a mistake to suppose that Catholic resistance to the oath was chiefly or solely due to belief in the deposing power. This statement, however, is often made by Protestants (e. g., Hallam) and also by the Catholic writers, like Preston and others who wrote in defence of the oath, or who had Gallican leanings, such as Charles Butler and Canon Tierney (Butler, I, 350, 396; IV, 120, &c.; Tierney-Dodd, IV, 78 n., 81 n.). We have seen on the contrary that there were from the first English Catholic Non-jurors who explicitly rejected the deposing power. Doctor William Bishop, for instance, did this, but still underwent imprisonment for refusing the oath; and he was afterwards made a bishop by the Holy See.

C.—Fraudulent Object of the Oath.—It was always known that the loyalty of the Catholic body was unimpeachable. The reign of Charles I and the fall of the Stuarts showed that the loyalty of the Catholics was that of any other religious body. The Oath of Allegiance was designed to obscure this. As a man's repute for veracity may be impaired by prolonged examination on the subject of mental and the like, and by exacting oaths about truthfulness, so these elaborate protests against the deposing power were intended to throw doubt upon the loyalty of Catholics, and so to divide and disprove them, and this it actually did. Like all religious tests imposed by enemies it was something, not to amend, but to avoid altogether.

D.—The Dishonour to the Holy See.—This oath and all of those a similar character amount to a statement beforehand of the "conditions under which the Holy See will be disobeyed," and Rome has ever considered such proposals as dishonourable to herself, just as a nation would consider it a disgrace to lay beforehand the terms under which her soldiers are to capitulate.

E.—The Controversy.—The archpriest Blackwell, then head of the English clergy, had at first disapproved of the oath, then allowed it, then after the pope's Brief disallowed it again, and finally being arrested and thrown into prison, took the oath, relying on James's statement that no encroachment on conscience was intended, and recommended the faithful to do the like. The pope at once issued a new Brief (23 August, 1607), repeating his prohibition, and on 28 Sept., 1607, Cardinal Bellarmine wrote to Blackwell exhorting him to obey the Brief at any cost. As Blackwell also proved ineffectual a new archpriest, George Birkenhead, or Birkett, was appointed 1–10 Feb., 1608, and Blackwell was informed that his faculties would be taken away if he did not exact in two months. This, however, he still refused to do, and, much to King James's satisfaction, continued to defend his opinion for three years before he was finally suspended. Blackwell's example, as may be imagined, had but too great an influence, and he found successors in his unfortunate apostolate for many a year afterwards.

Meantime James had himself undertook to answer the missives sent to Blackwell. This he did annoyingly in a tract with the quaint title, "Triplici nodo, triplex cuneus" ("A triple wedge for a triple knot", i.e., for two Briefs and the Cardinal's letter). This was answered by Bellarmine, also anonymously, "Responsio ad librum: Triplici nodo, triplex cuneus" (1608). James now dropped his anonymity, and reprinted his tract with a "Premonition to Christian Princes," and an appendix on his adversaries' supposed mistakes (Jan., 1609). Upon this, Bellarmine published, now also using his own name, his "Apologia pro responsione ad librum Jacobi I" (1609). James opposed to this a treatise, which would never be in vogue again, even in Catholic countries. This explains why Bellarmine, Persons, and several other early opponents of the oath went further in their condemnation of it than later theologians would have done. At the same time it is a mistake to suppose that Catholic resistance to the oath was chiefly or solely due to belief in the deposing power. This statement, however, is often made by Protestants (e.g., Hallam) and also by the Catholic writers, like Preston and others who wrote in defence of the oath, or who had Gallican leanings, such as Charles Butler and Canon Tierney, Butler, I, 350, 396; IV, 120, &c.; Tierney-Dodd, IV, 78 n., 81 n.). We have seen on the contrary that there were from the first English Catholic Non-jurors who explicitly rejected the deposing power. Doctor William Bishop, for instance, did this, but still underwent imprisonment for refusing the oath; and he was afterwards made a bishop by the Holy See.

F.—The Roman Index—Some ideas of the pressure caused by the oath may be gathered from the Acta of the Venerable martyrs, Drury, Atkinson, Almond, Thulus, Arrowsmith, Herst, Gervase, Thomas OATHS

Garnett, Gavan, and Heath; the last two have left writings against it. Another illustration will be found in the history of the first Lord Baltimore, whose attempt to settle in Virginia, where the oath had been introduced in 1609, was defeated by it. The second Lord Baltimore, on the other hand, ordered his adventurers to take the oath, but whether he insisted on this is uncertain (Hughes, "Soc. of Jesus in America", i. 151 and passim). But Charles I generally recognized that Catholics could not conscientiously take the Oath of Supremacy, and frequently exerted his prerogative to help them to avoid it. On the other hand his theory of the Divine right of kings induced him to favour the Oath of Allegiance, and he was irritated with the Catholics who refused it or argued against it. Urban VIII is said to have condemned the oath again in 1626 (Reusch, 327), and the controversy continued. Preston still wrote in its defence; so also, at King Charles's order, did Sir William Howard (1634); this was probably the future martyr (q. v.). Their most important opponent was Father Edward Colet, alias Leedes; of Gilpin, "Bibl. Dict." 5 s. v. Leedes, Edward, who was therefore imprisoned by Charles. The matter is frequently mentioned in the dispatches and the "Relazione" of Pannani (q. v.), the papal agent to Queen Elizabeth. Marcus Brady, "Catholic Hierarchy", Rome, 1883, p. 88).

III. OATHS OF ABJURATION UNDER THE COMMONWEALTH, 1643. —When the Puritan party had gained the upper hand during the civil wars, the exaction of the Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance fell into desuetude, and they were repealed by the Act of February, 1650, and their place taken by an "engagement of allegiance" to the Commonwealth. But the law which the Catholics was not only not ameliorated thereby; it was made far worse by the enactment of an "Oath of Abjuration". This was passed 19 August, 1643, and afterwards, in 1655, reissued in an even more objectionable form. Everyone was to be "condemned a Papist" who refused this oath, and the consequent penalties began with the confiscation of two thirds of the recusant's goods, and went on to deprive him of almost every civic right. Monstrous as the enactment were, their barbarity caused some shame among the more high-minded, and in practice they were sparingly enforced. They checked the gallicanizing party among the English Catholics, which had hitherto been ready to offer forms of submission similar to the old oath of Allegiance, which is stated (Reusch, 385) to have been condemned anew about this time by Innocent X. The chief writer on the Catholic side was the lawyer Austin, who generally used the pseudonym Birkley.

IV. THE TEST OATHS, 1672, 1678, also known as the DECLARATION OF ATTREMENT OATHS. —The first Parliament after the Restoration revived the Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance, which were taken on 14 July, 1690. The Catholics in England being at first in some favour at Court, managed, as a rule, to escape taking it. In Ireland the old controversy was revived through an address to the Crown, called "The Irish Remonstrance", which emphasized the principles of the condemned Oath of Allegiance. It had been demanded by a Capuchin who, having left the order, called Peter Walsh (Vallesiis), who published many books in its defence, which publications were eventually placed upon the Index. (Masere Brady, "Catholic Hierarchy", Rome, 1888, p. 150.) After the conversion of James, then Duke of York, the jealousy of the Protestant party increased, and in 1672 a Test Act was carried by Shaftesbury, which compelled all holders of office under the Crown to make a short declaration that "Transubstantiation", viz., to swear that "there is not any transubstantiation in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. . . . at or after the consecration thereof by any person whatsoever" (25 Chas. II, c. 2). This test was effective: James resigned his post of Lord High Admiral. But when the country and the Parliament had gone mad over Oates's plot, 1678, a much longer and more insidious device was devised. It was added a further clause that "the invocation of the Virgin Mary, or any Saint and the Sacrifice of the Mass . . . are superstitious and idolatrous . . . and that I make this declaration without any equivocation, or mental reservation whatsoever, and without any dispensation already granted me by the pope, &c., &c. (30 Chas. II, ii. 1). In modern times, the formula has become notorious (as we shall see) under the title of "the King's Declaration". At the time it was appointed for office holders and the members of both Houses, except the Duke of York. On the death of Charles, James II succeeded, and he would no doubt have gladly abolished the anti-Catholic oaths altogether. But he never had the opportunity of bringing the project before Parliament. Of the Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance we hear less in this reign, but the Test Act is the subject of constant discussion, for its form and scope had been expressly intended to hamper a reform such as James was instituting. He freed himself, moreover, more or less from it by the dispensing Power, especially after the declaration of the judges, June, 1686, that it was contrary to the principles of the constitution to prevent the Crown from using the services of any of its subjects when they were needed. But the Revolution of 1688 quickly brought the Test back into greater vogue than ever. The first Parliament summoned after the triumph of William of Orange added a clause to the Bill of Rights, which was then passed, by which the Sovereign was himself to take the Declaration (1 W. & M., sess. 2, c. 2.). While the Test was obligatory on holders of every sort of office, there was little need to insist on the old Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance. They were therefore cut down to a line or two, and added with the oath of fidelity to King William (1 W. & M., sess. 1, c. 8). By this unworthy device no Catholic could ever be admitted to the new regime, without renouncing his faith. This law marks the consummation of English anti-Catholic legislation.

V. THE IRISH OATH OF 1774 TO EMANCIPATION, 1829. —For ninety years there seemed no hope of obtaining legislative relief from the pressure of the penal laws, and the first relaxations were due to external pressure. In 1770 General Burgoyne had proposed to free Catholic soldiers from the obligations of the Test, but in vain. In 1771, however, it was necessary to pass the Quebec Act, and the clause adding the first measure of toleration for Catholics sanctioned by Parliament since the days of Queen Mary Tudor. Soon after began the war of American Independence, the difficulties of which gradually awakened English statesmen to the need of reconciling Catholics. The Irish Government took the first step by undoing William III's wicked work of joining the profession of fidelity to the sovereign with the rejection of papal authority. In 1774 an oath was proposed of allegiance to King George (§ 1) and rejection of the Pretender (§ 2), but without prejudice to the pope's spiritual authority, or to any dogma of the Faith. The alleged "false practice" of "no faith with heretics" was reversed (§ 3), so was the deposing power (§ 4), but without the objectionable words, "impious, damnable and heretical." "The temporal and civil jurisdiction of the pope, direct and indirect within the realm" was also abjured (§ 5), and the promise was given that no dispensation from this oath should be considered valid (§ 6). This Irish Oath, of 1774, was accepted by the legislative authorities as proof of loyalty, and it was freely taken, although several clauses were ingeniously worded, though no advantage accrued from so doing. In 1778 however, the first Relief Bill, also called Sir George Savile's Act, to relieve the English Catholic from the worst consequences of the penal laws, came before the English Parliament, and in it was embodied the Irish Oath (18 George III, c. 60). This Act was passed with little difficulty, and the oath was taken without remonstrance by the clergy of all schools.

The relief given by the Bill of 1778 was so imperfect that further legislation was soon called for, and now the disadvantages of the system of tests were acutely felt. A committee of lay Catholics, with Gallican proclivities, who afterwards characteristically called themselves the Cisalpine Club were negotiating with the Government (see Butler, Charles). To them it was represented that if more concessions were required more assurances should be given. They were accordingly presented with a long "Protest," which not only rejected the alleged malpractices, already disowned by the Irish Oath, but denounced against them and others of the same kind in strong but unorthodox language. It reintroduced, for instance, the objectionable terms "impious, heretical and damnable" of James' Oath of Allegiance. That complications might have ensued from signing such a document was not difficult to foresee.

Nevertheless, the committee insisted (1) that words would be understood in a broad popular way, and (2) that, to obtain the Relief Act, it must be signed accordingly. To prevent such a misfortune, it was freely signed by laity and clergy, and by the four vicars Apostolic, but two of these recalled their names. When, however, the signatures had been obtained, the new Relief Bill was brought forward by Government, with an oath annexed founded on the Protest (hence called the "Protestation Oath"), which excluded from relief those who would not swear to it, and accept the name of "Protesting Catholic Dissenters". A crisis had arisen for the Catholic Church in England; but, with the crisis came the man. It was John Milner (q. v.), then only a country priest, to whose energy and address the dissipation of this danger was chiefly due.

The Second Relief Act, therefore, passed (1781) without changing the previous oath, or the name of Catholics. Though the Emancipation Bill was eventually carried without any test, this was not foreseen at first. The Catholic Committee continued its endeavours for disarming Protestant prejudices, but their proposals (like the Veto) too often savoured of Gallicanism. So too did the oath annexed to the bill proposed in 1813, which from its length was styled the "Theological Oath". Eventually, owing to the general distress exercised by Daniel O'Connell and the Irish, Catholic Emancipation was fully, if tardily, granted without any test at all in 1829.

VI. REPEAL OF THE STATUTORY OATHS AGAINST CATHOLICITY, 1807-1910.—The Relief Bills, hitherto mentioned, were generally measures of relief only, leaving the old statutes, oaths, and tests still upon the Statute Book, and some of the chief officers of State had still to take them. The actual repeal of the disused tests and oaths of William III have only taken place in quite recent times. In 1867 the Declaration was repealed (30, 31 Vict., c. 75). After this, the only person bound to pronounced the oath was the king himself at the commencement of his reign. In 1871 the Promissory Oaths Bill removed all the old Oath of Allegiance (34, 35 Vict., c. 48). In 1891 the first attempt was made by Lord Herries in the House of Lords to get rid of the king's Declaration, but the amendments offered by Government were so insignificant that the Catholics themselves voted against their being proposed at all. In 1901 strong resolutions were passed against its retention by the Canadian House of Commons, as also by its hierarchy, and these were emphasized by similar petitions from the hierarchies of Australia and the Catholics of the English colonies. In 1904, 1905, and 1908 bills or motions to the same effect were introduced by Lord Braye, Lord Grey, Lord Llandaff, the Duke of Norfolk, and Mr. Redmond, but without the desired effect. After the death of King Edward VII, however, King George V is believed to have urged the Government to bring in a repealing Act. This was done and public opinion, after some wavering, strongly on the side of the Bill, which was carried through both Houses by large majorities, and received Royal Assent on 3 August, 1910, thus removing the last anti-Catholic oath or declaration from the English constitution.

OAXACA (or ANTEQUERA), ARCHDIOCESE, situated in the southern part of the Republic of Mexico, bounded on the north by the Bishopric of Huajuspan and the Archdiocese of Puebla, on the east by the Bishopric of Vera Cruz, on the west by that of Tehuantepec, and on the south by the Pacific Ocean. When the conquest of New Spain was accomplished, Hernán Cortés sought the aid of the powerful Texcaltitlan, which had established a republic and were at war with the Aztec Emperor Moctezuma. Out of gratitude to the Texcaltitlans, the first Bishopric that was established on the continent was called Texcoco, that of Mexico was second, and later that of Guatemala. Oaxaca, the fourth in the order of succession, was established, under the name of Antequera, by Paul III, 21 July, 1553, the first bishop, the Right Rev. Juan López de Zárate, having been preconized that same year. From then to the present day only thirty bishops have governed the diocese, the last being the Most Rev. Eulogio G. Gillow, preconized 23 May, 1887. On 23 June, 1891, Antequera was raised to the rank of an archbishopric by Leo XIII, and has, at the present time as suffragan dioceses, Chilapa, Yucatan, Tabasco, Tehuantepec, and Campeche.

Prior to the Conquest the religion of the entire extensive region now comprised in the Archdiocese of Antequera, or Oaxaca, was idolatry. The different people that populated this district, the Mixteca, Zapoteca, Mixe, antinanteaca predominating, although twenty-two entirely different dialects are known among them. The famous ruins of Monte Alban, Oaxaca, a venerable priest of the entire American continent resided there, one who was greatly venerated not only by the different villages of the ancient Anahuac, but by others; as the most ancient history that when the conquerors landed in Vera Cruz, Moctezuma consulted the High-Priest Ahualtzin, who announced to him that the oracle had predicted the end of his empire. Abjunctly crushed, the Emperor yielded to the Spaniards. The kings of Zacachilis and Tehuantepec received baptism and submitted to the mild yoke of the Church. After the conquest of Moctezuma's empire the Spaniards who penetrated to Tenochtitlan were amazed to see the wealth that Moctezuma had accumulated, and in all probability knew that a great part of the gold came from Oaxaca. The first they turned their footsteps towards Oaxaca, where the first Mass was celebrated on 25 Nov., 1521, feast of St. Catherine, martyr. Beginning then development was very rapid, as much perhaps from the fact that Cortez was created Marquis of Valley de Oaxaca, in recognition of his distinguished services, as because of the rich mineral resources of the country, whose importance was such that it ranked next to the City of Mexico itself. Missionaries of the different religious orders were introduced: Franciscan, Dominicans, Augustinian, Jesuits, Friars of the Order of Mercy, Carmelites, Brothers of St. John, Benedictines, and Oratorians. All these congregations built handsome churches in the capital of Oaxaca, which are still in existence, with their convents and subordinate houses annexed. The Dominicans laboured most assiduously for the propagation of the natives by means of missions and parochial work. Four Bishops of Oaxaca have been drawn from that order, while four other orders have each produced one.

The archbishopric at the present time comprises besides the metropolitan chapter, which is composed of the dean, archdeacon, and chantor, a theological censors, a canon precentorial, and six other canons. There is a master of ceremonies, a priest sacristan of the main cathedral, and four choir chaplains. The ecclesiastical government consists of a vicar-general, a secretary of the Executive Council, and two assistants. The duties of the Protonotary are discharged by the provost, fiscal promoter, defender of the Holy Office, and diocesan attorney. There is also a Commission of Rites, composed of four ecclesiastics, one of Christian Doctrine under the charge of six ecclesiastics, and a School Board made up of three clergymen and two laymen.

There are 3 parishes in the city each with its respective church, and 19 other churches, that of St. Dominic being notable for the beauty of its architecture and the richness of its ornamentation. The cathedral, which has a nave and four aisles, is remarkable for its beautiful style and ornamentation, its decorations, the beauty of its altars, sacred vessels, and vestments, the present bishop having devoted great thought and expenditure to improvements of this kind, which increase the dignity of the service. There exist in the archdiocese 25 parochies (deaneries) which comprise 132 parishes and 223 priests.

Only within recent years have there been any Protestants in Oaxaca; these hold their services in private houses. It is not easy to give exactly the number of Catholics belonging to the archbishopric, because they are chiefly natives who live in the rural districts and surrounding mountains, but the population is estimated in 1810 at 1,841,032. The State does not sanction the existence of religious communities of men or women. Since they must carry on their various works without attracting public notice, it is difficult to give the exact number of their members, or of the institutions under their care. So, too, while the parochial schools are steadily increasing it is almost impossible to give their exact number. In the city of Oaxaca (in 1810, p. 437, 468) there is a seminarium divided into three sections: theological students (clericales), seminarians (seminaristas), and preparatory students (apostolicales), of whom 102 are interns, under the charge of 6 Paulist Fathers, 6 assistant professors, and 3 coadjutor brothers. The College of the Holy Ghost, established to train the sons of the best families for various careers, has 70 boarders and 250 day scholars under the direction of 8 ecclesiastics and several professors of the Church. There are also 3 select academies for young women, with an attendance of 600; 6 free schools for boys, with 1800 pupils, and 4 for girls, with 700. Among the charitable institutions under Catholic control are a day nursery accommodating 80 children under the care of 5 nurses; a charity hospital with 24 beds, 12 for men and 12 for women, and a home for the poor with about 90 inmates.

OBEDIENCE

See ARDIA.

Obarda, MONASTERY OF, Diocese of Tulle, founded by St. Stephen of Obardia about 1134. After his ordination St. Stephen, with another priest, Pierre, began the eremitical life. They attracted a number of followers and with the sanction of Eustorgo, Bishop of Tulle, built a monastery on a site granted them by the Viscount Archambault.

Before 1142 they had no established rule; however, in this year, St. Stephen was clothed with the regular habit. He had Cistercian monks train his followers in their mode of life, and affiliated his abbey to Citeaux (1147). The number increasing, several foundations were made. Among the most illustrious abbots of Obardine were François d'Escobelu (d. 1296), Archbishop of Bordeaux, and Charles de la Roche-Ayon (d. 1777), Cardinal Archbishop of Rennes. The monastery was confiscated by the Government during the Revolution (1791). The abbatial church, partly restored, now serves as a parish church.

Obba, titular see in Byzacena, northern Africa, of unknown history, although mentioned by Polybius (XIV, vi, under the name of Abba), and Titus Livius (XXX, vii). Situated on the highway from Carthage to Thubeste (Tebessa), seven miles from Lares (Lorbeus) and sixteen from Althiburos (Henshir Medina), it is the modern Ebba. Three bishops are known, Paul, present at the Council of Carthage in 225, probably the Paul mentioned in the Fasti of Januar. Felicissimus, a Donatist, present at the conference at Carthage in 411; and Valerianus, at the Council of Constantinople, 553.

S. PĂTĂRIȚE, OE

Obedience (Lat. obedientia, "to hearken to", hence "to obey") is the complying with a command or precept. It is here regarded not as a transitory and isolated act but rather as a virtue or principle of righteous conduct. It is then said to be the moral habit by which one carries out the order of his superior with the precise intent of fulfilling the injunction. St. Thomas Aquinas considers the obligation of obedience as an obvious consequence of the subordination established in the world by the natural and positive law. The idea that subjection of any sort of one man to another is incompatible with human freedom—a notion that had vogue in the religious and political teachings of the post-Reformation period—he refutes by showing that it is at variance with the constituted nature of things, and the positive prescriptions of Almighty God. It is worthy of note that whilst it is possible to discern a general aspect of obedience in some acts of all the virtues, in so far as obedience stands for the execution of anything that is of precept, it is contemplated in this article as a definitely special virtue.
The element that differentiates it adequately from other good habits is found in the last part of the definition already given. Stress is put upon the fact that one not only does what is actually enjoined but does it with a mind to conforming to the will of the commander. It is in other words the homage rendered to authority which ranks it as a distinct virtue. Among the virtues obedience holds an exalted place but not the highest. That distinction belongs to the virtues of faith, hope, and charity (q. v.) which unite us immediately with Almighty God. Amongst the moral virtues obedience enjoys a primacy of honour. The reason is that the greater or lesser excellence of a moral virtue is determined by the greater or lesser value of the object which it qualifies one to put aside in order to give oneself to God. Now amongst our various possessions, whether goods of the body, or goods of the soul, it is clear that the human will is the most intimately personal and most cherished of all. So it happens that obedience, which makes a man yield up the most dearly prized stronghold of the individual soul in order to do the good pleasure of the Creator, is accounted the greatest of the moral virtues. As to whom we are to obey, there can be no doubt that first we are bound to offer an unreserved service to Almighty God in all His commandments. No real difficulty against this truth can be gathered from putting in juxtaposition the unchangeableness of the natural law and an order, such as that given to Abraham to slay his son. The conclusive answer is that the absolute sovereignty of God over life and death made it right in that particular instance to undertake the killing of an innocent human being at His direction. On the other hand the obligation of obedience to superiors under God admits of limitations. We are not bound to obey a superior in a matter which does not fall within the limits of his preceptive power. Thus for instance parents, although entitled beyond question to the submission of their children until they become of age, have no right to command them to marry. Neither can a superior claim our obedience in contravention of the dispositions of a higher authority. Hence, properly, we can obey the behests of any human power no matter how venerable or undisputed as against the ordinances of God. All authority to which we bow has its source in Him and cannot validly be used against Him. It is thus recognition of the authority of God vicariously exercised through a human agent that confers upon the act of obedience its special merit. No hard and fast rule can be set down for determining the degree of guilt of the sin of disobedience. Reduction of formally as a deliberate scorning of the authority itself, it would involve a divorce between the soul and the supernatural principle of charity which is tantamount to a previous sin. As a matter of fact many other things have to be taken account of, as the greater or less adverrence in the act, the relatively important or trifling character of the thing imposed, the manner of enjoining, the right of the person who commands. For such reasons the sin will frequently be esteemed venial.

Obedience, Religious, is that general submission which devoutly and voluntarily promise to their superiors, in order to be directed by them in the ways of perfection according to the purpose and constitutions of their order. It consists, according to Leusius (De Justitia, II, xvi, 37), in a man’s allowing himself to be governed throughout his life, both in the spirit of humility which is the very essence of God. It is composed of three elements: (a) the sacrifice offered to God of his own independence in the generality of his actions, at least of such as are exterior; (b) the motive, namely, personal perfection, and, as a rule, also the performance of spiritual or corporal works of mercy and charity; (c) the express or implied contract with an order (formerly also with a person), which accepts the obligation to lead him to the end for which he accepts it, and in which he at least implies, if not actually agrees, that a man should give himself up absolutely to the guidance of another. The choice of a superior, the object of obedience, the authority of the hierarchical Church, all exclude the idea of arbitrary rule.

I.—The Canonical Rule of Obedience. — A. — The Superior. — By Divine law, religious persons are subject to the hierarchy of the Church; first to the pope, then to the bishops, unless exempted by the pope from episcopal jurisdiction. This hierarchy was instituted by Christ in order to direct the faithful not only in the way of salvation, but also in Christian perfection. The vow of obedience in the institutes approved by the Holy See is held more and more to be made equally to the pope, who communicates his authority to the Roman congregations entrusted with the direction of religious orders. The superiors of the different orders, when they are clerical and exempt from jurisdiction, similarly receive a part of this authority; and every one who is placed at the head of a community is invested with the domestic authority necessary for the good government of his house. For its good government, the religious offers to God the obedience which he promises to his superiors confirms and defines this authority. But the right to demand obedience in virtue of the vow does not necessarily belong to all superiors; it is ordinarily reserved to the hierarchy of the Church: and in order to enforce the obligation, it is necessary that the superior should make known his intention to bind the conscience; in certain orders such expressions as “I will,” “I command,” have not such binding force. The instructions of the Holy See require that the power of binding the conscience by command shall be employed with the utmost prudence and discretion.

B. — The limits of the obligation. — The commands of superiors do not extend to what concerns the inward motion of the will. Such at least is the teaching of St. Thomas (II-II, Q. cxvi, a. 5, Q. clxxvi, a. 2). Obedience is not bowed down absolutely; it is limited, but according to the rule of each order, for a superior cannot command anything foreign to, or outside, his rule (except in so far as he may grant dispensations from the rule). No appeal lies from his order, that is to say, the obligation of obedience is a deliberate scorning of the authority by any appeal to higher authority; but the inferior has always the right of extra-judicial recourse to a higher authority in order to the Holy See.

II. — The Moral Significance. — The religious is bound morally to obey on all occasions when he is bound canonically, and whenever his disobedience would offend against the law of charity, as for instance by bringing discord into the community. By reason of the vow of obedience and of the religious profession a deliberate act of obedience and submission adds the merit of an act of the virtue of religion to the other merits of the act. This extends even to the obedience of counsel which goes beyond matters of regular observance, and is also limited by the prescriptions of higher laws, whether human or Divine.

OBERNIE.

the readiness to accept a common rule and direction manifests a spirit of union and concord which generously adapts itself to the desires and tastes of others; eagerness to do the will of God in all things is a mark of the charity towards God which led Christ to say "I do always the things which please my Father" (John, vii, 25). And since the Church has invested superiors with the plenitude of authority, religious obedience is supported by all those texts which recommend submission to lawful powers, and especially by the following: "He that heareth you, heareth me" (Luke, x, 16).

Philosophically religious obedience is justified (a) by the experience of the mistakes and illusions to which a man relying on his own unaided opinions is liable. The religious proposes to rule his whole life by devotion to God and his neighbour; how shall he best realise this ideal? By regulating all his actions by his own judgment, or by choosing a prudent and enlightened guide who will give his advice without any consideration of himself? Is it not clear that the latter alternative shows a resolution more sincere, more generous, and at the same time more likely to lead to a successful issue? This obedience is justified also (b) by the help of example and counsel afforded by community life and the acceptance of a rule of conduct, the holiness of which is vouched for by the Church; (c) lastly, since the object of religious orders is not only the perfection of their members, but also the performance of spiritual and manual works of mercy, they need a union of efforts which can only be assured by religious obedience, just as military obedience is indispensable for success in the operations of war.

Religious obedience never reduces a man to a state of passive inertness; it does not prevent the use of any faculty he may possess, but sanctions the use of all. It does not forbid any initiative, but subjects it to prudent control in order to preserve it from indiscretion and keep it in the line of true charity. A member of a religious order has often been compared to a dead body, but in truth nothing is killed by the religious vow but vanity and self-love and all their fatal opposition to the Divine will. If superiors and subjects have sometimes failed to understand the practice of religious obedience, if direction has sometimes been indirect, these are accidental imperfections from which no human institution is free. The unbounded zeal of men like St. Francis Xavier and other saints who loved their rule, the prominent part which religious have taken in the mission field, and their successes therein, the savage war which the enemies of the Faith have at all times waged against the religious orders, and these furnish the most eloquent testimony to the happy influence of religious obedience in developing the activity which it sanctions. The expression "blind obedience" signifies not an unconscious or unreasonable submission to authority, but a keen appreciation of the rights of authority, the reasonableness of submission, and blindness only to such selfish or worldly considerations as would lessen regard for authority.

At present, religious have taken a far greater part than formerly in civil and public life, personally fulfilling all the conditions required of citizens, in order to exercise their right of voting and other functions compatible with their profession. Obedience does not interfere with the proper exercise of such rights. No political system rejects the votes of persons in dependent positions, but all freely permit the use of any legitimate influence which corrects to some extent the vicious tendency of equitarians: the influence of religious superiors is limited to safeguarding the higher interests of the Church. The superior, to whom the right of any religious is fulfilled, the superior, by the very fact of permitting his subjects to undertake them, grants all the liberty that is required for their honourable fulfilment.

In conclusion — Though the early hermits were not in a position to practise religious obe-

Obidientiaries, a name commonly used in medieval times for the lesser officials of a monastery who were appointed by will of the superior. In some cases the word is used to include all those who held office beneath the abbot, but more frequently the prior and sub-prior are excluded from those signified by it. To the obedientiaries were assigned the various duties pertaining to their different offices and they possessed considerable power in their own departments. There was always a right of appeal to the abbot or superior, but in practice most details were settled by the "customary" of the monastery. The list that follows gives the usual titles of the obedientiaries, but in some monasteries other names were used and other official positions may be found: thus, for example, to this day, in the great Swiss monastery of Einsiedeln the "deacon" is given to the official who is called prior in all other Benedictine houses.

(1) The "cantor," or "precentor," usually assisted by the "sub-cantor," or "sub-cantorum" (Cantor). (2) The sacrist, or sacristan, who had charge of the monastic church and of all things necessary for the services. He had, as a rule, several assistants: (a) the sub-sacrist, also known as the secretary; (b) the "matutinarius" or "matutinarii," who was the treasurer; (c) the "vestiarium." (3) The cellarer, or bursar, who acted as chief purveyor of all food-stuffs to the monastery and as general steward. In recent times the name procurator is often found used for this office (c) and also for (a) the subcellar; (b) the "granatorius." Chapter xxx of St. Benedict's Rule tells "What kind of man the Cellarer ought to be;" in practice this position is the most responsible one after that of abbot or superior. (4) The refectorietor, who had charge of the refectory and its furniture, including such things as crockery, cloths, dishes, spoons, forks, etc. (5) The kitchener, who presided over the cookery department, not only for the community but for all guests, dependents, etc. (6) The novice master (see Novice), whose assistant was sometimes called the "zeltator." (7) The infirmarian, besides looking after the sick brethren, was also responsible for the quarterly "blood letting" of the monks, a custom almost universal in medieval monasteries. (8) The guest-master, whose duties are dealt with in chapter lii of St. Benedict's Rule. (9) The almoner. (10) The chamberlain, or "varietarius."

Besides these officials who were appointed more or less permanently, there were certain others appointed for a week at a time to carry out various duties. These positions were usually filled in turn by all brethren of the rank of sub-prior, though very busy officials, e.g., the cellarer, might be excused. The chief of these was the hebdomadarius, or priest for the week. It was his duty to sing the office for the entire week and to preside at the several masses on all days during the week, to intone the "Deus in adjutorium" at the beginning of each of the canonical hours, to bless holy water, etc. The antiphoner was also appointed for a week at a time. It was his duty to read or sing the invitatory at Matins, to sing out the first antiphon at the Psalms, and also the versicles, responsories, and other services, other than those given by the readers in the chapters and refectory. The weekly reader and servers in the kitchen and refectory entered upon their duties on Sunday when, in company with the servers of the previous week, they had to ask and receive a special blessing in choir as directed in chapters xxxv and xxxviii of St. Benedict's Rule. Nowadays the tendency is toward a simplification in the details of monastic life and consequently to a reduction in the number of officials in a monastery, but all the more important offices named above exist to-day in every monastery though the name obtientiariea has quite dropped out of everyday use.

Oblate Sisters of Providence, a congregation of negro nuns founded at Baltimore, Md., by the Rev. Jacques Hector Nicholas Joubert de la Muraille, for the education of coloured children. Father Joubert belonged to a noble French family forced by the Revolution to take refuge in San Domingo. Alone of his family, he escaped from a massacre and went to Baltimore, entering St. Mary's Seminary. After his ordination he was given charge of the coloured Catholics of St. Mary's chapel. Finding he was making no headway as the sermons were not remembered and there were no schools where the children could be taught, he formed the idea of founding a religious community for the purpose of educating these children. In this he was encouraged by his two friends, Fathers Babade and Tessier. He was introduced to four coloured women, who kept a small private school, and lived a retired life with the forlorn hope of conspiring their lives to God. Father Joubert made known to them his plans and they offered to be at his service. With the approval of the Archbishop of Baltimore a novitiate was begun and on 2 July, 1829, the first four sisters, Miss Elisabeth Lange of Santiago, Cuba, Miss Mary Rosine Boegues of San Domingo, Miss Mary Frances Balas of San Domingo, Miss Margarette, all of whom were born in Baltimore made their vows. Sister Mary Elisabeth was chosen superior, and Rev. Father Joubert was appointed director. Gregory XVI approved the order on 1 October, 1831 under the title of Oblate Sisters of Providence. At present the sisters conduct schools and orphanages at Baltimore, Washington, Leavenworth, St. Louis, Normandy (Mo.), and 4 houses in Cuba, 2 in Havana, 1 in Santa Clara, 1 in Cardenas. The mother-house and novitiate is at Baltimore. There were 136 sisters, 9 novices, and 7 postulants in 1910.

Oblates of Mary Immaculate.—I. NAME AND ORIGIN.—The first members of this society, founded in 1816, were known as "Missionaries of Providence." They received the title of "Oblate Sisters of Mary Immaculate" and approbation as a congregation under simple vows in a Brief of Leo XII dated 17 February, 1826. The founder, Charles Joseph Eugène de Mazenod (b. at Aix 1 August, 1782), left France at an early age on account of the Revolution, and remained four years at Venice, one at Naples, and three at Palermo, before returning to Paris, where he entered St. Sulpice in 1803. He was ordained St. Amiens on 21 December, 1811. In 1818 he had gathered a small community around him, and made his religious profession at the church of the Mission, Aix, with MM. Mounier, Tempel, Myse, and Moreau as fellow-priests, and MM. Dupuis, Courtois, and Suzanne as scholastic students. He became Vicar-General of Marseilles in 1823, titular Bishop of Lesbia and coadjutor in 1834, and Bishop of Marseilles in 1837. In 1836 he was named senator and member of the Legion of Honour by Napoleon III., and died in 1861, having been superior-general of his congregation from 1836 to that date.

II. MEMBERS AND ORGANIZATION.—The congregation consists of priests and lay-brothers, leading a common life. The latter act as temporal coadjutors, farm or workshop instructors in industrial and reformatory schools, and teachers in the foreign missions. The central and supreme authority of the society is two-fold: (1) intermittent and extraordinary, as vested in the general chapter meeting once in six years, and composed of the general administrators, provincials, vicars, and representatives of foreign missions. The central and supreme authority of the society is two-fold: (1) intermittent and extraordinary, as vested in the general chapter meeting once in six years, and composed of the general administrators, provincials, vicars, and representatives of foreign missions. The central and supreme authority of the society is two-fold: (2) ordinary, as vested in the superior-general elected for life by the general chapter, and assisted by a council of four assistants and a bursar-general, named for a term of years, renewable by the same authority. The general administration was situated at Marseilles until 1861, when it was transferred to Paris; the persecutions of 1902 obliged its removal to Liège in 1905, whence it was transferred to Rome in 1905. The congregation is officially represented at the Holy See by a procurator-general named by the central administration; this authority also elects the superior-general of the Holy Family Sisters of Bordeaux, founded by Abbé de Noailles, and by him confined to the spiritual direction of the Oblate Fathers. Until 1881 all Oblate houses were directly dependent on the central administration. The general chapter held in that year divided its dependencies into provinces and missionary vicariates, each having its own provincial or vicar aided by a council of four consultors and a bursar. At the head of each regularly constituted house there was a local superior aided by two assessors and a bursar, all named by the provincial administration. The educational establishments also possess a special council of professors and directors.
III. RECRUITING is made by means of juniorates, novitiates, and scholastics. (a) Juniorates or Apostolic Schools.—The first establishment of this description was founded in 1841 by the Oblates of Notre Dame at St. Louis, Missouri, and was soon followed by the Jesuit Fathers at Avignon, became widely adopted in France. The congregation has at present thirteen juniorates situated: at Ottawa, Brossard, Saint Antonio (Texas), St. Boniface (Manitoba), and Strathcona (Alberta) in the new world; St. Charles (Holland), Waaregem (Belgium), Sancta Maria a Vico and Naples (Italy), Urnietta (Spain), and Belcampo Hall (Ireland) in Europe; Colombo and Jaffna in the Island of Ceylon. (b) Novitiates are fed from the juniorates, and also from colleges, seminaries, and gymnasiums. They are at present thirteen in number and situated at Lachine (Canada), Tewksbury (Massachusetts), San Antonio (Texas), St. Charles (Manitoba), St. Gerlach, Hinfeld, and Maria Engelport (Germany), Niewenhove (Belgium), Le Bestin (Luxembourg), St. Pierre d'Aoste (Italy), Urmitza (Spain), Stillsorga (Ireland), and Colombo (Ceylon). (c) Scholastics receive novices who have been admitted to temporal vows at the end of a year's probation. The first scholasticate of the congregation was dedicated to the Sacred Heart at Montivel, Marcellin, in 1857; it was then transferred to Paris in 1862, to Dublin in 1864, to St. Francis (Holland) in 1869, and to Liège in 1891. The ten establishments at present occupied are situated at Ottawa, Tewksbury, San Tomaso, Rome, Liège, Hinfeld, Stillsorga, Turin, and Colombo (2).

IV. ENDS AND MEANS.—The congregation was formed to repair the havoc caused by the French Revolution, and its very existence is a sign of religious revival. Its multiple ends may thus be divided: (a) Primary: (1) To revive the spirit of faith among rural and industrial populations by means of missions and retreats, in which devotion to the Sacred Heart and to Mary Immaculate is recommended as a supernatural means of regeneration. "He hath sent me to preach the Gospel to the poor," has been adopted as the device of the congregation. (2) Care of young men's societies, Catholic clubs, etc. (3) Formation of clergy in seminaries. (b) Secondary or Derived.—To adapt itself to the different circumstances arising from its rapid development in new countries, the congregation has necessarily extended its sphere of action to parochial organization, to the direction of industrial or reformatory schools, of establishments of secondary education in its principal centers, of higher institutes of learning, such as the University of Ottawa (see Ottawa, University Of). V. PROMINENT MEMBERS, PAST AND PRESENT.—(a) Superior Generals: Mgr de Mazenod (1816); Very Rev. J. Fabre (1811); L. Scoullier (1859); C. Augier (1858); A. Labillardiere (1896); Mgr A. Donkenwill (1906). (b) Obole Bishops: (1) Deceased: de Mazenod, Bishop of Marseilles; Guebret (1802-86), Cardinal Archibishop of Paris; Secerina (1815-68), Vicar Apostolic of Cartagena; Guigues (1805-74), first Bishop of Ottawa; Allard (1806-89), first Vicar Apostolic of Natal; Faraud (1823-90), first Vicar Apostolic ofAthabaska-Mackenzie; D'Herbez (1822-90), first Vicar Apostolic of British Columbia (1837-92), first Archbishop of Colombo; Taché (1823-94), first Archbishop of St. Boniface; Ballan (1828-1905), Archbishop of Auck.; Mélazin (1844-1905), Archbishop of Colombo; Grandin (1829-1902), first Bishop of St. Albert; Clut (1832-1907), Auxiliary Bishop of Athabaska-Mackenzie; Jolivet (1826-1903), Vicar Apostolic of Natal; Durieu (1830-99), first Bishop of New Westminster; Anthony Gaughen (1849-1901), Vicar Apostolic of Orange River Colony; (c) Living: Donkenwill, Augustin, titular Archbishop of Potemkis, and actual superior general; Langevin, Archbishop of St. Boniface (consecrated 1866); Coudert, Archbishop of Colombo (1898); Grouard, Vicar Apostolic of Athabaska (1891); Pascal, Bishop of Prince Albert (1891); Jolain, Bishop of Jaffna (1893); Legal, Bishop of St. Albert (1897); Breynat, Vicar Apostolic of Mackenzie (1902); Mauduit, Vicar Apostolic of Orange River Colony (1902); Delalle, Vicar Apostolic of Natal (1894); Miller, Vicar Apostolic of Transvaal (1894); Joussard, Coadjutor of Athabaska-Mackenzie (1899); Ceven, Vicar Apostolic of Natal (1899); Fallon, Bishop of London, Ontario (1910); Charlebois, first Vicar Apostolic of Keewatin, Canada (1910).

VI. PRINCIPAL Undertakings.—(a) General: (1) In canonically constituted countries a parish church or public chapel is attached to each establishment of Oblates. The parishes are all provided with schools, while many have colleges or academies and a hospital. Several of the parochial residences (e.g., Buffalo, Montreal, Quebec, etc.) serve as centres for missionaries who assist the parochial clergy by giving retreats or missions and taking temporary charge of parishes. (2) In new or missionary countries, the pastors are considered as fixed residences from which the missionaries radiate to surrounding fields of action (e.g., Edmonton and Calgary, Alberta). Each of these centres possesses fully equipped schools, while many have convents, boarding schools, and hospitals. Instruction is given in English, French, and in the vernacular, in the religious communities or by the fathers and brothers themselves. Independent mission work is carried on by the periodic recurrence of missions or retreats, and the regular instructions of catechists. The printing press is much used, and the congregation has published complete dictionaries and other works in the native idioms among which it labours.

(b) Special: (1) Canada.—Until recent years the evangelization of the Canadian West and of British Columbia was the almost exclusive work of the Oblate Fathers, as that of the extreme north still is. Cathedrals, churches, and colleges were built by them, and often handed over to secular clergy or to other religious communities (as in the case of the St. Boniface College, which is at present flourishing under the direction of the Society of Jesus). The Archepiscopal See of St. Boniface since 1858, and the episcopal Sees of St. Albert, Prince Albert, with the Vicariates of Athabaska and Mackenzie since their foundation, have been, and are still occupied by Oblates. That of New Westminster (1869). The Diocese of Ottawa had an Oblate as first bishop, and owes the foundation of most of its parishes and institutions to members of the congregation, who have also founded a number of the centres in the new Vicariates of the Labrador, the Gulf of St. Lawrence, as well as in the Diocese of Chicoutimi. Among the recent labours of the Oblates in the West a special mention must be given to the religious organization of Germans, Poles, and Ruthenians. The new Vicariate of Keewatin (1910) is entrusted to an Oblate bishop, whose missionaries are devoted to the regeneration of nomadic Indian tribes. (2) South Africa.—The Oblates have founded and occupy the four vicariates Apostolic of Natal, Orange River, Basutoland and Transvaal, as also the Prelacy Apostolic of Cimbebasia. Its members served as military chaplains on both sides during the Boer war. (3) Asia.—The Dioceses of Colombo and Jaffna, with their flourishing colleges and missions, are the achievement of the entering zeal of Oblate Fathers under Mgr Bonjean, O.M.I. (4) Western Australia. A missionary vicariate was founded from the British Province in 1894, and is actively engaged in parochial and reformatory work.

VII. Establishments of Education and Formation.—(a) For the Congregation: (1) Schools affording a course of two years in philosophy and social science (three years in Rome), and of four years in theology and sacred sciences according to the spirit and method of St. Thomas. The Roman scholastics follow the programme of the Gregorian University, and graduate in philosophy, theology, canon law, and Scripture. The scholastics at Ottawa graduate in philosophy and theology at the university, of which they form an integral part. (2) Novitiates giving religious formation with adapted studies. (3) Juniorates providing a complete classical course preparatory to the sacred sciences. The Ottawa juniorate makes their course at the neighbouring university, and graduate in the Faculty of Arts. (1) Concerning the Ottawa University see the special article. (2) Grand Seminaries—Until the beginning of 1906 the congregation was in charge of those establishments at Marseilles, Frejus, Ajaccio, and Rome. It is at present entrusted with those of Ajaccio, Ottawa (in connexion with the university), St. Joseph's, and Rome. (3) Normal schools for lay teachers are conducted at Jaffna and Ceylon. (4) Industrial schools with full instruction in farming and craftsmanship by lay brothers and assistants in Manitoba (3), Alberta—Saskatchewan of St. Sauveur, Quebec, and St. Joseph's, Lowell, are important centres of Sacred Heart devotion in the New World. (b) To the Blessed Virgin.—Until the expulsions of 1906 the Oblates directed the ancient pilgrimage shrines of Notre Dame des Lumières, Avignon; N. D. de l'Oser, Gresnoble; N. D. de Bon Secours, Viviers; N. D. de la Garde (Marseille); N. D. de Talence and N. D. de Grenache, Bordeaux; N. D. de Sion, Nancy; and the national pilgrimage of N. D. de Fontmaire near Laval, erected after the Franco-Prussian war. During several years they revived the ancient glories of N. D. du Laus, Gap; N. D. de Clery, Orleans; N. D. de la Rove, Mentone. In England they have the restored pre-Reformation shrine of Our Lady of Grace at Tower Hill, London, and in Canada the shrine of Our Lady of the Rosary at Cap de la Madeleine, Quebec, and Our Lady of Lourdes at Ville Marie and Duck Lake, Saskatoon. In Ceylon they have the national pilgrimage to Our Lady of Mount Meru. (c) To various Saints.—The ancient sanctuary of St. Martin of Tours was re-excavated and revived by Oblate Fathers under Cardinal Guibert in 1862 (see 'Life of Léon Papin Dupont', London, 1882).

Ceylon possesses votive churches to St. Anne at Colombo and St. Anthony at Kochchikadai, and the Canadian West that of St. Anne at Lake St. Anne, which is largely frequented by Indians and half-breeds, as well as white people.

IX. FOUNDATION OF RELIGIOUS COMMUNITIES.

Sisters of the Holy Names of Jesus and Mary (Longueil, 1843); Grey Nuns of Ottawa, separated from the Congregation of Notre-Dame by Bishop Tucheng in 1845; Oblate Sisters of the Sacred Heart and Mary Immaculate founded at St. Boniface by Archbishop Langevin (1905); and a community of over 300 native sisters, and one of teaching brothers of St. Joseph in Ceylon.

APOSTLES OF THE PRINCESS: (A) Periodical on the Work of the Congregation: "Missions des O. M. J.", printed at Rome for the congregation only; "Petites annales des O. M. J." (Liège); "Marie Immaculée" (German); Hünfeld, New Brunswick; the "Missionary Record", started in 1891, was discontinued in 1903. (b) General Newpapers, etc.: the "North West Review" (Winnipeg), "Western Catholic" (Vancouver), "Patriote de l'Ouest" (Duck Lake, Saskatchewan), "Ami du Foyer" (St. Boniface), "Die West Canada" (German), "Gazeta Katolika" (Polish), and a recently established Ruthenian journal (Winnipeg)."Kitchiwa Mateh Sacred Heart Review in Cree" (Sacred Heart P. O. Alta.), "Cemad Llydeig, Messenger of the Catholic Church in Welsh-English" (Llanaewn, North Wales); "Ceylon Catholic Messenger", separate editions in English and Cingalese, and the "Jaffna Catholic" (in English) - all Parochial Bulletins at St. Joseph's, Lowell, Mattawa (Ontario), and St. Peter's, Montreal.

In connection with the table given on page 186, the following points may be mentioned: (1) the "houses" are parochial establishments or mission centres, no mission posts; (2) the table is calculated according to the provinces or vicariates of the congregation, which are not always coextensive with the diocesan divisions; (3) the figures given for France represent the state of affairs before 1902. Since that date a large number of religious remain in France, though isolated. Several establishments have been transferred to Belgium, Italy, and Spain; (4) scholastics, novices, and juniorates are not included.

Oblates of St. Ambrose and St. Charles. SeeAMBROSIANS.

Oblates of Saint Francis de Sales, a congregation of priests founded originally by Saint Francis de Sales at the request of Saint Jane de Chantal. The establishment at Thonon was a preparatory step toward carrying out his design, the accomplishment of which was prevented by his death. With Saint Jane Frances de Chantal's encouragement and assistance, Raymond Bonal of Adge, in France, carried out his plan but this congregation died out at the beginning of the eighteenth century. Two hundred years later it was re-established by Very Rev. Mother Mary Francis Ferdinand, who died in the odour of sanctity, 7 October, 1875, and Abbé Louis Alexandre Alphonse Brisson, a professor in the Seminary of Troyes. In 1899 Father Brisson began Saint Bernard's College, near Troyes. In September, 1871, Father Gilbert (d. 10 November, 1909) joined him, and Mgr Ravinet, Bishop of Troyes, received them and four companions into the novitiate. The Holy See approved temporarily their constitutions, 21 Dec., 1873. The first vows were made 27 August, 1876. The definitive approbation of their constitution was given on 8 December, 1897. The members of the institute are of two ranks, clerics and lay-brothers. The postulate lasts from six to nine months; the novitiate from one year to eighteen months. For the first three years the vows are annual, after that perpetual. The institute is governed by a superior general elected for life, and five counselors elected at each general chapter, which takes place every ten years. The congregation gradually developed in France. It numbered several colleges and five other educational houses when the Government closed them all, 31 July, 1903. The founder returned to Plancy where he died 2 February, 1908. The mother-house was transferred to Rome, and the congregation divided into three provinces, Latin, German, and English. The first comprises France, Belgium, Italy, Greece, and South America; the second Austria, the German Empire and the southern half of its South-west African colony; the third, England, United States, and the north-western part of Cape Colony. Each province is administered by a provincial, appointed by the superior general and his council for ten years. He is assisted by three counsellors elected at each provincial chapter, which meets every ten years, at an interval of five years between the regular general chapters.

The Latin province has a scholasticate at Albano. In 1909 the church of Sts. Celsus and Julian in Rome was given to the Oblates. The novitiate for the Latin and German provinces is in Giove (Umbria). The Ecole Commerciale Ste Croix, in Naxos (Greece), has about fifty pupils, and the College St. Paul at Piraeus (Athens) about two hundred. Four Fathers stationed in Montevideo (Uruguay) are occupied with mission work. They have a flourishing Young Men's Association. In Brazil, three Fathers have the district of Don Pedro do Sul (11,000 square miles with a Catholic population of 20,000). The headquarters of the Uruguay-Brazil mission is at Montevideo, Uruguay. One Oblate is stationed in Ecuador, where before the Revolution of 1897 the congregation had charge of the diocesan seminary of Riobamba, several colleges, and parishes. In 1909 a school for the congregation was opened at Dampiècourt, Belgium. The German province has a preparatory school of about forty students in Schmieding (Upper Austria). They have charge of St. Anne's (French) church in Vienna, also the church of Our Lady of Dolours in Kaasgraben, Vienna, which is served by six Oblates. At Arzsetten, the Archduke Francis Ferdinand gave them charge of the parish (1907) and assisted them to build a school. With the consent of the German Government, Cardinal Fischer gave them the church of Marienburg in 1910. Several Fathers are engaged in mission work. The English province founded its novitiate in Wilmington, Delaware, 23 September, 1903, and transferred it to Childs, Md. (1907). A scholasticate is attached. The Fathers in Wilmington conduct a high school for boys, and are chaplains to several religious communities, the county alms-house, the state insane hospital, the Ferris Industrial School for boys, and the county and state prison. In 1910 the parish of St. Francis de Sales, Salisbury, Md. (1200 square miles with a population of 70,000), was confided to the Oblates.

In Walmer (Kent, England) they have a boarding school for boys, the chaplaincy of the Visitacion Convent and Academy of Roselands, and a small parish in Faversham. To this province belongs the Vicariate Apostolic of the Orange River. (For the Vicariate Apostolic of the Orange River and the Apostolic Vicariate of Great Namaqualand, see Orange River, Vicariate Apostolic of the.)

Oblates of Saint Francis of Rome. See FRANCIS OF ROME, SAINT; OBLATI.

Oblati, Oblates, Oblates, is a word used to describe any persons, not professed monks or friars, who have been offered to God, or have dedicated themselves to any religious institute. It has a variety of particular uses at different periods in the history of the Church. The children vowed and given by their parents to the monastic life, in houses under the Rule of St. Benedict, were commonly known by the name during the century and a half when the custom was in vogue, and the councils of the Church treated them as monks—that is, until the Council of Toledo (650) forbade their acceptance before the age of ten and granted them free permission to leave the monastery, if they wished, when they reached the age of puberty. At a later date the word "oblate" was used to describe such lay men or women as were pensioned off by royal and other patrons upon monasteries or benefices, where they lived as in an almshouse or hospital. In the eleventh century, it is on record that Abbot William of Helechau or Hiraun, in the old Diocese of Spire, introduced lay brethren into the monastery. They were of two kinds: the frater barbati or conversi, who took vows but were not claustral or enclosed monks, and the oblati, workmen or servants who voluntarily subjected themselves, whilst in the service of the monastery, to religious obedience and observance. Afterwards, the different status of the lay brother in the several orders of monks, and the ever-varying regulations concerning him introduced by the many reforms, destroyed the distinction between the conversus and the oblatus. The Cassinese Benedictines, for instance, at first carefully differentiated between conversi, communis, and oblati; the nature of the vows and the forms of the habits were in each case specifically distinct. The conversus, the lay brother properly so called, made solemn vows like the choir monks, and wore the scapular; the communis made simple vows, and was dressed like a monk, but without the scapular; the oblatus made a vow of obedience to the abbot, gave himself and his goods to the monastery, and wore a sober secular dress. But, in 1625, we find the conversus reduced below the status of the communis, insomuch as he was permitted only to make simple vows and that for a year at a time; he was in fact indistinguishable, except by his dress, from the oblatus of a Franciscan monastery. In the later Middle Ages, oblatus, confratre, and donatus became interchangeable titles, given to any one who, for his generosity or special service to the monastery, received the privilege of lay membership, with a share in the prayers and good works of the brethren.

Canonically, only two distinctions were ever of any consequence: first, that between those who entered religion "per modum professionis" and "per modum simplicis conversionis," the former being wosophi and the latter oblati; secondly, that between the oblate who was "mortuus mundo" (that is, who had given himself and his goods to religion without reservation), and the oblate who retained some control over his person and his possessions—the former only (plane oblatus) was accounted a persona ecclesiastica, with enjoyment of ecclesiastical privileges and immunity (Benedict XIV, "De Synodico Concilio," VI).

Congregations of Oblates. Women.—(1) The first society or congregation of oblates was that founded in the fifteenth century by St. Frances of Rome, to which the name of Collatines has been given—apparently by mistake. St. Frances, wife of Lorenzo Ponzani, gathered around her (in 1425, according to Baillet) a number of widows and girls, who formed themselves into a society or confraternity. In 1433, as their own annals witness, she settled them in a house called Tor de' Specchi, at the foot of the Capitol, giving them the Rule of St. Benedict and some constitutions drawn up under her own direction, and putting them under the guidance of the Olivetan monks of Maria Nuova. In the same year she asked confirmation of her society from Eugenius IV, who commissioned Gaspare, Bishop of Cosenza, to report to him on the matter, and some days later granted the request, with permission to make a beginning of oblates in the house near S. Maria Nuova, while she was seeking a more commodious habitation near S. Andrea in Vincio. They have never quitted their first establishment, but have greatly increased and beautified it. The object of the foundation was not unlike that of the Benedictine Canonesses in France—to furnish a place of pious seclusion for ladies of noble birth, where they would not be required to mix socially with any but those of their own class, might retain and inherit property, leave when it suited them, marry if they should wish, and, at the same time, would have the shelter of a convenant enclosure, the protection of the habit of a nun, and the spiritual advantages of a life of religious observance. They made an obligation of themselves to God instead of binding themselves by the usual profession vows. Hence the name of oblates. The observance was always sufficiently strict and edifying, though it is permitted to each sister to have a maid waiting on her in the convenant and a lackey to do her commissions outside. They have a year's probation, and make their oblation, in which they promise obedience to the mother president, upon the tomb of St. Frances of Rome. There are two grades amongst them: the "Most Excellent," who must be princesses by birth, and the "Most Illustrious," those of inferior nobility. Their first president was Agnes de Lelis, who resided in favour of St. Frances when the latter became a widow. After her death, the Olivetan general, Blessed Geronimo di Mirabello, broke off the connexion between the oblates and the Olivetans. The convent and treasures of the saecular have escaped appropriation by the Italian government, because the inmates are not, in the strict sense, monks.

(2) Differing little from the Oblates of St. Frances in their ecclesiastical status, but Unlike in every other respect are the Donne Conventi della Maddalena, under the Rule of St. Augustine, a congregation of fallen women. They had more than one house in Rome. Without any previous noviciate, they promise obedience and make oblation of themselves to the monastic of St. Mary Magdalen. In the later Middle Ages, oblatus, confratre, and donatus became interchangeable titles, given to any one who, for his generosity or special service to the monastery, received the privilege of lay membership, with a share in the prayers and good works of the brethren.

OBLIGATION

Obligation, a term derived from the Roman civil law, defined in the "Institutes" of Justinian as a "legal bond which by a legal necessity binds us to do something according to the laws of our State" (III, 13). It was a relation by which two persons were bound together (obligati) by a bond which the law recognised and enforced. Originally both parties were considered to be under the obligation to each other; subsequently the term was restricted to the party who was said to be under an obligation to do something in favour of another, and consequently that other had a correlative right to enforce the fulfilment of the obligation. The transference of the term from the sphere of law to that of ethics was natural. In ethics it acquired a wider meaning and was used as a synonym for duty. It thus became the centre of some of the fundamental problems of ethics. The question of the source of moral obligation is perhaps the chief of these problems, and it is certainly not one of the easiest or least important. We all acknowledge that we are in general under an obligation not to commit murder, but when we ask for the ground of the obligation, we get as many different answers as there are systems of ethics. The prevailing Catholic doctrine may be explained in the following terms. By moral obligation we understand some sort of necessity imposed on us of doing what is good and avoiding what is evil. The necessity, of which there is question here, is not the physical coercion exercised on man by an external and stronger physical force. It is rather materialised in the arms and drag me whether I would not go, I act under necessity or compulsion, but this is not the necessity of moral obligation. The will, which is the least of moral obligation, is incapable of being physically coerced in that manner. It cannot be forced to will what it does not will. It is indeed possible to conceive that the will is necessitated to action by the antecedent conditions. The doctrine of ethics was easy to be appreciated, but easy is intelligible although we deny that it is true. The will is indeed necessitated by its own nature to tend towards the good in general; we cannot wish for what is unless it presents itself to us under the appearance of good. We also necessarily wish for happiness, and if we found ourselves in presence of some object which fully satisfied all our desires, and contained in itself nothing to repel us, we should be necessitated to love it. But in this life there is no such object which can fully satisfy all our desires and thus make us completely happy. Health, friends, fame, wealth, pleasures, singly or all combined, are incapable of being desired in such a manner. Though in their measure desirable, all earthly goods are limited, and man's capacity for good is unlimited. All earthly goods are defective; we recognize their defects and the evil which the pursuit or possession of them entails. Considered with their defects, they repel as well as attract us; our wills therefore are not necessitated by them. In the presence of any earthly good our wills are free, at least after the first involuntary tendency to what attracts them; they are not necessitated to full and deliberate action.

The necessity, then, which constitutes the essence of moral obligation must be of the kind which an end that must be attained lays upon us, a kind which is necessary means towards obtaining that end. If I am bound to cross the ocean and I cannot do it, I must go on board ship. That is the only means at my disposal for attaining the end which I aim to obtain. Moral obligation is a necessity of this kind. It is the necessity that I am under, of employing the necessary means towards the obtaining of an end which is also necessary. The necessity, then, which moral obligation lays upon us is the necessity, not of the determinism of nature, nor of the physical coercion of an external and stronger force, but it is of the same general character as the necessity that we are under.
of employing the necessary means in order to attain an end which may be obtained. There is, however, a special quality in the necessity of moral obligation which is peculiar to itself. We all appreciate this when we are told by our parents that they ought to obey them, that it is their duty to do so. We do not simply mean by these expressions that obedience to parents is a necessary means, but we mean that it is a necessary means to securing the peace, harmony, and affection, which shall reign in the home. We do not simply mean that the happiness of parents and children depends upon such obedience. Actual society at large is not so much concerned in the respect and obedience towards a holy authority, yet even the concept of society do not explain what we mean when we affirm that children are obliged to obey their parents. There is a peregrination, a search of a university about the obligation of duty, which can only be explained by calling to mind what man is, what is his origin, and what is his destiny. Man is a creature modeled by God the Creator, with whom he is destined to live for eternity. That is the end of man's life and of his every action, imposed on him by his Maker, who in making man ordered every fibre of his nature to the end for which he was made. That doctrine explains the permanence of the universality of moral obligation, made known to us, as it is, by the dictates of conscience. The doctrine has been put in clear and more beautiful language than by Cardinal Newman in his Letter to the Duke of Norfolk (p. 55)—

"The Supreme Being is of a certain character, which, expressed in human language, we call ethical. He has the attributes of justice, truth, wisdom, sanctity, benevolence, and mercy, as eternal characteristics in His nature, the very Law of His being; identical with Himself, and next, when He became Creator. He implanted in this Law, which is Himself, in the intelligence of all His rational creatures. The divine Law then is the rule of ethical truth, the standard of right and wrong, a sovereign, irresistible, absolute authority in the presence of men and Angels. The eternal law, says St. Augustine, 'is the Divine Reason or Will of God, commanding the observance, forbidding the disturbance, of the natural order of things.' The natural law," says St. Thomas, "is an impression of the Divine Light in us, a participation of the eternal law in the rational creature." This law, as apprehended in the minds of individual men, is called 'conscience'; and though it may suffer friction in passing into the intellectual medium of each, it is not thereby so affected as to lose its character of being the Divine Law, but still has, as such, the prerogative of commanding obedience. 'The Divine Law,' says Cardinal Newman, 'is the supreme rule of actions; our thoughts, desires, words, acts, all that man is, is subject to the domain of the law of God; and this law is the rule of our conduct by means of our conscience. Hence it is never lawful to go against our conscience; as the Fourth Lateran Council says, 'Quidquid fit contras conscientiam, videlicet ad gehennam.' . . . The rule and measure of duty is not utility, nor expediency, nor the happiness of the greatest number, nor State convenience in the sense of order, nor the public good. Conscience is not a long-sighted selfishness, nor a desire to be consistent with oneself; but it is a messenger from Him who both in nature and in grace, speaks to us behalf we may lead our lives by his precepts and sentiments. Conscience is the aboriginal Voice of Christ, a prophet in its infirmities, a monarch in its peregrinations, a priest in its blessings and anathemas, and even though the eternal priesthood throughout the Church could cease to be, in it the sacrosanct principle would remain and would have a sway."

An injustice would be done to the foregoing doctrine if it were chaced with Mysterian, innate ideas, and Intuitionism. On the contrary, it is in the strictest sense rational. It asserts that we can know God, our Creator and Lord, that we can know ourselves and the bonds that bind us to God and to our fellow-men. We can know the actions which are right and becoming, that a being as man should perform. We can and do know that God, whom as our Creator and Lord we are bound to obey, commands us to do what is right and forbids us to do what is wrong. That is the eternal law, the Divine reason, or the law which is the source of all moral obligation. Moral precepts are the commands of God, but they are also the dictates of right reason, inasmuch as they are merely the rules of right reason by which a being such as man is should be guided.

An objection is sometimes urged against the method of analysing moral obligation which we have followed. It is said that moral obligation cannot be explained as a moral necessity of adopting the necessary means to the end of moral action, for it may be asked what is the moral obligation of the end itself. The Utilitarians, for example, maintained that the end of human action should be the greatest happiness of the greatest number. But a man may well ask, why he should be bound to direct his actions towards securing the greatest happiness of the greatest number? It is plain what an absurdity it would be to ask a such a question on the principle laid down above. God is our Creator and Lord, and as such and because He is good. He has every right to our obedience and service. We need not go beyond the principles of God in our analysis; it is obligatory upon us from the very nature of God and our relation to Him. The rules of morality are then moral laws, imposing on us an obligation derived from the will of God, our Creator. That obligation is the moral necessity that we are under of conforming our actions to the demands of our rational nature and to the end for which we exist. If we do what is not conformable to our rational nature and to our end, we violate the moral law and do wrong. The effect on ourselves of such an action is twofold according to Catholic theology. A bad action does not merely subject us to a penalty assigned to wrongdoing, the sanction of the moral law. Besides this reatus penar, there is also the reatus culpa in every moral transgression. The sinner has committed an offence against God, something which displeases Him, and which has brought upon himself, his nature, and his species, which should exist between the Creator and creature. This state of enmity is accompanied, in the supernatural order to which we have been raised, by the denial of the rights and privileges annexed to it. This is by far the most important of the effects produced on the soul by sin, the liability to punishment is merely a secondary consequence of it. This shows how far from the truth we should be if we attempted to explain moral obligations by mere liability to punishment which wrongdoing entails in this world or in the next.

The sense of moral obligation is an attribute of man's rational nature, and so we find it wherever we find man. However, in the early history of ethical speculation the notion is not prominent. Before philosophers began to inquire into the meaning and origin of moral obligation we did not think much about what is the good, and what the end of human activity. This was the question which occupied the philosophers of ancient Greece. What is the highest good for man? In what consists the good rule us by its precepts and sentiments. Conscience is the aboriginal Voice of Christ, a prophet in its infirmities, a monarch in its peregrinations, a priest in its blessings and anathemas, and even though the eternal priesthood throughout the Church could cease to be, in it the sacrosanct principle would remain and would have a sway."

A bad action does not merely subject us to a penalty assigned to wrongdoing, the sanction of the moral law. Besi subdue it was a training in philosophy. But the first principle of the Stoics was: "Life according to nature". That was the "becoming", the "proper" thing, whether it brought pleasure or pain, which the Stoic philosopher indeed was of no importance, and most feared to despise. This philosophy appealed powerfully to the native sternness of the Roman character, and it was considerably influenced and developed by the ideas of Roman jurisprudence. Thus the treatise of Panetius, a Stoic of the second century before Christ, "On the Things That Are Becoming", was paraphrased by Cicero in the next century, and became his well-known treatise "On Duties". Cicero remarks, and the remark is significant, that Panetius had not given a definition of what duty is. According to Cicero it has reference to the end of good actions, and is expressed in precepts to which the conduct of life can be conformed in all its particulars (De officiis, I, iii). The working out of the doctrine concerning the law of nature is due to a large extent to the Roman lawyers, and to the Emperor's imperial policy in ethics, could find no words more suited to sum up the common Catholic teaching on the point than a passage from Cicero's "De republica" (III, xxi). We cannot do better than give a translation of the passage here, as it will show clearly how fully the doctrine of a law of nature imposing a moral obligation on man had been developed before it was adopted by the Fathers (Lactantius, "De div. inst.", VI, vii):

"Right reason is a true law, agreeing with nature, infused into all men, under which all society is bound, deters from wrong by forbidding it, and which nevertheless neither commands nor forbids evil in vain, nor prevails where it is by contracting and forbidding alone. It is not permitted to abrogate this law, nor is it allowed to derogate from it in anything, nor is it possible to abrogate it wholly. We can neither be released from this law by popular decree, nor should another be sought for to gloss and interpret it. It is not one thing at Rome, another at Athens; one thing now, and another afterwards; but one, eternal, and immutable law will govern all men forever, and there will be, the common master and ruler of all, God. He it was that proposed and carried this law, and whoever does not yield obedience to it will revolt against himself, and by offering an affront to the nature of man will thereby suffer the greatest penalties, even if he avoids other supposed sanctions."

The Stoic indeed understood this doctrine in a pantheistic sense. His God was the universal reason of the world, from which it originated, and of which a part is mirrored in his birth. It only needed the Christian doctrine of a personal God, the Creator and Lord of all things, Who in many ways manifests His law to man, more especially through and in the voice of conscience, to turn it into the Catholic doctrine of moral obligation which has been analysed above. In the teaching of Christ, right conduct is summed up in the observance of the commandments. Those commandments constitute the law of God, which He came not to destroy but to fulfill. He required their observance under the most terrible sanctions. St. Paul, of course, only preached the doctrine of his Master. The legalism which he rejected was the superstitious and the merely outward observance of the Pharisees, not the internal and the external observance of the moral law. Although the Gentile had not the moral law written on tablets of stone, yet he had it written on the fleshly tablets of his heart, and his conscience bore witness to it, as did that of the Jew (Rom., ii, 14). This is the doctrine still taught in the Catholic Church. It derives from the Gospels of Christ and His Apostles, though it is often expressed in the language of Stoicism, interpreted according to the exigences of Christian doctrine. Since the Reformation it has been the fashion with many to reject it as legalism in favour of what is called Christian liberty. Christian liberty, however, interpreted by private judgment, developed into various systems of so-called independent morality.

Thomas Hobbes (1588–1679) is justly regarded as one of the chief pioneers of modern thought. According to Hobbes, man in the state of nature seeks nothing but his own selfish pleasure, but such individualism naturally leads to an internecine war in which every man's hand is against his neighbour. In pure self-interest and for self-preservation men entered into a compact by which they agreed to surrender part of their natural freedom to an absolute ruler in order to preserve the rest. The State determines what is just and unjust, right and wrong; and the strong arm of the law provides the ultimate sanction for right conduct. The same fundamental principles form the groundwork of the empirical philosophy of Locke and a long train of followers down to the present day. Some of these followers indeed denied that all the motives that influence man's conduct are selfish; they insist on the existence of sympathetic and social feelings in men, but whether of a moral or social, all are rooted in a sensist philosophy. The lineal descent of these views may be traced from Hobbes and Locke, through Hume, Paley, Bentham, the two Mills, and Bain, to H. H. Hyman. Butler, Bishop of Oxford, an opponent of the sensist philosophy, of course, has had its opponents. Cudworth and the Cambridge Platonists strove to defend the essential and eternal distinction of good and evil by reviving Platonicism. Butler postulated a set of laws of nature - known as the natural law, in which all men are to be governed. In Germany, Kant formulated his ethics in terms of the categorical imperative. The existence of a God, whom he calls the "categorical imperative", is derived from the categorical imperative of the autonomous reason. Kant's philosophy, through Fichte and Schelling, gave birth to the pantheism of Hegel. A small but influential school of English Hegelians, represented by such men as T. H. Green, Bradley, Wallace, Bosanquet, and others, regarded conscience as the voice of man's true self, and man's true self as ideally one with God. English philosophical thought is thus divided into the schools of Materialism and Pantheism, much as Epicureanism and Stoicism divided the ancient world. Pragmatism, a product of American philosophy, may without injustice be compared to the scepticism of the Athenian Academy. Each and all of these systems contain grave errors about the nature of man and about his place in the world, and in no case is it necessary to fail to account for moral obligation. (See Determinism; Dualism; Duty; Ethics; Fatalism; Free Will; Hedonism; Kant, Philosophy Of; Law; Pantheism; Positivism.)

Obligations, Professional.—The office of a judge, inasmuch as he is appointed by public authority to administer justice according to the laws, demands in the first place competent knowledge of the laws which are to be administered. Not less important in a judge is a lofty sense of justice and an upright character which cannot be deflected from the path of duty by either fear or favour. The judge, too, must employ at least ordinary diligence in the conduct of the cases that come before him, so that as far as possible a just sentence may be arrived at. He must not transgress the limits of his authority, and he must observe the rules of procedure laid down for his guidance. These obligations of a judge follow from the nature of his office, and he binds himself implicitly to fulfil them when he accepts that office. Judges also usually take an oath by which they promise to administer justice uprightly, without fear or favour. Selling justice for bribes is rightly regarded as a heinous offence in a judge, and besides being liable to severe punishment, it involves the obligation of making

When a man, as there is no just time to remain the peace of his life. Natural equity requires that all should be presumed to be innocent who have not been proved or proved guilty of crime, and so a judge must give those who are accused the benefit of the doubt. When the accusation is not made and the evidence is not enough to prove guilt, the accused must be acquitted, and not be made to stand or be bound to give evidence according to the nature of the case and to the charge. This has been decided in favour of the party who has the burden of proof. What has been said of this principle in respect to magistrates and the accused also applies to juries, and they are all of whom the accused may take advantage of the functions of a judge.

Advocates and lawyers are persons skilled in the art, and for payment undertake the legal business of others. They are obliged to have the knowledge and skill which are required for the due discharge of their office, and which they implicitly profess to have when they offer their services to the public. They must also use at least ordinary diligence and care in the conduct of the business entrusted to them. They must also be acquainted with the objects which they desire, as they act for and in the name of the clients. The advocate must undertake a cause which is clearly unjust, otherwise they will be guilty of co-operating in injustice, and will be bound to make restitution for all the unjust actions which they may do, or do for others. However, the advocate must be certain of the justice of the cause which is not necessary to be certain that a lawyer may rightly undertake it: it will be sufficient if the justice of the cause to be undertaken is at least probable, for then it may be hoped that the truth will be made clear in the course of the trial.

As soon as an advocate is satisfied that his client has a case, he should inform him of the fact, and should proceed further with the case. An advocate may not always undertake the defence of a criminal, unless he is guilty of the crime, nor for even if his defence is a real culprit is successful, no great harm will usually be done by a guilty man escaping the punishment which he deserves. To justify a criminal accusation of another there must be morally certain evidence of his guilt, otherwise there will be danger of doing serious and unjust harm to the reputation of an acquaintance.

From the Decree of the Holy Office, 19 Dec., 1860, in answer to the Bishop of Southwark, it is clear that in England an advocate may undertake a case where the question of the justification of the party is to be considered. Even in an action for divorce in a civil court he may defend the action against the plaintiff. If the marriage has already been pronounced null and void by competent ecclesiastical authority, a Catholic advocate may impugn its validity in the civil courts. Moreover, for just reason, as, for example, to obtain a variation in the marriage settlement, or to prevent the necessity of having to maintain a bastard child, a Catholic lawyer may petition for a divorce in the civil court, not with the intention of enabling his client to marry again while his spouse is still living, but with a view to obtaining the civil effects of divorce in the civil tribunal. This opinion at any rate is defended by many good theologians. The reason is that marriage is neither contracted nor dissolved before the civil authority; in the formalities and ceremonies of marriage there is a difference between the civil authority and the civil authority, the taking of cognizance of who are married, and of the civil effects which flow therefrom.

In civil law, evidences or persons may prosecute according to American and English law. Nobody should undertake a prosecution when greater evil than good would follow from it, or when there is not moral certainty as to the guilt or innocence of the accused. However, it may be done for the sake of the public good, and there may be an obligation to do it, as when one's office compels one to undertake the task, or the defence of the innocent or the public good requires it, or a precept of obedience commands it. Thus by ecclesiastical law, heretics and persons guilty of solicitation in the sacred tribunal are to be denounced to the offended party. The defendant in a criminal trial is not himself subjected to examination, according to English law, unless he offers himself voluntarily to give evidence, and then he may be examined like a witness. In canon law the accused is examined and the question arises whether he is bound to tell the truth against himself. He is bound to tell the truth if he is interrogated according to law; canon law prescribes that when there is a suspicion of the crime and this is made clear to the defendant he should be interrogated.

The defendant may be in self-defence make known the secret crime of a witness against him, if it really concerns his defence; but, of course, he may never impugn false crimes to anybody. A criminal may not defend himself against lawful arrest, for that would be to resist lawful authority, but he is not compelled to deliver himself up to justice, and it is not a sin to escape from justice if he does so. The law prescribes that he shall be kept in durance, not that he shall voluntarily remain in custody. A criminal lawfully condemned to death is not obliged to save his life by escape, as other means if he can do so; he should submit to the execution of the sentence passed upon him, and may do so meritoriously.

Charity or obedience may impose an obligation to give evidence in a court of justice. If serious harm can be prevented by offering one's self as a witness, there will as a rule be an obligation to do so, and obedience imposes the obligation when one is summoned by lawful authority. A witness bound by the obedience to lawful authority to tell the truth in answer to the questions lawfully put to him. He is not bound to incriminate himself, nor, of course, may the seal of confession ever be broken.

The canon law laid it down that the testimony of two eye-witnesses of unsuspected character was necessary and sufficient evidence of any fact alleged in a court of justice. The testimony of a solitary witness was not usually sufficient or admissible evidence of a crime, and in keeping with this the theologians decided that a solitary witness should not declare what he knew of a crime, inasmuch as he was not lawfully interrogated. English and modern systems, admits the testimony of one witness, if credible, as sufficient evidence of a fact, and so as a rule there will be an obligation on such a one of answering according to his knowledge when questioned lawfully in a court of justice.

A doctor who holds himself out as ready to undertake the care of the sick must have competent knowledge of his profession and must exercise his office at least with ordinary care and diligence; otherwise he will sin against justice and charity in exposing himself to the risk of seriously injuring his neighbour. Unless he is bound by some special agreement he is not ordinarily obliged to undertake any particular case, for there are usually others who are willing and able to give the necessary assistance to the sick. Even in time of pestilence he will not commit sin if he leaves the neighbourhood, unless he is bound to remain by some special contract.

He should not make exorbitant charges for his services, nor multiply visits uselessly and thus increase his fees, nor call in other doctors without necessity. On the other hand, even as a rule the solicitor who has full use of his services may prosecute according to American and English law. Nobody should undertake a prosecution when greater evil than good would follow from it, or when there is not moral certainty as to the guilt or innocence of the accused. However, it may be done for the sake of the public good, and there may be an obligation to do it, as when one's office compels one to undertake the task, or the defence of the innocent or the public good requires it, or a precept of obedience commands it.
He may not neglect safer remedies in order to try those which are less safe, but there is nothing to prevent him from prescribing what will probably do good if it is certain that it will not do harm. In a desperate case, with the consent of the sick person and of his relations, he may make use of what will probably do good though it may also probably do harm, provided that there is nothing better to be done in the circumstances. It is altogether wrong to make experiments with doubtful remedies or operations on living human beings; sal experimentum in corpore viti.

When the patient is in danger of death, the doctor is bound to use care to ward him off; but those who depend on him, that he may make all necessary preparations for death. (See ABDICATION; ANAESTHESIA; CRANIOTOMY; HYPNOTISM.)

Teachers hold the place of parents with regard to those committed to their charge for the purpose of instruction. They are bound in justice to exercise due care and diligence in the discharge of their office. They must have the knowledge and skill which that office demands.

O’Brian, Tighernach, Irish annalist and Abbot of Roscomon and Clonmacnois, d. 1088. Little is known of his personal history except that he must have been born in the early part of the eleventh century and that he came of a Connaught family. His “Annals” (among the earliest of Irish annals) are of the greatest value to the historian of Ireland because of the author’s attempt to synchronize Irish events with those of the rest of Europe from the earliest times to his own day. His learning is shown by his quotations, among others, from the works of the Venerable Bede, Josephus, Eusebius, and Orosius, not to speak of the Vulgate. But his sources for the Irish portions of the “Annals” are not now discoverable because of the loss of the Irish manuscripts from which he drew his information. Only fragments of Tighernach’s “Annals” are now extant; these are in a vellum of the twelfth century and one of the fourteenth century in the Bodleian Library, Oxford, and in a fourteenth-century MS. in Trinity College Library, Dublin. These fragments were published by Dr. O’Connor in his “Rerum Hiberniarum Scriptores” (1825), but O’Connor’s text is full of errors. They have recently been published and translated by Williams in the “Revue Celtique” (vols. XVI, XVII, XVIII). Two pages in facsimile are given in Gilbert’s “National Manuscripts of Ireland”, part I.

Obregonians (or Poor Infirmarians), a small congregation of men, who professed the Rule of the Third Order of St. Francis, founded by Bernadino Obregón (b. 5 May, 1540, at Las Huelgas near Burgos, Spain; d. 8 Aug., 1599). Of a noble family Obregón was an officer in the Spanish army, but retired and dedicated himself to the service of the sick in the hospitals of Madrid. Others became associated with him in hospital service and in 1567 by consent of the papal nuncio at Madrid the new congregation was founded.

To the three ordinary vows was added that of free hospitality. The congregation did not found hospitals but served in those already existing. It spread from Spain to Italy and its missions, in Belgium and the Indies. Obregón went to Lisbon, 1562, and there founded an asylum for orphan boys; returning to Spain he assisted King Philip II in his last illness (1589). Paul V, 1608, allowed the Obregonians to wear over the grey habit of the Third Order of St. Francis a black cross on the left side of the breast, to distinguish them from similar congregations. Since the French Revolution they have entirely disappeared. Obreption (Lat. ob and reperere, “to creep over”), a canonical term applied to a species of fraud by which an ecclesiastical rescript is obtained. Dispensations or graces are not granted unless there be some motive for requesting them, and the law of the Church requires that the true and just cause that lie behind the motive be stated in every prayer for such dispensation or grace. When the petition contains a statement about fact or circumstances that are suppositional or at least, modified if they really exist, the resulting rescript is said to be vitiated by obreption. If, on the other hand, silence had been observed concerning something that essentially changed the state of the case, it is called subreption. Rescripts obtained by obreption or subreption are null and void when the motive cause of the rescript is affected by them. If it is only the impelling cause, and the subsidiary cause is not affected, or if the false statement was made through ignorance, the rescript is not vitiated. As requests for rescripts must come through a person in ecclesiastical authority, it is his duty to inform himself of the truth or falsity of the causes alleged in the petitions, and in case they are granted, to see that the conditions of the rescript are fulfilled.

O’Brien, Terence Albert, b. at Limerick, 1600; d. there, 31 October, 1651. He joined the Dominicans, receiving the name Albert at Limerick, where his uncle, Maurice O’Brien, was then prior. In 1622 he studied at Toledo and after eight years returned to Limerick, to become twice prior there and once at Lorrha, and in 1643 provincial of his order in Ireland. His services to the Catholic Confederation were highly valued by the Supreme Council. At Rome he received the degree of Master in Theology, and on his return made a visitation of two houses of his province at Lisbon, where it was reported that Urban VIII was about to appoint him canon to the Bishop of Emly. He was again named for the coadjutorship by the Supreme Council at the end of 1645, and recommended by the nuncio Rinuccini. Subsequently, at the petition of many bishops, Rinuccini wrote (in 1646) that Burgtat, Vicar-General of Emly, was a suitable person for the coadjutorship. In August he renewed his recommendation of Father Terence O’Brien, who was named coadjutor with the right of succession, in March, 1647, and eight months later was consecrated by Rinuccini. Throughout the ensuing troubles he adhered to the nuncio. He signed the declaration against Inching’s truce in 1648, and the declaration against Ormond in 1650. When Limerick was besieged in 1651, he urged a stubborn resistance and so embittered the Ormonduists and the Parliamentarians, that in the capitulation he was excluded from quarter and protection. The day after the surrender, he with Major General Purrell and Father Wolf were discovered in the post-house, brought before a court martial and ordered for execution, which took place on the following day.

O’Braidear, David, an Irish poet, b. about 1625, most probably in the barony of Barrymore, Co. Cork.
but according to many authorities in that of Connello, Co. Limerick; 8. January, 1666. He was well educated in the Irish, Latin, and English languages. His historical poems show the influence of Geoffrey Keating, his favourite Irish author. He wrote elegies on the deaths of many historically prominent members of the leading Munster families, especially the Bourke of Cahirmoyle, the FitzGeralds of Clonoghlass, and the Barrys of Co. Cork, who later befriended him in his poverty. All his poems, whether historical, social, or elegiac, are marked by a freshness rare in the seventeenth century and they furnish many interesting details about the life and manners of his time. Two of his epistemias, a form of composition rare in Irish literature, have been preserved. They were written to celebrate the marriages of the sisters, Una and Eleanor Bourke of Cahirmoyle. His satires when directed against the Cromwellian Planters or the Duke of Ormonde and his flatterers are bitter, but lighter and more humorous when treating themes of local interest, as in the case of his witty proverbial “Guagan Glog” or his mock-heroic defence of the smiths of Co. Limerick. His religious poems exhibit great beauty and depth of feeling, especially the poem on the Passion of Christ. Others like those on the schismatical movement of the Remonstrants (1666-70) and on the Oates Plot (1675-92) are polemical and contain details not found elsewhere.

Biographical poems treating the events of Irish history from the Cromwellian Plantation (1652) to the end of the War of the Revolution (1691) reveal his great political foresight and independent views. His “Suim Prie deara Mar a Eiréime” summarizes the history of Ireland from 1641 to 1684, and a series of poems commemorates the exciting events of the reign of James II (1685-91). Being written from a national standpoint, these poems, owing to the dearth of Irish documents relating to that period, are invaluable for the light which they throw upon the sentiments of the Irish nobles and people during that half-century of war, confiscation, and persecution. Despite his enthusiasm for the national cause, O’Brudair is no mere eulogizer, and in “An Longbhrioseadh” (The Shipwreck, 1691), he criticizes the army and its leaders severely. He warmly defended the conduct of Sandsfield in the negotiation preceding the close of the war (1691). His views upon this subject, when compared with those of Colonel O’Kelly in his “Macarie Excidium”, enable us to appreciate better the divergence of opinion in Irish military circles in regard to the acceptance of the terms offered. O’Brudair was a master of the art of versification, and wrote with ease and grace in the most varied and complicated syllabic and assonantal metres. His style is vigorous, his language classical, and his vocabulary extensive; but a fondness for archaic expressions prevented most of his poems from being popular in the succeeding centuries. He is copious in illustration, careful to avoid repetition, and never sacrifices reason to rhythm. Though he was an expert scribe and an industrious copyist of ancient historical MSS., the only existing manuscript in his handwriting seems to be H. i. 18 vol. 4 to 14 in the Library of Trinity College, Dublin. It contains three of his latest poems (1693-4), some genealogical matter taken from “Leabhar Iris Ui Mhaoilchonohaire” and the “Rentals” of Baron Bourke of Castlemarry, Co. Limerick. Most of his poems are preserved in three early manuscripts: 23 M. 25-23 M. 34, by Eoghan O Caolm (1702), and 23 L. 37, by Seaghan Staic (1706-9), both in the Library of the Irish Academy, Dublin, and Add. 2994, by Seaghan na Rathmheas (1725), in the British Museum. Others are to be found in various MSS. in the above-mentioned libraries and in those of Trinity College, Dublin, Maynooth, while a few are preserved in MSS. in private hands. A complete collection of his writings with translation, of which the first volume has appeared (1910), is in course of publication by the present writer for the Irish Texts Society, London.

O’Callaghan, Edmund Bailey, physician, publicist, and historian, b. at Mallow, Cork, 29 Feb., 1797; d. at New York, 29 May, 1850. His eldest brother Theomas held a commission in the English army; the others, Eugene and David, became priests and were distinguished for their learning. On completing his education in Ireland, Edmund went to Paris (1820) to study medicine. In 1830 he settled in Montreal and besides the practice of medicine, took an active part in the National Patriotic movement and in 1834 became editor of its organ the “Vindicator”. Elected to the Provincial Parliament in 1836 he held a conspicuous position in debate for popular rights, took a leading part in the unsuccessful insurrection of 1837, was attainted of treason, fled to the United States, remained nearly a year the guest of Chancellor Washburn in New York, and in 1838 resumed his practice of medicine in Albany, where he edited the “Northern Light”, an industrial journal.

The anti-rent agitation of the time led him to study the land-rights of the Patroons. Attracted by the rich but neglected old Dutch records in the possession of the State, he mastered the Dutch language and in 1846 published the first volume of “History of New Netherland”, the first real history of New York State. The result of its publication was the official commission of J. R. Brodhead by the New York State Legislature to search the archives of London, Paris, and The Hague, and to make copies of documents bearing on New York colonial history. These documents were published in eleven quarto volumes (1855-61) under the editorship of O’Callaghan and are a monument of care and ability. In 1848 he was made keeper of the historical MSS. of New York State, and in this capacity served for twenty-two years. He was the first to call public attention to the value of the Jesuit Relations, and read a paper before the New York Historical Society, giving details of their purport and scope. James Lenox began to collect the scattered copies and the Lenox Library in New York, contains the only complete set or series of printed Jesuit Relations. The Thwaites edition in seventy-three volumes was based on the Lenox set of the French, Latin, and Italian texts. O’Callaghan dedicated to Lenox his “List of the editions of the Holy Scripture and parts thereof printed in America previous to 1860”. An edition of this work with annotations by Lenox is in the Lenox Library, New York.

In 1870 O’Callaghan went to New York and assumed the task of editing its municipal records, but through difficulties about financial resources they were never published. Though highly esteemed for his medical learning, O’Callaghan’s great claim on the gratitude of posterity is his historical work. The cleanness of his style with accuracy of detail gave authority to his writings, which contain a mine of original information about New York colonial history.

O'CAROLAN, TOLLOGH (Irish, TOORDEALEIGH O CBREALLAIDH), usually spoken of as the "last of the Irish bards", b. in the County Meath, Ireland, in 1670; d. at Ballyfarn on, 1737. He early became blind from an attack of small-pox. Descended from an ancient family, he achieved renown as a harper. His advent marks the passing of the old Gaelic distinction between the bard and the harper. Celebrated as poet, composer, and harper, he composed probably over two hundred poems, many of them of a lively, Pindaric nature, and mostly addressed to his patrons or fair ladies belonging to the old county families, where he loved to visit and where he was always a welcome guest. His poems are full of curious turns and twists of metre to suit his airs, to which they are admirably wed, and very few are in regular stanzas. There are a few exceptions, as his celebrated "Ode to Whiskey", one of the finest Bacchanalian songs in any language, and his more famous but insusceptibly inferior "Receipt for Drinking". His harp is preserved in the hall of the O'Connor Don at Conalas, Roscommon. Hardiman printed twenty-four of his poems, in his "Songs and Melodies", and the present writer has collected about twelve more, which seem to be all that survive of his literary output. Moore utilised many of his "planxties" for his "Melodies", as in "The Young May Moon", "0 Banquet Not", "0, the Sight En- trance", "The Banshee", "The Minstrel of Lyrical Airs", "The". No complete and accurate collection of his airs has been made, though many of them are still sung in the west of Ireland. The following note in Irish in the writing of his friend and patron Charles O'Connor occurs in one of the Stowe MSS.: "Saturday the XXV day of March, 1735, Toirdhealbhach O'Carubhallain, the intellectual sage and prime musician of all Ireland is dead to-day, in the 65th year of his age. The mercy of God may his soul find, for he was a moral and a pious man."

DOUGLAS HYDE.

Occasionalism (Latin occasio) is the metaphysical theory which maintains that finite things have no efficient causality of their own, but that whatever happens in the world is caused by God, creatures being merely the occasions of the Divine activity. The occasion is that which by its presence brings about the action of the efficient cause. This it can do as final efficient cause by altering the efficient causality, or as secondary efficient cause by impelling the primary cause to do what would otherwise be left undone. Occasion- alism was foreshadowed in Greek philosophy in the doctrine of the Stoics who regarded God as preserving and determining the actions of all beings through the fundamental instinct of self-preservation. It appeared openly in the Arabian thought of the Middle Ages (cf. Stein, II, 235--245 infra); but its full development is found only in modern philosophy, as an outgrowth of the Cartesian doctrine of the relation between body and mind. According to Descartes the essence of the soul is thought, and the essence of the body extension; hence both have nothing in common. How then do they interact? Descartes himself tried to solve this problem by attributing to the soul the power of directing the movements of the body. But this idea conflicted with the doctrine involved in his denial of any immediate interaction between body and mind. The first step toward a solution was taken by Johannes Clauberg (1625--85). According to him all the phenomena of the outside world are modes of motion and are caused by God. When therefore the mind seems to have acted upon the outside world, it is a pure delusion. The soul, however, cannot cause its own mental processes which have nothing in common with matter and its modes of action. Matter, on the other hand, cannot act upon mind. The presence of certain changes in the bodily organism is the occasion whereupon the soul produces the corresponding ideas at this particular time rather than any other. To the soul Clau- berg also attributes the power of influencing by means of the will the movements of the body. The Occasion- alism of Clauberg is different from that of later mem- bers of the school; with him the soul is the cause which is occasioned to act— with the others it is God.}

Louis de la Forge (Tractatus de mente humana, 1666) is regarded by some as the real father of Occasion- alism. His starting-point was the problem of the relation between energy and matter. Following the Cartesian method, he argued that what cannot be clearly and distinctly conceived cannot be held as existing. We can form no clear idea of the attraction exerted by one body on another at a distance nor of the energy that moves a body from one place to another. Such an energy must be something totally different from matter which, is absolutely inert; hence the union of matter and energy is inconceivable. Matter then, cannot be the cause of the physical phenomena; these must be produced by God, the first, universal, and total cause of all motion. In his theory of the union be-between body and soul, de la Forge approached the later Leibnizian doctrine of a pre-established harmony. God must have willed and brought about the union between body and soul, therefore He willed to do all that is necessary to perfect this union. The union between body and mind involves the appearance of thoughts in consciousness, and it would have first to perceive the presence of bodily activities and the sequence of bodily movements to carry out the ideas of the mind. God willing the union between body and mind willed also to produce, as first and final cause, the thoughts that should correspond to the organic movements of sensation, and the movements which follow upon the presence of some conscious processes. But there are other movements for which the soul itself is responsible as efficient cause, and these are the effects of the spontaneous activity of our free will.

The Occasionalism of Arnold Geulinx (1624–1669) is ethical rather than cosmological in its inception. The first tract of his "Ethics" (Land's ed. of the Opera, The Hague, 1891–93) is a study of what he termed the cardinal virtues. These are not prudence, temperance, justice, and fortitude. Virtue according to Geulinx is the love of God and of Reason (11, 16–17, 29). The cardinal virtues are the properties of virtue which immediately flow from its very essence and have nothing to do with anything external. These properties are: diligence, obedience, justice, humility (11, 17). The division between such Geulinx makes of humility one of fundamental importance in his philosophy. It divides his view of the world into two parts—one, the understanding of our relation to the world; the other, the understanding of the relation of God. Humility consists in the knowledge of self and the forsaking of self. I find in myself nothing that is my own but to know and to will. I therefore must be conscious of what I do, and my consciousness is the product of my own causality. Hence the universal principle of causality—quod necis quo modo fiat, non facit—if you do not know how a thing is done then you do not do it. Since then the movements of my body take place without my knowing how the nervous impulse passes to the muscles and there causes them to contract, I do not cause my own bodily actions. "I am therefore a mere spectator of this machine. In its own right, in its own relation of body and soul, nothing here nor destroy it. Everything is the work of someone else" (11, 33). This one is the Deity who sees and knows all things. The second part of Geulinx's philosophy is connected with the Occasionalism as the effect of the cause. Its guiding principle is: Where you can do nothing there you should desire nothing (11, 222). This leads to a mystical and asceticism which however must not be taken too seriously for it is tempered by the obligation of caring for the body and propagating the species.

Nicolas Malebranche (q. v.) developed Occasionalism to its uttermost limit, approaching so near to Pantheism that he himself remarked that the difference between himself and Spinoza was that he taught that the universe was in God and that Spinoza said that God was in the universe. Starting out with the Cartesian doctrine, that the essence of the soul is thought and that of matter is extension, he sought to prove that creatures have no causality of their own. Experience seems to tell us that one body acts upon another, but all that we know is that the movement of one body follows upon that of another. We have no experience of one body causing the movement of another. Therefore, says Malebranche, one body cannot set upon another. By a similar argument he attempts to prove that body cannot act upon mind. Since experience can tell us only that a sensation follows upon the stimulus, therefore the stimulus is not the cause of the sensation. He uses the argument of Spinoza to prove that motion cannot act upon body. Not only is there no interaction between body and mind, and between one body and another, but there is no causality within the mind itself. Our sensations, for example, are not caused by bodies, and are independent of ourselves. Therefore they must be produced by some higher being. Our ideas cannot be created by the mind. Neither can they be copied from a present object, for we have seen that the object must precede the idea, after which the production of an idea would be superfluous. Our ideas cannot be all possessed as complete products from the beginning, because it is a fact that the mind grows through its development. Nor can the mind possess a faculty that produces by a sufficient causality its own ideas, because it would have to produce also the ideas of extended bodies and extension is excluded from the essence of the mind and therefore from the scope of its causal efficiency. If then there is no way of accounting for ideas and sensations either by the efficiency of the mind itself or by that of the outside world they must be produced by God, the infinite, omnipresent, universal Cause. God knows all things because He produced all things. Therefore the ideas of all things are in God, and on account of His most intimate union with our souls the spirit can see what is in God.

Among the Occasionalists is also mentioned R. H. Lotze (1817–81). His Occasionalism is really only a statement that we are ignorant of any interaction between body and mind. He is not an Occasionalist in the metaphysical sense of the word. In estimating the value of the Occasionalistic position we must realize that it sprang from a twofold desire. Humility consists in the knowledge of self and the forsaking of self. I find in myself nothing that is my own but to know and to will. I therefore must be conscious of what I do, and my consciousness is the product of my own causality. Hence the universal principle of causality—quod necis quo modo fiat, non facit—if you do not know how a thing is done then you do not do it. Since then the movements of my body take place without my knowing how the nervous impulse passes to the muscles and there causes them to contract, I do not cause my own bodily actions. "I am therefore a mere spectator of this machine. In its own right, in its own relation of body and soul, nothing here nor destroy it. Everything is the work of someone else" (11, 33). This one is the Deity who sees and knows all things. The second part of Geulinx's philosophy is connected with the Occasionalism as the effect of the cause. Its guiding principle is: Where you can do nothing there you should desire nothing (11, 222). This leads to a mystical and asceticism which however must not be taken too seriously for it is tempered by the obligation of caring for the body and propagating the species.

Occasions of Sin are external circumstances whether of things or persons which either because of their special nature or because of the fructivity common to humanity or peculiarity to some individual, incite or cause the act to remain in the soul. In another case there is a wide difference between the cause and the occasion of sin. The cause of sin is in the last analysis
Is the perverse human will and is intrinsic to the human composite. The occasion is something extrinsic and, given the freedom of the will, cannot, properly speaking, stand in causal relation to the act or vicious habit which we call sin. There can be no doubt that in general the same obligation which binds us to refrain from sin requires us to shun its occasion. Qui tenetur ad finem, tenetur ad media (he who is bound to reach a certain end is bound to employ the means to attain it). Theologians distinguish between the proximate and the remote occasion. They are not altogether at one as to the precise value to be attributed to the terms. De Lugo defines proximate occasion (De poscit, disp. 14, n. 149) as one in which men of like calibre for the most part fall into mortal sin, or one in which experience points to the same result from the special weakness of a particular person. The remote occasion lacks these elements. All theologians are agreed that there is no obligation to avoid the remote occasions of sin both because this would, practically speaking, be impossible and because they do not involve serious danger of sin. As to the proximate occasion, it may be of the sort that is described as necessary, that is, such as a person cannot abandon or get rid of. Whether this impossibility be physical or moral does not matter for the determination of the principles hereafter to be laid down. The proximate occasion is voluntary and continuous is bound to remove it. A refusal on the part of a penitent to do so would make it imperative for the confessor to deny absolution. It is not always necessary for the confessor to await the actual performance of this duty before giving absolution; he may be content with a sincere promise, which is the minimum to be required. Theologians agree that one is not obliged to shun the proximate but necessary occasions. Nemo tenetur ad impossible (no one is bound to do what is impossible). There is no question of a freely casting oneself into the danger of sin. The assumption is that stress of unavoidable circumstances has imposed this unhappy situation. All that can then be required is the employment of such means as will make the peril of sin remote. The difficulty is to determine what mean is to be regarded as not physically (that is plain enough) but morally necessary. Much has been written by theologians in the attempt to find a rule for the measurement of this moral necessity and a formula for its expression, but not successfully. It seems to be quite clear that a proximate occasion may be deemed necessary when it cannot be given up without grave scandal or loss of good name or without notable temporal or spiritual damage. Ocleeve (or Hoccleve), Thomas; little is known of his life beyond what is mentioned in his poems. He was b. about 1368; d. in 1436. The place of his birth and education is unknown. When about nineteen he became a clerk in the Privy Seal Office, a position which he held for at least twenty-four years. It is recorded in the Patent Roll (1399) that he received a pension of £10 a year. In his poem "La Male Règle," written in 1406, he confesses to having lived a life of pleasure and even of dissipation, but his marriage in 1411 seems to have caused a change in his career, and his poem "De Regimine Principum," written soon afterwards, bears witness to his reform. In 1424 he was granted a pension of £20 a year for life. His name and reputation have come down to us linked with those of Lydgate; the two poets were followers and enthusiastic admirers of Chaucer. It is most probable that Ocleeve knew Chaucer personally, as he has left three passages of verse about him, and, in the MS. of the "De Regimine," a portrait of Chaucer (the only one we possess) which he says he had painted "to put other men in remembrance of his person." He was a true Chaucerian as far as love and admiration could make him, but he was unable to imitate worthy his master's skill in poetry. Ocleeve has left us a body of verse which has its own interest, but none of which, as poetry, can be placed much above mediocrity. Nevertheless, there are many things which give pleasure. There is his devoted love to Our Lady, which causes some of the poems he wrote in her honour (especially "The Moder of God") to be among his best efforts. There is his admiration of Chaucer, already spoken of, and there is also sound morality, and a good deal of "the social sense" in the matter of his poems. Though he had no humour, he could tell a story well, and in several poems he enlists our sympathy by the frank recognition of his weakness both as man and poet.

Occult Art, Occultism.—Under this general term are included various practices to which special articles are devoted: ANIMISM; ANTHROPOLOGY; DIVINATION; FETISHISM. The present article deals with the form of Occultism known as "Magic". The English word magic is derived from the Latin, Greek, Persian, Assyrain from the Sumerian or "Cu- turian word impa or empa ("deep", "profound"), a designation for the Proto-Chaldean priests or wizards. Magic became a standard term for the later Zoroastrians, or Persian, priesthood through whom Eastern occult arts were made known to the Greeks; hence μάγος (as also the kindred words ραγίς, μαγία), a magician or a person endowed with secret knowledge and power like a Persian magus. In a restricted sense magic is understood to be an interference with the usual course of physical nature by apparently inadequate means (recitation of formulae, gestures, mixing of incongruous elements, and other mysterious actions), the knowledge of which is obtained through secret communication with the force underlying the universe (God, the Devil, the soul of the world, etc.); it is the attempt to work miracles not by the power of God, gratuitously communicated to man, but by the force of hidden forces beyond man's control. Its advocates, desiring to move the Deity by supplication, seek the desired result by evoking powers ordinarily reserved to the Deity. It is a corruption of religion, now as it was then, as RATIONALISM may be, and it appears as an accompaniment of decadence rather than of rising civilization. There is nothing to show that in Babylon, Greece, and Rome the use of magic decreased as these nations progressed; on the contrary, it increased as they declined. It is not true that "religion is the despair of magic"; in reality, magic is but a disease of religion.

The disease has been widespread; but if one land may be designated as the home of mystic it is Chaldea or Southern Babylonia. The earliest written records of magic are found in the cuneiform incantation inscriptions which Assyrian scribes in 800 B.C. copied from the monuments of older times. Although the early religious tablets refer to divination and in the latest Chaldean period astrology proper absorbed the energy of the Babylonian hierarchy, medicinal magic and nature magic were largely practised. The Baru-priest, as the diviner seems to have held the foremost rank, but hardly inferior was the Ashur-priest, the priest of incantations, who recited the magical formulae of the "Shurpu", "Maklu", and "Utukku". "Shurpu" (burning) was a spell to remove a curse due to legal uncleanness; "Maklu" (consuming) was a counter-spell against wizards and witches; "Utukku limmuti" (evil spirit) was a series of sixteen formulae against ghosts and demons. The "Assakki marsumi" was a series of twelve formulae against fevers and sickness. In this case the evil influence was first transferred to a wax figure representing the patient or an animal carcass, and the formulae were recited over the substitute. Tyi tablets, nine in number, give recipes against headache. The "Labartu" incantations repeated over little figures were supposed to drive away the ogres and witches from children. All these formulae were couched over the figures, accompanied by an elaborate ritual, e.g. "A table thou shalt place behind the censer which is before the Sun-Gods (Statue of Shamash), thou shalt place thereon 4 jug of sesame wine, thou shalt set thereon 3 X 12 loaves of wheat, thou shalt add a mixture of honey and butter and sprinkle with salt: a table thou shalt place behind the censer which is before the Storm-God (Statue of Adad), and behind the censer which is before Merodach".

The magicians mentioned above were authorised and practised "white"; or benevolent, magic; the "Kash-shapi", or unauthorized practitioners, employed "black" magic against mankind. That the latter had preternatural powers to do harm no one doubted; hence the severe punishment meted out to them. The Code of Hammurabi (c. 2000 B.C.) appointed the order of water for one accused of being a sorcerer and for his accuser. If the accused was drowned, his property went to the accuser; if he was saved, the accuser was put to death and his property went to the accused. This course took place only if the accusation could not be satisfactorily proven otherwise. The principal god invoked in Chaldean magic was Ea, source of all wisdom, and Marduk (Merodach) his son, who had inherited his father's knowledge. A curiously naive scene was supposed to be enacted before the application of a medicinal spell: Marduk went to Ea's house and said: "Father, headache from the underworld hath gone forth. The patient does not know the reason; whereby may he be relieved?" Ea answered: "O Marduk, my son, what can I add to thy knowledge? What I know thou knowest also. Go, my son Marduk"; and then follows the prescription. This tale was regularly repeated before use of the recipe.

Without suggesting the dependence of one national system of magic upon another, the similarity of some ideas and practices in the two systems may be noted. All rely on the power of words, the utterance of a hidden name, or the mere existence of the name on an amulet or stone. Magic was supposed to be the key to the mysteries of the physical world; utter the name of a malignant influence and its power is undone; utter the name of a benevolent deity and forces go out to destroy the adversary. The repeated naming of Gilgul-Nunuku and his attributes destroyed the evil influence in the wax figure representing the person concerned. The force of the Gnostic 149 was notable. In Egyptian magic a mere agglomeration of vowels or of meaningless syllables was supposed to work good or evil. Their barbarous sounds were the object of ridicule to the man of common sense. In many cases they were of Jewish, or Babylonian, or Aramaean, and are so similar to those used by the priests of Egypt to the Greeks, the words were generally corrupted beyond recognition. Thus on a demotic papyrus is found the prescription: "in time of storm and danger of shipwreck cry Anuk Adenas (אנהוק אדניאס) and the disaster will be averted"; on a Greek papyrus the name of the Assyrian Ereschigal is found as ἄρες χηγαλ. So potent is a name that if an inscribed amulet be washed and the water drunk, or the charm written on papyrus be soaked in water and this taken, or if the word be written on hard-boiled eggs without shell and these eaten, preternatural powers come into play. Another prevalent idea in magic is that of substitution: the person or thing to be affected by the spell is replaced by his image, or, like the "ushabti" figures in Egyptian tombs, images replace the protective powers invoked, or last some part (hair, nail, mummy, garments, etc.) of the person. The almost universal "magic circle" is only a mimic wall against the wicked spirits outside and goes back to Chaldean magic under the name of saurit, made with a sprinkling of lime and flour. If the medical wizard or the sorcerer were armed himself or others with a rampart of little stones, this is again but the make-believe of a wall.

After Babylonia Egypt was foremost in magic; the medieval practice of alchemy shows by its name its Egyptian origin. Coptico-exorcisms against all sorts of diseases abound amongst the papyri pertaining to magic, and magic claims a great part of ancient Egyptian literature. Unlike Babylonian magic, however, it seems to have retained to the last its medicinal and preventive character; it rarely indulged in astrology or prediction. Egyptian legend spoke of a magician Teta who worked miracles before Khnum (c. 3800 B.C.), and Greek tradition tells of Nestenesbus, last native King of Egypt (358 B.C.), as the greatest of magicians.

That the Jews were prone to magic is evidenced by the strict laws against it and the warnings of the Prophets (Exod., xxii, 18; Deut., xviii, 10; Is., iii, 18, 20; ivi, 3; Mich., v, 11; cf. IV Kings, xxi, 6). Nevertheless, Jewish magic flourished, especially just before the birth of Christ, as appears from the Book of Enoch, the Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs, and the Testament of Solomon. Origen testifies that in his day to adjure demons was looked upon as specifically "Jewish"; that these adjurations had to be made in Hebrew and from Solomon's books (in Math., xxvi, 63, P. G., XIII, 1757). The frequency of Jewish magic is also corroborated by Talmudic lore.

The Aryan races of Asia seem somewhat less addicted to magic than the Semitic or Turanian races. The Medes and the Persians, in the earlier and purer period of their Avesta religion, or Zoroastrianism, seem to have a horror of magic. When the Persians, after their conquest of the Chaldean Empire, finally absorbed Chaldean characteristics, the magi became more or less scientific astronomers rather than sorcerers. The Indians, likewise, to judge from the Rigveda, were originally free from this superstition; the magic of all peoples must be noted. The Yajurveda, however, their liturgical functions are practically magic performances; and the Atharvaveda contains little else than magical recitations against demons. The Sutras finally, especially those of the Grihya and Sautra ritual, show how the higher aspects of religion had been overgrown by magical ceremonies. Against this degradation the Vedants makes a vigorous stand and attempts to bring the Indian mind back to earlier simplicity and purity. Buddhism, which at first disregarded magic, fell a prey to the universal contagion, especially in China and Tibet.

The Aryans of Europe, Greeks, Romans, Teutons, Celts, were never so deeply infected as the Asiatics. The Romans were too self-reliant and practical to be terrified by magic. The practice of divination and augury seems to have been borrowed from the Egyptians and the Marse; the latter were considered experts in magic even during the empire (Verg., "Agam.", VII, 736, sqq.; Flini, VII, ii; XXI, xii). The Delphic, in Thrace, Toctus, and Thrace, were magical powers, but they were not native Roman deities. The Romans were conscious of their common sense in these matters and felt themselves superior to the Greeks. In the first century of our era Oriental magic invaded the Roman Empire. Flini in his "Natural History" (77 A.D.) in the opening chapters of Bk. XXXII gives the most important extant discussion on magic by any ancient writer, only to bring these magic as impostures. None the less his book is a storehouse of magic recipes, e.g.: "Wear as an amulet the carcass of a frog minus the legs and wrapped in a piece of russet-coloured cloth and it will cure fever" (Bk. XXXII, xxxviii). Such a curse argues at least as much a desire for knowledge of divination. Officially by many laws of the empire against "maleficæ" and "mathematici" magic was forbidden under Augustus, Tiberius, Claudius, and even Caracalla; unofficially, however, even the emperors sometimes dabbled in magic. Nero is said to have studied it; but failing to work miracles, he abandoned it in disgust. Soon after the magicians found an impetus to their art, the emperors and the later emperors, toleration under Vespasian, Hadrian, and M. Aurelius, and even financial aid under Alexander Severus.

The Greeks regarded Thessaly and Thrace as the countries especially addicted to magic. The goddess Hecate, who was thought to preside over magical functions, was originally a foreign deity and was probably introduced into Greek mythology by Hesiod. She is not mentioned in the Iliad or Odyssey though magic was a life in Homeric mythology. The sorcerers of the Odyssey is Circe, famous for the well-known trick of changing men into beasts (Od., X-XII). In later times the foremost magician was Medes, priestess of Hecate; but the gruesome tales told of her express the Greek horror for, as well as belief in, black magic. Curse formule or magic spells against the lives of one's enemies seem to have found no mightier name than Hermes Chthonios. As earth-god he was a manifestation of the world-soul and controlled nature's powers. In Egypt he was identified with Thoth, the god of hidden wisdom, became the keeper of magic secrets and gave his name to Trismegistic literature. Greeks, moreover, welcomed and honoured foreign magicians. Apuleius, by education an Athenian, in his "Golden Ass" (c. 150 A.D.), satirises the frauds of contemporary wonder-workers but praised the "true" Egyptian magic from Persia. When accused of magic, he defended himself in his "Apology" which shows clearly the public attitude towards magic in his day. He quoted Plato and Aristotle who gave credence to true magic. St. Hippolytus of Rome (A Refutation of All Heresies, Bk. IV) gives a sketch of the wizardry practised in the Greek-speaking world.

Teutons and Celts also had their magic, though less known of it. The magical element in the First Edda and in the Beowulf is simple and closely connected with nature phenomena. Woden (Wodan) who invented the runes, was the god for healing and good charms. Loki was a malignent spirit who harassed mankind and with the witch Thodik caused the death of Baldr (Balder). The magic of the mistletoe seems to be an heirloom from earliest Teutonic times. The magic of the Celts seems to have been in the hands of the druids, who, though perhaps no mystic diviners, appear also as magicians in Celtic heroic literature. As they wrote nothing, little is known of their magical lore. For modern magic amongst uncivilised races consult especially Skey's "Malay Magic" (London, 1900).

Magic as a practice finds no place in Christian history, although the belief in the reality of magical powers has been held by Christians and individual Christians have been given to the practice. Two main reasons account for the belief: first, ignorance of physical laws. When the boundary between the physically possible and impossible was uncertain, some individuals were supposed to have gained almost limitless control over nature. Their souls were attuned to the symphony of the universe; they knew the mystery of numbers and in consequence their powers exceeded the common understanding. This, however, was natural magic. Second, seduly, belief in the frequency of diabolical interference with the forces of nature led easily to belief in real magic. The early Christians were emphatically warned against the practice of it in the "Didache" (v, 1) and the letter of Barnabas (xx, 1). In fact it was condemned as a heinous crime. The practice of magic, however, came not only from the pagan world but also from the pseudo-Christian Gnostics. Although Simon Magus and Elymas, that "child of the devil," (Acts, xiii, 6 sqq.) served abroad as diviners, the Christian centuries, ever since, took it to eradicate the propensity to magic. St. Gregory the Great, St. Augustine, St. Crysostom, and St. Epiphani inveighed against it. A more rational view of religion and nature had hardly gained ground, when the Germanic nations entered the Church and brought with them the inclination for magic inherited from centuries of paganism. No wonder that among the diabolicus, wizardry was secretly practised in many places notwithstanding innumerable decrees of the Church on the subject. Belief in the frequency of magic finally led to stringent measures taken against witchcraft (q.v.).

Catholic theology defines magic as the art of performing actions beyond the power of man with the aid of powers other than the Divine, and condemns it as a grievous sin and any attempt at it as a grave sin. It calls such a virtue of religion, because all magical performances, if undertaken seriously, are based on the expectation of interference by demons or lost souls. Even if undertaken out of curiosity the performance of a magical ceremony is sinful as it either proves a lack of faith or a vain superstition. The Catholic Church admits in principle the possibility of interference in the course of nature by spirits other than God, whether good or evil, but never without God's permission. As to the frequency of such interference especially by malignant agencies at the request of man, she observes the utmost reserve.

Occurrence

Occurrence (in Liturgy).—I. Definition.—Occurrence is the coinciding or occurring of two liturgical offices on one and the same day; concurrence is the succession of two offices, so that the second vesper of one occur at the same time as the first vesper of the other. The chief causes of occurrence are: (1) the variance of the feast and the cycle of Easter, while the other feasts are fixed; (2) the annual change of the Dominical Letter, whereby Sunday falls successively on different dates of the same month (see Calendar; Domical Letters). Occurrence may be accidental or perpetual. (1) The calendar gives as a fixed feast for 28 May the feast of St. Augustine of Canterbury; on the other hand 28 May, 1891, the table of movable feasts marked that day as the feast of Corpus Christi; thus on 25 May, 1891, these two offices fell on the same day—that is there was an occurrence. But as this coincidence was due to a variable cause, and did not happen the following years, the occurrence was accidental. (2) The patronal feast of churches is celebrated with an octave; in the case of a church having St. Martin (11 November) as its patron, the octave day (18 November) falls on a fixed feast marked in the Calendar: “Dedication, etc. ...”; consequently, there is in such a church each year a coinciding of two offices on 18 November; this occurrence is said to be perpetual.

Rules to be Observed.—In case of an occurrence two questions arise: (1) Which office is to have the preference? (2) What is to be done concerning the less favoured office? (2) The two offices must be compared from the point of view of dignity and necessity, taken either separately or together. As to dignity, Christmas, the Assumption, etc., prevail over the feasts of saints; as to necessity, the first Sunday of Advent being privileged (if it falls on 30 November) over the Office of St. Andrew the Apostle; a fortiori, an office favoured by both conditions will be preferred. (2) As to the less favoured office, it is treated differently according as the recurrence is perpetual or accidental. If accidental, the Holy See should intervene to operate a change that will be effectual each year; the mention of the feast is maintained on the day on which it falls, but the office is changed to the first free day (a day not occupied by another office, double or semi-double); liturgists call this change mutatio (not translatio). When the occurrence is accidental, the compiler of the diocesan ordo, with the approval of the ordinary, decides, in conformity with the rubrics, what is to be done for the year. Either the office in question is transferable, in which the regulations of title X, “De translatione,” are to be followed; or else it is not transferable, when it must be seen if it is to be omitted completely, or if a commemoration of it may be made on the day in question. The whole matter is provided for in the general rubrics of the Breviary.

To give an instance of concurrence, the ecclesiastical calendar marks the feast of St. Anthony of Padua on 13 June, and that of St. Basil on 14 June; these two feasts being of double rite have first and second Vespers; on the evening of 13 June, therefore, the second Vesper of St. Anthony and the first Vesper of St. Basil happen at the same time, and there is said to be a concurrence of the two offices.

O’Connell, Daniel, b. at Carben, near Cahirciveen, Co. Kerry, Ireland, 1775; d. at Genoa, 1847. The O’Connell’s, once great in Kerry, had suffered severely by the penal laws, and the family at Carhen was not rich. An uncle, Maurice O’Connell of Darrynane, resident in France, bore the expense of educating Daniel and his brother Maurice. In 1791 they were sent to the Irish College at Liége, but, Daniel being beyond the prescriptive age for admission, they proceeded to St. Omer’s in France, and after a year went to Douai. Daniel gave evidence of industry and ability at St. Omer’s, but at Douai his stay was short, for, owing to the French Revolution, the two O’Connells returned home (1793). In 1794 Daniel became a law student at Lincoln’s Inn and in 1798 was called to the Irish Bar. The era of penal legislation in Ireland had ceased, and already the Act of 1776 had been made in the penal code. By a series of remedial measures, ending with the Catholic Relief Act of 1793, Catholics were placed in many respects on a level with other denominations, but were still excluded from Parliament, from the inner courts of justice, and from civil and military offices; and the recall of Fitzwilliam...
i) and the events following showed that no further concessions would be given. O'Connell could see why Catholics who paid taxes and were obedient to law should have a share in the spending of the taxes and in the making of the laws. He held violence as a weapon of reform, respected and the rights of property, and therefore the French Revolution as he did the Rebellion of 1798. The Union had proved because it destroyed Ireland's separate nationality; and he has recorded his own hearing the ringing of the bells of St. Patrick's Cathedral when the Act of Union was passed, and his intention to do something to undo it. He believed that trying to moderate was the true character of patriotism, and that the rights of Ireland could be won by negotiation, but he had no faith in the efficacy of the Catholic leaders. O'Connell retorted by calling him "Orange Peel!". O'Connell turned the Catholic Committee into the Catholic Board, but Peel proclaimed the Act of Union as he had proclaimed the Committee; and while O'Connell continued to agitate, Peel continued to pass acts and enforce them. Meanwhile one noted event happened which further endeared O'Connell to the people. The Dublin Corporation had always been reactionary and bigoted, always the champion of Protestant ascendency. O'Connell in a public speech in 1815 called it a "beggary corporation". The aldermen and councillors were enraged and, finding that O'Connell would not apologize, one of their number, D'Estere, sent him a challenge. D'Estere was not a duelist and the hope was that if O'Connell attempted to fight there would be an end to his career. To the surprise of all, O'Connell met D'Estere and shot him dead. He bitterly regretted he should be enlisted, there should be organization and, and the Catholic leaders' demand concession not favour but as a right. O'Connell was the leader for a movement, a man strong in mind, a great orator, a speaker, and a lawyer, a man of sarcasm and invective, a man who could wring from a reluctant witness, and mock the insolenace of a parson, or melt a jury by oviing appeal. Address was his weapon, as unequalled. The people's pride of such a leader, were ready to follow wherever he led. O'Connell's first appearance public platform was in 1800, when he declared the contemplated 1813, and declared that the people wanted no such thing, and that if a Union were to be the alternative to the re-enactment of the penal laws they would r the penal laws. In the subsequent years he early attended the meetings of the Catholic Committee and infused more vigour and energy into proceedings, and by 1810 he had become the trusted and powerful of the Catholic leaders. He went to the Roundabout Defeated Committee and, and declared that the Central Committee was a branch of the Catholic Association, where local grievances were ventilated, and subscriptions received and sent to Dublin to the central association, where he became a leader of the party. In 1825 the Government, alarmed at the power of an organization which was a serious rival to the executive, passed a bill suppressing it. But O'Connell, experienced in defeating Acts of Parliament, changed the name to the New Catholic Association, and the work of agitation went on. As much as five hundred pounds a week was subscribed, and in 1826 the Association felt strong enough to put up a candidate for Waterford, and succeeded in winning the seat.
Westmeath, and Louth. In 1828 came the Clare election when O'Connell himself was nominated. It was known that he could not as a Catholic take the Parliamentary oath; but if he, the representative of 6,000,000, were driven from the doors of Parliament solely because of his creed, the effect on public opinion would be great. O'Connell was elected, and when he presented himself in Parliament he refused to take the oath offered him. The crisis had come. The Catholic millions, organised and defiant, would have Emancipation; the Orangemen would have no concession; and Ireland, in the end of 1828, was on the brink of civil war. To avoid this calamity Peel and Wellington struck their colours, and in 1829 the Catholic Relief Act was passed.

Henceforth O'Connell was the Uncrowned King of Ireland. To recompense him for his services and to secure these services for the future in Parliament, he was induced to abandon the practice of his profession and to accept instead the O'Connell Tract, which from the voluntary subscriptions of the people brought him an income of £1,000 a year. His first care was for Repeal, but his appeals for Protestant co-operation were not responded to, and the associations he formed to agitate the question were all proclaimed. In this respect the Whigs, whom he supported in 1832, were no better than the Tories. He denounced them as "base, brutal and bloody"; yet in 1835 he entered into an alliance with them by accepting the Lichfield Honour, the same or one of the others, to the end about 1841. During these years Drummond effected reforms in the Irish executive, and measures affecting tithes, poor law, and municipal reform were passed. But Repeal was lost in abeyance till Peel returned to power, and then O'Connell established the Repeal Association. Its progress was slow until in 1842 it got the support of the Nation newspaper. In one year it advanced with giant strides, and in 1843 O'Connell held a series of meetings, some of them attended by hundreds of thousands.

The last of these meetings was to be held at Clontarf in October. Peel proclaimed the meeting and prosecuted O'Connell, and in 1844 he was convicted and imprisoned. On appeal to the House of Lords the judgment of the Irish court was reversed and O'Connell was set free. His health had suffered, and he felt that he had no energy left in him for movements, a shifting from Repeal to Federalism and back again to Repeal. He also quarrelled with the Young Irelanders. Then came the awful calamity of the famine. O'Connell's last appearance in Parliament was in 1847 when he reasserted that all the people be saved from perishing. He was then seriously ill. The doctors ordered him to a warmer climate. He felt that he was dying and wished to die at Rome, but got no further than Genoa. In accordance with his wish his heart was brought to Rome and his body to Ireland. His funeral was of enormous dimensions, and since his death a splendid statue has been erected to his memory in Dublin and a round tower placed over his remains in Glasnevin.

O'Connell was married to his cousin Mary O'Connell and had three daughters and four sons, all of whom being at one time or another in Parliament.

John O'Connell, third son of the above; b. at Dublin, 24 December, 1810; d. at Kingstown, Co. Dublin, 24 May, 1858. He was returned M.P. for Yorks (1836), Athlone (1839), and Kilkenny (1841-47). As a politician he was not tactful, and, came in conflict with the Young Ireland party. As a writer his "Repeal Dictionary" (1845) showed much literary and polemical power. In 1846 he published a selection of his father's works, prefaced by a memoir. His "Recollections and Experiences during a Parliamentary Career from 1833 to 1848" was issued in two volumes (1849). As a Whig, and also a captain in the militia, he fell into disfavour with his Limman with whom Samuel Johnson corresponded with ference to Irish literature. Irish was his native language, so that he was one of the last great Irishmen who continued the unbroken traditions of their race.

His private diaries and note-books in which he jotted down household affairs, expenses etc., preserved by his direct descendant, the O'Connor Don H. M. L. at Clonallia) were written largely in classic Irish. His best known work is his "Discourses on the History of Ireland" published in 1753 which led to his correspondence with Dr. Johnson, who urged him to write an account of pre-Norman Ireland. His collection of Irish manuscripts passed to his grandson, the younger Charles, and later formed the renowned Stowe Collection in the possession of the Duke of Buckingham, whose librarian the younger Charles became.
This collection, including the famous Stowe Mss and the original of the first part of the "Annals of the Four Masters," was for years inaccessible to Irish scholars, but has now been deposited in the Royal Irish Academy. A man of affairs, he was one of the founders of the Roman Catholic Committee in 1757, and with Dr. Curry, may be looked upon as the real lay leaders and representatives of the Irish Catholics during the middle of the eighteenth century. Charles O'Connor (grandson of the above), wrote the "Memoirs of the Life and Writings of the late Charles O'Connor of Bel-anagure". This is a very rare book, the author having suppressed it, and destroyed the manuscript of the second volume when ready for press. Its destruction was a great loss to the Irish history of the period.
The present O'Connor Don possesses many rare books;
others are in the Gilbert Library now acquired by the Octavarium Romanum, a liturgical book, which may be considered as an appendix to the Roman Breviary, but which has not the official position of the other Roman liturgical books. The first mention of this book dates from Sixtus V. In order to introduce a greater variety in the selection of lessons,

he ordered the compilation of an Octavarium to comprise the lessons proper to each day of the octaves.
The plan was not executed during his pontificate (1585-90). When the question of correcting the Breviary was raised anew under Clement VII (1662-1665), the projected Octavarium was again spoken of. The consulted, the most distinguished of whom was Barovius, were in favour of the suggested compilation. Gavant, who was also a consultor, undertook the work, but his book did not appear till 1628. Its title, which is descriptive, is "Octavarium Romanum, Lectiones II et III Noturni completæ, rectandas infra octavas Festtorum, praestitit patronorum locorum et titulorum Ecclesiasticorum, quæ cum octavæ celebrati debent, juxta
rubricas Breviarii Romani, a Sacra Rituum Congregada ad usum totius ordinis ecclesiasticorum approbatum" (Anwerp, 1628). In addition to the letter of approbation, the Brief of Urban VIII, and the dedication, the book includes a few pages on the origin, cause, and rites of octaves. The body of the work consists of a lection of readings, or lessons, for the feasts of the Holy Trinity, the Transfiguration, the Holy Cross, several feasts of Our Lady (Conception, Purification, Visitation, Our Lady of the Snows), the feasts of St.
Michael, the Apostles, Saints Mary Magdalene, Mar-
thia, John, Athanasius, Monica, Nereus and Achilleus, the Seven Brothers, Apollinaris, the feast of the Be-heading of St. John the Baptist, of St. Gregory tha, and the feast of St. Paschal Baylon etc. Then follow the lessons for the commons. They are drawn from the writings of the Fathers, and are varied and well-selected. Numerous editions have appeared

FERNAND CABROL.

Octave.—I. ORIGIN.—It is the number seven, not eight, that plays the principal rôle in Jewish heortology, and dominates the cycle of the year. Every seventh day is a sabbath; the seventh month is sacred;
the seventh year is a sabbatical year. The jubilee year was brought about by the number seven multiplicated by seven; the feast of the Azymes lasted seven days, like the paschal feast; the feast of Pentecost was seven times seven days after the Pasch; the feast of the Tabernacles lasted seven days, the days of convocation numbered seven (Willis, "Worship of the Old Covenant", 190-1; "Dict. of the Bible", s. v. Feast and Feasts, I, 859). However, the octave day, without having the symbolic importance of the seventh day, had also its rôle. The eighth day was the day of circumcission (Gen., xxi, 4; Lev., xii, 3; Luke, i, 59; Acta, vii, 8 etc.). The feast of the Tabernacles, which as we have said lasted seven days, was followed on the eighth by a solemn feast which may be considered as an octave (Lev., xxxii, 36, 39; Num., xxvii, 35; II Esd., viii, 18); the eighth day was the day of certain sacrifices (Lev. xiv, 10, 23; xv, 14, 29; Num. vii, 10). It was on the eighth day, too, that the feast of the dedication of the Temple under Solomon, and of its purifications under Eschias concluded (II Par., vii, 9; xxix, 17). The ogdoad of the Eucharist and similar numbers were among other peoples had no influence on Christian liturgy.
Gavant’s opinion that the custom of celebrating the octave of feasts dates back to the days of the Apostles is devoid of proof (Thesaurus sacr. rit., III sq.). At first the Christian feasts have no octaves. Sunday, which may in a sense be considered the first Christian feast, falls on the seventh day; the feasts of Easter and Pentecost, which are, with Sunday, the most ancient, form as it were only a single feast of fifty days. The feast of Christmas, which too is very old, had originally no octave.
In the fourth century, when the primitive idea of the seven days’ feast of the paschal time began to grow dim, Easter and Pentecost were given octaves. Possible at first this was only a baptismal custom, the neophytes remaining in a kind of joyful retreat from Easter or Pentecost till the following Sunday. Moreover, the Sunday which, after the feasts of Easter and Pentecost, fell on the eighth day, came as a natural conclusion of the seven feast days after these two festivals. The octave, therefore, would have in a considerable sense developed of its own accord. If this be so, we may say, contrary to the common opinion that Christians borrowed the idea of the octave from the Jews, this custom grew spontaneously on Christian soil. However, it must be said that the first Christian octave known to history is the dedication of the Churches of Tyre and Jerusalem, under Constantine, and that these solemnities, in imitation of the dedication of the Jewish Temple, lasted eight days (Eusebius, "De vita Constantii", III, xxx sq.; Sozomen, "Hist. eccl.", II, xxvi). This feast may possibly have influenced the adoption of the octave by the Christians. From the fourth century onwards the celebration of octaves is mentioned more frequently. It occurs in the Apostolic Constitutions, the sermons of the Fathers, the Councils ("Conc. Apost.", VIII, xxii; V, xx; Au-116-7; "Concil. Masic. II", ii; "Concil. in Trullo", iv, 1).

II. CELEBRATION OF OCTAVES IN ANCIENT AND MODERN TIMES.—The liturgy of the octave assumed its present form slowly. In the first period, that is from the fourth to the sixth and even seventh century, little thought seems to have been given to varying liturgical formulae during the eight days. The sacramentaries of Gelasius and St. Gregory make no mention of the intervening days; on the octave day the office of the feast is repeated. The days of the octave deemed more prominent by the liturgy. The Sunday following Easter (i. e. Sunday in albis) and the octave day of Christmas (now the Circumcision) are treated very early as feast days by the liturgy. Certain octaves were considered as privileged days, on which work was forbidden. The courts and theatres were closed ("Cod. Theod.", XV, tit. v de spect. leg.
5; IX, de quest. leg. 7; "Conc. Mog.", 813, c. xxxvi).
After Easter, Pentecost, and Christmas had received octaves, the tendency was to have an octave for all the solemn feasts. Easter was the feast of the Dedication (cf. Cabrol, op. cit., pp. 128-9). Theo-domar, a contemporary of Charlemagne, speaks of the octave days of the feasts of Christmas and the Epiphany, but it must not be concluded that he was ignorant of those of Easter and Pentecost, which were more celebrated.
The practice of having the feast for the octave of the saints does not seem to be older than the eighth century, and even then it was peculiar to the Latins.
From the ninth century it becomes more frequent.
The capitation of Charlemagne speaks of the octave of the feasts of the saints Peter and Paul and other saints, "quorum festivitas apud nos clarior habitet, . . . et quorum consuetudo diversarum ecclesiarum octavas cele-brarit" (De Met. offic., IV, xxxv). In the thirteenth century this custom extends to all other feasts, under the influence of the Franciscans, who then exerted a preponderating influence on the formation of the modern Breviary (Bäumer-Biron, "Hist.
Brevar"), II, 31, 71, 199). The Franciscan feasts of Sts. Francis, Clare, Anthony of Padua, Bernadine etc., had their octaves. At the time of the reformation of the Breviary (Breviary of St. Pius V, 1568) the question of regulating the octave was considered. Two kinds of octaves were distinguished, those of feasts of our Lord, and those of saints and the dedication. In the first category are further distinguished principal feasts—those of Easter and Pentecost, which had specially privileged octaves, and those of Christmas, the Epiphany, and Corpus Christi, which were privileged (the Ascension octave was not privileged). Octaves, which exclude all or part of all occuring and transferred feasts, are called privileged. The octaves of saints were treated almost like that of the Ascension. This classification tailed the application of a certain number of rubitres, the details of which can be found in Bäumer-Biron, op. cit., II, 199-200. For the changes inroduced under Leo XIII, cf. ibid., 462, and also the rubries of the Breviary. Under OCTAVARIUM ROMANUM there is an attempt to provide a more varied office for the octave.
The Greeks also to a certain extent admitted the celebration of octaves into their liturgy. However, the octave seems to be too closely connected with the apodosis of the Greeks with the octave. Although having the same origin as the Latin octave,
the apodosis differs from the octave in this, that it occurs sometimes on the eighth, and sometimes on the fifth, the fourth, or the ninth (cf. Schein in "Dict.
derel. et de liturgic chret.", s. v. Apodosis).

O’CULLERAN, Gelasius (Glaissier), Cistercian, Abbot of Boyle, Ireland, b. probably near Arsenore Abbey, Ballyshannon, Co. Donegal; martyred, 21 Nov., 1580. Three of his brothers were Cistercian abbots, and a fourth Bishop of Raphoe. Gelasius, the eldest, studied at Salamanca University, went thence to Paris where he took his doctorate at the Sorbonne, made his monastic profession, and was created Abbot of Boyle, Co. Roscommon. This abbey had been confiscated and granted to Cusack, Sheriff of Meath; but the Irish regulars continued to appoint superiors to their suppressed houses. The young abbot went immediately to Ireland and is said to have obtained restoration of his abbey. He was, however, seized at Dublin and for long was imprisoned with Eugene O’Mulkeeran, Abbot of Holy Trinity at Lough Key. Refusing to conform, they were tortured and finally hanged outside Dublin, 21 November, 1580. O’Culleran’s body was spared mutilation through his friends’ intervention. His clothes were divided as a martyr’s relics among the Catholics.

Kerry; took his vows in Lugo, studied at Burgos, gained his doctorate of theology in Bordeaux, and returned as priest to Tralee. In 1627 he was sent to teach theology in the newly established College for Irish Dominicans at Louvain. In 1629 he went to Madrid on business connected with this college and, while in Spain, the young prince of Asturias, afterwards Philip IV, interested himself in O’ Daly’s project and deferred payment for it. On his return to Madrid (1639), Belem on the Tagus, four miles below the city, was selected as a site and, with the assistance of the Countess of Astalaya, the convent was a revelation, and opened up an entirely new world to European scholars. It was followed by a series of thirty-eight lectures on the Manners and Customs of the Ancient Irish, published later (1873) under the editorship of Dr. W. K. Sullivan.

O’Curry, a self-taught man and with little or no classical knowledge, was one of Ireland’s most energetic workers. Scarcely an Irish book was to be found which he did not read and scarcely a rare manuscript existed in private hands of which he did not make a copy. In this way he gained an outlook over the field of Irish literature, so full and so far-reaching that though strides have been made in scientific scholarship since his day, no one has come ever near him since in his all-round knowledge of the literature of Ireland. He transcribed accurately Dungal MacFhirbis’s book on Irish genealogies, the Book of Lismore, and others.

The last work he was engaged on was the Brehon Laws (q. v.); of these he transcribed eight large volumes, and made a preliminary translation in thirteen volumes. O’Curry was severely tried by government officials who took upon themselves, in gross ignorance and in defiance of all rules of scholarship, to dictate to the master how the translation and compilation of the Brehon Laws were to be carried on. O’Curry has left a full, fully-documented statement of the incredible treatment to which he and O’Donovan were subjected, and his account of how he was the first scholar since the death of the great antiquarian, Dungal MacFhirbis (murdered in 1670), who was able to penetrate and get a grip of the long-forgotten language of the ancient law tracts, is one of the most curious things in literature. Many men, such as Todd, Petrie, Graves, Reeves, were deeply indebted to O’Curry, for with a rare generosity he freely communicated the treasures of his knowledge to all who asked him.

On his return to Madrid (1639), Belem on the Tagus, four miles below the city, was selected as a site and, with the assistance of the Countess of Astalaya, the convent of Our Lady of Bom Sucesso was built. The king had such confidence in him that he made him envoy to Charles I of England, to the exiled Charles II, and to Pope Innocent X (1650). The Queen of Portugal also sent him as envoy to Pope Alexander VII.

In the year 1655 he was sent as envoy from John IV of Portugal to Anne of Austria and Louis XIV to conclude a treaty between Portugal and France. Here as elsewhere, success attended him; but while negotiations abroad and matters of government at home afforded opportunities of serving the House of Braganza, he would not accept any honour in return. His acquaintances praise his straightforwardness, honesty, tact, and disinterestedness. He refused the Archbishp- ocracy of Braga and the Primacy of Goa and the Bishopric of Coimbra; nor would he accept the titles of Privy Councillor or Queen’s Confessor, though he held both offices. In 1666 he published “Initium, Incrementum, ut Exitus Familiae Geraldinorum, Desmonium Comitum, Palatinarum, Kyrieles in Hibernia, ac Persecutionis Hereticorum Descriptio” etc., his work on the Earls of Desmond, for which he availed himself of the traditional knowledge of his ancestors. In the first part he describes the origin of the Munster Geraldines, their varying fortunes, and their end in the heroic struggle for faith and fatherland. It is our chief authority on this subject. The second part treats of the cruel persecution inflicted on the Irish Catholics, and of the martyrdom of twenty Dominicans, many of whom had been with him in Lisbon. The work was translated into French by Abbé Joubert (1697), and into English by the Rev. C. P. Mehan, Dublin (2nd edition annotated, 1878.) During these years his chief concern was to put his college on a firm basis and to make it render the greatest possible service to Ireland. Bom Sucesso became too small for the number of students. In 1659 he laid the first stone of a larger building which was called Corpo Santo. To provide funds for these houses he consented to become Bishop of Coimbra and, in consequence, President of the Privy Council; but before the papal Bull arrived he died. His remains reposed in the cloister of Corpo Santo until the earthquake of 1755; the inscription on his tomb recorded that he was “In varia Regum legationibus felix... Vir Prudentia, Iustitia, et Ingregia sapientissimus.” (Successful in embassies for kings... a man distinguished for prudence, knowledge, and virtue.) A few years after the catastrophe, on the same spot where the same name now stands, a new学堂 and church rose, which, with Bom Sucesso, keep O’Daly’s memory fresh in Lisbon to the present day.

O’Daly’s posthumous work appears to have been published by Mehan, 1857-1858, in London under the title “Liber Catholicus” (Dublin, 1857), and is a work of great importance. His “Ballads of the Irish Catholics” contains much additional information. In particular, O’Daly’s “Memorials” of O’Daly’s “Memoirs of Irish Catholics” (Dublin, 1857) in the translation of O’Daly’s “Memoirs of Irish Catholics” (Dublin, 1857) in the translation of 1868, O’Connell’s “Domini O’Daly in Fauch and Fatherland” (Dublin, 1868).

REIGNAL WALSH.

O’Daly, Donogh Mór (in Irish Donnchadh Mór Ó Dálaigh), a celebrated Irish poet, d. 1244. About thirty of his poems are extant, amounting to four or five thousand lines, nearly all religious. O’Reilly styles him Abbot of Boyle (Irish Writers, p. LXXXVIII) as does O’Curry (Manners and Customs, III, p. 301); he was buried by the church in the Contemplative Order and it is probable that he was a canon of St. Ignatius Loyola’s Spiritual Exercises: “Take, O Lord, my entire liberty... whatever I have or possess you have bestowed on me; back to thee I give it all, and to the rule of thy will, for ever and absolutely. Give me only thy love and thy grace and I am rich enough; nor do I ask anything more.” The hymn (probably first printed in the “Symphonies of St. Ignatius” (Cologne, 1858)) in the “Katholische Kirchengeschichte” (Augsburg, 1822) as the title of “The Desire of St. Ignatius” Father Caswall’s beautiful version appeared in his “Masque of Mary" etc. (1855), and in his "Hymns and Poems" (1873); also in various Catholic hymnbooks (e.g. "Roman Hymnal", New York, 1884; Tosier's "Catholic Church Hymnal", New York, 1905; and Odilo's "The Book of Hymns", Edinburgh, 1910). The hymn was translated by J. Keble, J. W. Hewett, E. C. Benedict, H. M. Macgill, S. W. Duffield.

The first stanza of the companion hymn is:

O Deus ego amo te,
Nec amo te ut salves me,
Aut quaia non amantes te Eterno passage.

There are four additional stanzas in irregular rhythm, while a variant form adds as a final line: "Et solum quaia Deus es" (thus given in Moorsom's "A Historical Companion to Hymns Ancient and Modern", 2nd ed., Cambridge, 1869, p. 176). The hymn has been appropriately styled the "love-sigh" of St. Francis Xavier (Schlosser, "Die Kirche in ihren Liedern", 2nd ed., Freiburg, 1883, I, 445, who devotes sixteen pages to a discussion of its authorship, translations etc.), who, it is fairly certain, composed the original Spanish sonnet "No me mueve, mi Dios, para quererte"—on which the various Latin versions are based, about the year 1583. There is not, however, sufficient basis for crediting him to any Latin version. The form given above appeared in the "Celeste Palatometrum" (Cologne, 1606). An earlier Latin version by Joannes Noes in his "Praecepta occupacionis morientum" (Rome, 1657), beginning: "Non me movet, Domine, ad amandum te". Nadasi again translated it in 1665. F. X. Drebikta ("Hymnus Francisci Faludi", Budapest, 1899) gives these versions, and one by Petrus Ponzinus in 1667. In 1668 J. Schleffer gave, in his "Heilige Seelenlust", a German translation—"Ich liebe Gott, und zwar unsonst"—of a version beginning "Amen Deum, sed liberam". The form of the hymn indicated above has been translated into English verse about twenty-five times, is found in Catholic and non-Catholic hymn-books, and is evidently highly prized by non-Catholic. Thus, the Rev. Dr. Duffield, a Presbyterian, speaks of both hymns in glowing terms, in his "Latin Hymn Writers and Their Hymns" (New York, 1889): "From the higher critical standpoint, these hymns are not unacceptable as Xavier's own work. They feel as if they belonged to him, and to his life. They are transfigured and shot through by a personal sense of absorption into divine love, which has fused and crystallized them in its fiery heat" (p. 306). The Scriptural text for both hymns might well be "if a man love me, he will keep my words; and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him and make our abode with him" (John iv, 19—20).

O'Devany, CORNELIUS (CONCHOBHAR O'DUBHNEANNACH). Bishop of Down and Connor. Ireland, b. about 1532; d. at Dublin, 11 February, 1612 (N. S.). He was a Franciscan of Donegal Convent, and while in Rome in 1582 was appointed Bishop of Down and Connor, and consecrated 2 February, 1583. In 1588 he was committed to Dublin Castle. Failing to convict him of any crime punishable with death, Lord Deputy Fitzwilliam sought authority from Burghley to "be rid of such an obstinate enemy to God and so rank a traitor to her Majesty as no doubt he is". He was tried in prison until November, 1590, being then released ostensibly on his own petition but doubtless through political influence. He was protected by O'Neill until 1607, and escaped arrest until the middle of 1611, when, almost eighty years old, he was taken while administering confirmation and again committed to Dublin Castle. On 28 January, 1612, he was tried for high treason, found guilty by the majority of a packed jury, and sentenced to die on 1 February (O. S.). He was drawn on a cart from the Castle to the gallows beyond the river; the whole route was crowded with Catholics lamenting and begging his blessing. The solemn clergyman pestered him with ministrations and urged him to confess he died for treason. "Pray let me be", he answered, "the vicar's messenger to me, here present, could tell that I did not wish life and revenue for going once to that temple", pointing to a tower opposite. He kissed the gallows before mounting, and then proceeding to exhort the Catholics to constancy, he was thrown off, cut down alive, and quartered. With him suffered Patrick O'Loughlin, a priest arrested at Cork. The people, despite the guards, carried off the halter, his clothes, and even fragments of his body and chips of the gallows. They prayed all night by the body, and the next morning the Catholics exhumed them and interred them in St. James's Churchyard. A list of martyrs compiled by Dr. O'Devany was used by Rothe in his "Analecta".

Odilia, Saint, patroness of Alsace, b. at the end of the seventh century; d. about 720. According to a trustworthy statement, apparently taken from an earlier life, she was the daughter of the Frankish king Chilperic I, who gave her in marriage to Adalrich (Atius, Etik) and his wife Berewinda, who had large estates in Alsace. She founded the convent of Hohenburg (Odilienberg) in Alsace, to which Charlemagne granted immunity, confirmed 9 March, 827, by Louis the Pious who endowed the foundation, (Böhmer-Mühlbacher, "Regesta Imperii", I, 886, 933). A tenth-century "Vita" has been preserved, written at the close of the century. According to this narrative she was born blind, an unanimous warning her sight at baptism. A shorter text, probably independent of this, is contained in a manuscript of the early eleventh century. Internal evidences point to an original eighth-century "Vita", that J. Vignier alleged to have discovered, has been proved to be a forgery by this historian. Her feast is celebrated 13 December; her grave is in a chapel near the convent church on the Odilienberg. Odilo, Saint, fifth Abbot of Cluny (q. v.), b. c. 962; d. 31 December, 1048. He was descended from the nobility of Auvergne. He early became a cleric in the seminary of St. Julien in Brioude. In 991 he entered Cluny and before the end of his year of probation was made coadjutor to Abbot Mayeul, and shortly before the latter's death (994) was made abbot and received Holy Orders. The rapid development of the monastery under him was due chiefly to his generosity and charity, his activity and talent for oratory. He was a man of prayer and penance, a model of observance of the Divine Office, and a zealous and upright abbot. He encouraged learning; had the monk Radolphus Gladstone of Le Puy as his tutor. He erected a magnificent shrine in his church on the site of the tomb of St. Vital. He erected a magnificent church, and was buried there.
and furthered the reform of the Benedictine monasteries. Under Alphonse VI it spread into Spain. The rule of St. Benedict was substituted in Cluny for the domestic rule of Isidore. By bringing the reformed or newly founded monasteries of Spain into permanent dependence on the mother-house, Odilo prepared the way for the union of monasteries, which Hugh established by maintaining order and discipline. The number of monasteries increased from thirty-seven to sixty-five, of which five were newly established and twenty-three had followed the reform movement. Some of the monasteries reformed by Cluny, reformed others; thus the Abbey of St. Vannes in Lorraine reformed many on the Franco-German borderland. On account of his services in the reform Odilo was called by Fulbert of Chartres the "Archangel of the Monks" and through his relations with the popes, rulers, and prominent bishops of the time Cluny monasticism was promoted. He journeyed nine times to Italy, and took part in several synods there. John XIX and Benedict IX both offered him the Archbishopric of Lyons but he declined. From 998 he gained influence with the Emperor Otto III. He was on terms of intimacy with Henry II when the latter, on political grounds, sought to impair the spiritual independence of the German monasteries. For Germany the Cluny policy had no permanent success, as the monks there were more inclined to individualism. Between 1027 and 1046 the relations between the Cluny monks and the emperor remained unchanged. In 1046 Odilo was present at the coronation of Henry III in Rome. Robert II of France allied himself with the Reform party.

In 1039 a nephew of Odilo, Stephen, became pope, and, by a few short and unimportant ones: a life of the holy Empress St. Adel wide (q. v.) to whom he was closely related; a short biography of his predecessor Mayordom; sermons on feasts of the ecclesiastical year; some hymns and prayers; and a few letters from his extensive correspondence.

Odilo and his confères interested themselves in the church reform which began about that time. They followed no definite ecclesiastical-political programme, but protected their attacks principally against internal offenses such as simony, marriage of the clergy, and the uncanonical marriage of the laity. The Holy See could depend above all on the religious of Cluny when it sought to raise itself from its humiliating position and undertook the reform of the Church.

He died while on a visitation to the monastery of Sauvigny where he was buried and soon venerated as a saint. In 1063 Peter Damien undertook the process of his canonization, and wrote a short life, an abstract from the work of Jotsald, one of Odilo's monks who accompanied him on his travels. In 1703 the relics together with those of Mayeul were burned by the revolutionaries 'in the altar of the fatherland.' The feast of St. Odilo was formerly 2 January, in Cluny, now it is celebrated on 29 January, and in Switzerland on 6 February.

Odin, John Mary, Lazarist missionary, first Bishop of Galveston and second Archbishop of New Orleans, b. 25 Feb., 1801, at Hauteville, Angouleme, France; d. there 25 May, 1870. The seventh of ten children, his mother was a most valuable work. "The Heavenly Farm. His society and love for the poor being looked on as a sign of priestly vocation, he was sent when nine years of age to study Latin under his uncle, cured of Naually, whose death soon ended this desultory teaching. After two years at home, he studied the classics at Roanne and Verriere and was a brilliant student of philosophy at L'Argentiere and Aix. He was prompt to answer the Bishop Dubourg's appeal for the Louisiana mission. Reaching New Orleans in June, 1822, he was sent to the seminary of the Lazarists, The Barrens, 80 miles from St. Louis, Mo., to complete his theological studies. There he joined the Lazarists. (Clarke in his lives of deceased bishops of the U. S. erroneously states that he entered at an early age in Paris.) He was ordained priest 4 May, 1824, and to parish duties were added those of teaching. In vacation he preached to the Indians on the Arkansas River, for whose conversion he was most eager. In 1825 he was at times in charge of the seminary, college, and parish. He also gave missions to non-Catholics and to the Indians, until, his health failing, it was decided to send him abroad, where he could also gather recruits and funds for the missions. Accompanying Bishop Rosati to the second Council of Baltimore as theologian, he was commissioned by the council to bring its decrees to Rome for approval. Two years were spent abroad in the interest of his "poor America." Pastoral work, chiefly at Cape Girardeau, where he opened a school (1838), and missions occupied the next five years. Sent to Texas in 1840 as delegate by his provincial visitor, Father Timon, whom the Holy See had made prefect Apostolic of the new republic, he began the hardest kind of labour among non-Catholics, many of whom had fallen away from the disorders accompanying the change of government, and among non-catholics and the fierce Comanche Indians. His gentleness and self-sacrifice wrought wonders. His great work was nominated to the episcopate of Detroit but declined. A year later he was named titular Bishop of Claudopolis and Vicar Apostolic of Texas. His consecration took place 6 March, 1841. He had already succeeded with Father Timon's help in having the Republic recognize the Church's right to the possessions that were hers under the Mexican government. In 1846 he went to Europe and secured many recruits for his mission. In 1847 Texas was made a diocese and Bishop Odin's see was fixed at Galveston. On the death of Archbishop Blanc of New Orleans, he was promoted to that see 15 February, 1861. Neither his age nor infirmity kept him from a watchful care of his flock. War had wrought havoc during his time in Texas, the civil war scourged his archidioecese now. His influence was extraordinary among the Catholic soldiers. Pius IX wrote to him in the South, as to Archbishop Hughes in the North, to use their influence for peace. His Apostolic labours were interrupted only by journeys to Europe in the interest of his archdiocese. Despite great impaired health he went to the Vatican Council. At Rome he grew so ill that he was granted leave to return to Heautontville where he died.

B. RANDOLPH.

Odington, Walter, English Benedictine, also known as Walter of Evesham, by some writers confused with Walter of Eynsham, who lived about fifty years earlier, d. not earlier than 1230. During the first part of his religious life he was stationed at Evesham and later removed to Oxford, where he was engaged in astronomical and mathematical work as early as 1216. He wrote chiefly on scientific subjects; his most valuable work, "The Heavenly Farm. His “Scriptores”; other works are in manuscript only. This treatise, written at Evesham, and therefore composed before 1316, according to Riemann before 1300, is a remarkable work in which the author gathered together practically all the knowledge of the theory of music possessed at his time and added some theoretical considerations of his own. The bulk of the work is given by Riemann, who claims for him the distinction of having, before the close of the thirteenth century, established on theoretical grounds the combination of minor and major thirds. Davy enumerates the following works: “De Speculatione Musicae”; “Ydceodron”, a treatise on alchemy; “Declaratione motus octavae sphere”; “Tractatus de multiplicatione specierum in visum secundum omnem modum”; “Ars musicae Wallerii de Evesham”; “Liber quintus geometricae per numeros loco quantitatum”; “Calendar for Evesham Abbey”.

EDWARD C. PHILIPS.

Odo, Saint, second Abbot of Cluny, b. 875 or 879, probably near Le Mans; d. 18 November, 942. He spent several years at the court of William, Duke of Aquitaine, and afterwards entered the Abbey of St. Martin at Tours. About this time he became a monk, priest, and superior of the abbey school in Baune, whose Abbot, Bl. Berno, was transferred to Cluny in 910. He became Abbot of Baune in 924, and Berno’s successor at Cluny in 927. Authorized by a privilege of John XI in 931, he reformed the monasteries in Aquitaine, northern France, and Italy. The privilege empowered him to unite several abbeys under his supervision and to receive from Cluny monks from abbeys not yet reformed; the greater number of the reformed monasteries, however, remained independent, and several became centres of reform. Between 936 and 942 he visited Italy several times, founding in Rome the monastery of Our Lady on the Aventine and reforming several convents, e.g. Subiaco and Monte Cassino. He was sometimes entrusted with important political missions, e.g. when peace was arranged between King Hugo of Italy and Albert of Rome. Among his writings are: a biography of St. Gerald of Aurillac, three books of Collationes (moral essays, severe and forceful), a few sermons, an epic poem on the Redemption (InQuestio), and seven books (ed. Schoenboda, 1900), and twelve choral anthems in honour of St. Martin.

KLEEMENS LÖFFLER.

Odo (Oda), Saint, Archbishop of Canterbury, d. 2 June, 959 (not in 938, recent researches showing that he was living on 17 May, 939). According to the nearly contemporary account of him in the anonymous “Life of St. Oswald” (op. cit. infra), his father, a Dane, did not strive to serve God, even endeavouring to hinder his son’s constant presence at the church. Later writers represent Odo’s parents as pagans and the boy himself as becoming a Christian despite his father’s anger. Odo was adopted by Æthelhelm, a nobleman, who received him with paternal affection and educated him for the service of God. After his ordination he accompanied Æthelhelm to Rome and on the way cured him when he fell ill, by blessing a cup of wine and causing him to drink therefrom. On his return, according to the same writer, he was made bishop of a city in the province of Wilton, so that he has been described as Bishop of Wilton, his consecration being placed in 920. There is no evidence for this date, if he was consecrated by Archbishop Wulfhelm, as is stated, it could not have been before 923. There is a further difficulty as to his diocese, erroneously called Wilton. In 927 he was Bishop of Ramsbury, which being in Wiltshire, his diocese was the Diocese of Wilton. But Eadmer states that he was appointed Bishop of Sherborne, and there is an extant document (Cart. Saxm. 606) which lends some support to this statement. If it be true, he must have filled the See of Sherborne, as he is said to have been bishop of that See before 924. Æthelbald and Sigehelm. As the latter was bishop in 925 this only allows two years for a possible episcopate of Odo. At the court of Athelstan (925-940) he was highly esteemed, and the monks, who accused him to the king’s nephew Lewis, whom the Frankish nobles had recently elected as their king. In 937 he accompanied Athelstan to the battle of Brunanburh, where the incident occurred of his miraculous restoration, at a critical moment, of the king’s lost sword. The story, given by Eadmer, is not mentioned by the earlier anonymous writer. When Archbishop Wulfhelm died in 942, King Eadmund wished Odo to succeed, but he refused, because he was not a monk as previous archbishops had been. Finally he accepted the election, but only after he had obtained the Benedictine habit from the Abbey of Fleury. One of his first acts as archbishop was to repair his cathedral at Canterbury, and it is recorded that during the three years that the works were in progress no storm of rain or wind made itself felt within the precincts. The constitutions which he published, e.g. “Constitutio Magna” (931-937), “Constitutio XVIII”; Migne, P. L., CXXXIII) relate to the immunities of the Church (cap. i), the respective duties of secular princes, bishops, priests, clerics, monks (ii), the prohibition of unlawful marriages, the preservation of concord, the practice of fasting and almsgiving, and the payment of tithes (vii-x). A synodal letter to his suffragan bishops, and an introduction to the life of St. Wilfrid, were also preserved. Throughout the reign of Eadred (946-955) he supported St. Dunstan, whom he consecrated as Bishop of Worcester, prophetically hailing him as future Archbishop of Canterbury. On the death of Eadred he crowned Eadwig as king. Shortly after the archbishop insisted on Eadwig dissolving his incestuous connexion with Ælfgifu and obtained her banishment. In 959 during the reign of Edgar, whom he had consecrated king, realizing the approach of death, he sent for his nephew, St. Oswald, afterwards Archbishop of York, but died before his arrival. He was succeeded by the simonical Ælfwine who insisted on his consecration, and whose secret was revealed to the people as a judgment of God. The next archbishop, St. Dunstan, held St. Odo in special veneration, would never pass his tomb without stopping to pray there, and first gave him the title of “the Good.” The story which represents Odo as having in early manhood followed the profession of arms is only found in later writers, such as William of Malmesbury. Even if it is true that Odo served Edward the Elder under arms, there is no reason to suppose, with the writer in the “Dictionary of National Biography”, that he did so after he became a cleric. God bade witness to his sanctity by miracles during his life and after his death.

EADMER, Vita Sancti Odonis (the earliest extant life), in WARBOROUGH, Annales Angliae Secundi, II, 78-87, also in MARSHALL, Acta SS. O.S.B., 1605, and in the Acta SS. of the Benedictines who attribute it to Osbern (July 11), but this is corrected in their Bibliotheca Historica Latina (Brussels, 1901), where the ascription to Eadmer is accepted. EDWIN BURTON.
Odo, Bishop of Bayeux and Count of Kent, b. in Normandy previous to 1003 d. at Palermo, February 1097. The son of Herluin de Conteville and Herleva de Falaise, previously by Duke Robert the mother of William the Bastard, from whom Odo about 7 October, 1049, received the See of Bayeux. He was present at the assembly of Lillebonne in 1056 at which William's expedition to England was decided upon; he built, at his expense at Port-en-Bassin, fifty or a hundred vessels, accompanied the soldiers, ex- hormone them on the eve of the battle of Hastings, in which he himself fought. William gave him the castle of Dover and the Earldom of Kent, and three months later when he returned to Normandy he left as his viceroys Odo and William FitzOsbern. Both were merciless in stifling the insurrection of the Saxons. On his return to England in December, 1067, William made Odo a sort of viceroy; he gave him domains in the county of Kent, and several churches and abbeys. Lanfranc, Archbishop of Canterbury, protested success- fully at the synod of 1072 against the spoliation of which he was the object; but Odo retained what he had taken from the Abbaye of Ramsey and Evesham. In 1080 he traversed Northumberland with an army, avenging the murder of Bishop Walcher of Durham; he multiplied his cruelties and was called the Great Tamer of the English.

He had the ambition to become pope. A soothsayer had foretold that the successor of Gregory VII should be called Odo. The latter first tried to seduce by his munificence the notables of Rome, where he built a palace; he then with Hugh, Count of Chester, and a number of knights he set out for Rome. William met him at Wight, brought him before his barons, and reproached him with his actions; as the barons refused to arrest the bishop, he declared that as count he would arrest him himself, and he brought him prisoner to Rouen. He refused to release him, despite the protests of Gregory VII. On his death-bed he granted this request reluctantly; for he feared that after his death this "wicked man would make trouble everywhere". Odo, according to Ordericus Vitalis, immediately plotted against the new king, William Rufus, his nephew; but in 1086, being besieged in Rochester, he was forced to accept as a grace the right to leave the town and depart from England. He established his credit in Normandy by the manner in which he as- sured to his nephew, Robert Courte Heuse, the pos- session of the city of Le Mans and defended his power against the bishops of Tournai. According to Ordericus Vitalis, in 1093 he blessed the inconsecution of Philip I of France, with Bertrade, Countess of Anjou, and obtained as a reward the revenues of the Church of Mantes. Urban II, at Dijon, absolved Odo. In 1095 he was present at the Council of Clermont at which the first Crusade was preached; he set out in September, 1096, but died at Palermo. Gilbert, Bishop of Eureux, and Count Roger of Sicily erected a tomb to him in the cathedral.

Despite the eulogies of William of Poitiers it may be said, without approving the severe judgment of Ordericus Vitalis, that the life of this prelate was scarcely that of a churchman. He even had a son, called John. Nevertheless his presence at the synods of Rouen of 1055, 1061, and 1063 is proved; on 14 July, 1077 he consecrated the cathedral of Bayeux; on 13 Sep- tember, 1077, he assisted at the dedication of the Church of St. Stephen in Caen, and on 23 October, at that of Notre Dame du Bec. He was zealous in obtaining relics. He educated, at his expense, a number of young men who benefited at the universities. He was liberal in his gifts to the Abbey of St. Augustine at Canterbury. It has been asserted that he placed in the cathedral the famous Bayeux tapestry, but a de- tail study of this tapestry has led Marigny to con- clude that it was composed according to the description and information contained in the "Roman du Rou" of Robert Wace, and that it was executed in the last thirty years of the twelfth century.

GEORGES GOTAU.

O'Donagheue, Denis. See Indianapolis, Dioce- se of.

O'Donell, Edmund, the first Jesuit executed by the English government; b. at Limerick in 1542, executed at Cork, 16 March, 1575. His family had held the highest civic offices in Limerick since the thir- teenth century, and he was closely related to Father David Wolfe, Pope Pius IV's legate in Ireland. He entered the Society of Jesus at Rome, 11 September, 1561, but, developing symptoms of phthisis, was re- moved to Flanders. In 1564 he returned to Limerick and taught, with a secular priest and a layman, in the school which Wolfe established with connivance of the civic authorities. The school was dispersed in October, 1565, by soldiers sent by Sir Thomas Cusack, and, for a short time, they taught at Kilmallock. In a few months they returned to Limerick, and were not molested again until 1568, when Brady, Protestant Bishop of Meath, visited the city as royal commis- sioner and made diligent search for them. O'Donell was ordered to quit the country under pain of death and withdrew to Lisbon, where he was again a student in 1572. Venturing back to Limerick in 1574 he was apprehended soon after landing, and thrown into prison. Rejecting all inducements to embrace Pro- testantism he was removed to Cork, tried for returning after banishment, denying the royal supremacy, and carrying letters for James Fitzmaurice. He was found guilty, and sentenced to be hanged, drawn and quartered. He has been called McDonnell, MacDonnell, Donelly, and MacDonough and Donagh. Father Edmund Hogan, S.J., Historiographer of the Irish province, found him recorded as Edmundus Daniell in the Society's archives, and so the name usually ap- pears in Limerick records, though he forbade O'Dinnell. Copinger and Bruden give the name as O'Donell (O'Donelhus). The archives and a con- temporary letter from Fitzmaurice confirm Bruden's and O'Donovan's positive assertion that he suffered in 1575, not in 1580 as generally stated.

O'Donovan, John, Irish historian and antiquarian, b. at Atateemore, County Kilkenny, Ireland, 1808; d. at Dublin, 9 Dec., 1861. Coming to Dublin in 1823, he was sent to a "Latin School" to prepare for entrance to Maynooth, but later his vocation for the priesthood turned his attention to the study of Irish. O'Donovan himself states that, at the age of nine years, he commenced the study of Irish and Latin, and that in 1819 he could "transcribe Irish pretty well". In Dublin he was soon employed by James Hardiman, antiquarian and historian, to transcribe Irish manuscripts, and through him was intro- duced to the Royal Irish Academy circle. Here he met Petrie, and the foundation of a lasting friendship was laid. Petrie's accurate antiquarian sense was supplemented by O'Donovan's knowledge of the native tongue and his ever-growing store of oral and written tradition. Aided by Sir Samuel Ferguson they helped to destroy the influence of the fanciful theories which then held the field, championed by Betham and Vallancey. An early example of O'Donovan's historical method is to be found in his edition and translation of the Charter of Newry (Dublin Penny Journal, 22 Sept., 1832). From this on he shared with his brother-in-law, Eugene O'Curry, an unbrokent position as supreme authority on the Irish language and Irish antiquities. He may be said to have been the mainspring of the archaeological societies and journals of his day—the Kilkenny Archaeological society, the Ulster Journal of Archaeology, and the Cork Society. The foundations of the Ordnance Survey Department of Ireland gave O'Donovan his chance. In Petrie's house, 21 Great Charles Street, the antiquarian section had its offices, and here O'Donovan had as colleagues, among others, Petrie, O'Curry, Mangan, and Wakeman. From the preparation of lists of names of townlands and places, O'Donovan was soon sent by Larcom, the head of the Ordnance Survey, to work "in the field".

From the various places throughout Ireland which he visited, he despatched in the form of letters to Larcom accounts of antiquities and traditions which, collected in 105 volumes and at present deposited in the Royal Irish Academy, Dublin, are popularly known as "O'Donovan's Letters". They are not heavy with mere erudition, but are enlivened with flashes of humorous anecdote and many a merry "sweat and crack and jest". He was engaged on the Survey from 1830 to 1842. In 1836 he commenced the catalogue of Irish MSS. in Trinity College; and to aid him in his work of editing and translating MSS., Todd brought to him aid from Government. It was refused, and was followed up by the suppression in 1842 of the archæological section of the Ordnance Survey. Private effort had therefore, to be relied upon, and with the assistance of the members of the Archæological Society and the Celtic Society, O'Donovan was able to publish his well-known editions of Irish texts with his invaluable introductions and notes. From 1842 till his death in 1861 no year passed without some noteworthy edition of an Irish text appearing from his hands. A complete bibliography of his works was published by Henry Dixon (Dublin). We can only refer to two of his works with which his name is popularly connected—his "Irish Grammar" and his edition and translation of the Annals of the Four Masters.

His grammar was published in 1845, and at once elicited the praise of Grimm, on whose recommendation he was elected corresponding member of the Royal Academy of Berlin, an honour which he shared with Zeuss whose epoch-making "Grammatik Celtica" appeared in that year. He was also appointed Professor of Celtic in Queen's College, Belfast. In 1848 appeared the first part of his edition of the Annals of the Four Masters (q.v.), which won for him the Cunningham Gold Medal of the Royal Irish Academy and the L.L.D. degree of Trinity College, Dublin. The edition was completed in 1851, and the Government bestowed on him a pension of £250 a year. O'Donovan had decided to go to America, but the establishment of the Brehon Law Commission helped to retain his services for Ireland. He continued his work on the Brehon Law Tracts till his death in Dublin from pulmonary fever, the tendency to which was due to exposure on the outdoor work of the Ordnance Survey.

PATRICK M. MACSWENNETT.

Odo of Cambrai, Bishop of Battle. d. 1200, known as Odo Cantianus or of Kent. A monk of Christ Church, he became subprior in 1163 and was sent by Thomas a Becket to Pope Alexander as his special representative to attend on 8 Oct. 1163, against the Archbishop of York who, in spite of the remonstrances of St. Thomas and the pope, still continued to carry the cross in the southern province. In 1166 Christ Church appealed against the archbishop and Odo applied to Richard of Lichester for help (Foliot, Ep. 422, in Migne). In 1167 he became prior with William as subprior. Until the murder of St. Thomas he seems to have wavered in his allegiance, between king and archbishop, but then took a decided stand in favour of ecclesiastical authority. On 1 Sept. 1172, in a meeting the monks of Christ Church put forward Odo as worthy of the archbishopric. The king however procrastinated, and no result followed a second meeting at Windsor (6 Oct.). Odo with other monks followed Henry to Normandy and urged that a monk should be chosen as archbishop (Mat. Becket., IV, 181). After protracted negotiations the choice fell upon Richard, Prior of Dover, formerly a monk of Canterbury, whose behalf Odo wrote to Alexander III (Migne, CC., 1396). In 1173 occurred a great fire at Christ Church and in 1156 a corresponding member of the Council of Woodstock on 1 July, 1175, to obtain a renewal of the charters on the model of those at Battle Abbey. St. Martin de Bello had been without an abbot for four years and the monks who attended the council caused Odo to be chosen. He was elected on 10 July. His blessing took place on 28 Sept., at the hands of Archbishop Richard at Malling. On the death of Richard (1184) the monks of Christ Church again put Odo forward for the archbishopric, but Henry again refused, fearing no doubt that he would be too inflexible for his purpose. Baldwin who was appointed quarreled with the monks, a dispute which lasted till 1188 and occasioned a correspondence between Odo and Urban III (Epp. Cantuar., no. 260). Odo died on 20 Jan., 1200, and was buried in the lower part of the church at Battle. Leland speaks of him as a most frugal man and a great friend of Theology, and John of Salisbury describes him as an ardent lover of books. He was a great theologian and preached in French, English, and Latin, and was noted for his humility and modesty. There is some uncertainty as to his writings, owing to a confusion with Odo of Cheriton and Odo of Munmuid, but a list of thirteen works, chiefly writings on the Old Testament and sermons, can be ascribed to him. He was venerated at Battle as a saint and in the helms of other manuscripts is called "a saint of the Ver. Odo Abb. of Battle" (Dart. Ap. XVII).

S. ANSELM PARKER.

Odo of Cheriton, preacher and fabulist, d. 1247. He visited Paris, and it was probably there that he gained the degree of Master. Bale mentions a tradition that he was a Cistercian or a Premonstratensian, but he can hardly have taken vows in, as seems most likely, he was the Master Odo of Cheriton mentioned in Kettish and London records from 1211 to 1247, the son of William of Cheriton, lord of the manor of Delece in Rochester. In 1211-12 William was debited with a fine to the crown, for Odo to have the custodia of Cheriton church, near Folkestone. In 1233 Odo inherited his father's estates in Delece, Cheriton, and elsewhere. A charter of 1235-6 (Brit. Mus., Harl. Ch. 49 B 45), by which he quitclaimed the rent of a shop in London, has its seal attached, bearing the figure of a monk seated at a desk, with a star above him (St. Odo of Chynny).

Like Jacques de Vitry, he introduced exempla freely into his sermons; his best known work, a collection of moralized fables and anecdotes, sometimes entitled "Parabolam" from the opening words of the prologue, (Aperitam in parabolam os meum), was evidently designed for preachers. Though partly composed of commonly known adaptations and extracts, it shows originality, and the moralizations are full of pungent denunciations of the prevalent vices of clergy and laity. The "Parabolam" exist in numerous manuscripts, and have been printed by Hervieux (Fabulistes Latins, IV, 173-235); a thirteenth century French translation is extant, also an early Spanish translation. Some of the contents reappear, along with many other exempla, in his sermons on the Sunday Gospels, completed in 1219, extant in several manuscripts; an abridgment of which, prepared by M. Makere, was printed by J. Badius Ascensis in 1520. The only other extant works, certainly authentic, are "Tractatus de Pernitentia", "Tractatus de Passione", and "Sermones de sanctis"; but the "Speculum Laeorum" also cites him as authority for many other exempla. Haurcq's contention (Journal des Savants, 1896, 111-123), that the fabulist was a distinct person from the author of the sermons and treatises, is not supported.

J. A. HERBERT.

Odo of Glanfeuil (Saint-Maur-sur-Loire), abbot, ninth-century hagiographer. He entered Glanfeuil not later than 856 and became its abbot in 861. In 864 he issued a "Life of St. Mauritius", a revision, he claimed, of a "Life" originally written by Faustus of Montecassino, which makes St. Mauritius the founder and first abbot of Glanfeuil, and is the chief source for the legendary sojourn of that saint in France. It is so anachronistic that it is generally believed to have been composed by Odo himself, though Mabillon and a few modern writers ascribe it to Faustus [Mabillon in "Annales O.S.B.", I, 629-54; and in "Acta SS. Ord. S. B." I, 230 sqq.; Addis in "Studien und Mitteilungen aus dem Benediktiner und Cistercienserorden", XXVI and XXVII (Brünn, 1905 and 1906); Plaine, ibid., X VI (1905); Huiller, "Etude critique des Actes de S. Maurit de Glanfeuil" (Paris, 1893); Halphen in "Revue historique", LXXXIII (Paris, 1896), 287-95]. The "Life" is printed in "Acta SS.", January, II, 321-332. Another work of Odo, "Miracula S. Mauritii, sive restauratio monasterii Glannolfensis", has some historical value. The author narrates how he fled with the relics of St. Mauritius from the Normans in 852 and how the relics were finally transferred to the monastery of St-Maur-des-Fossés near Paris in 868. It is printed in "Acta SS.", January, II, 353-42. In 868 Odo became also Abbot of St-Maur-des-Fossés.

O'Dugan, John (Seaghan "mör" O Dubhgháin), d. in Rosscommon, 1372. His family were for several centuries hereditary historians to the O'Kellys of Uí Mháine. His most important work is a compilation of verse, giving the names of the various tribes and territories of the Irish, and the various chiefs before the coming of the Norman. He devotes 152 lines to Meath, 354 to Ulster, 328 to Connaught, and only 56 to Leinster, leaving it evidently unfinished at his death. His contemporary, Gillaína na ndomh O Huidhin (Heerin), completed it. This work throws more light upon ancient Irish names and territories than any other similar work. In his monumental "Cambrensis Evocatus" (Dr. Lynch, p. v. says that he could not find any better source than this remarkable poem) concerning the chief Irish families before the coming of the English. His précis of it occupies pages 223-78 of the first volume of Seán Matthew Kelly's edition. O'Dugan was the author of several other extant poems, all more or less in the nature of a memoria technica, valuable chiefly for their facts about the kings of Ireland and of the provinces. He also composed several rules for determining movable feasts, etc.

O'Dwyer, Joseph, physician, inventor of intubation; b. at Cleveland, 1841; d. in New York, January 7, 1898. He was educated in the public schools of London, Ontario, and studied medicine in the office of Dr. Anderson. After two years of apprenticeship he entered the College of Physicians (New York) from which he was graduated in 1865. He won first place in the competitive examination for resident physicians of the Charity, now the City, Hospital of New York City on Blackwell's Island. Twice during his service he contracted cholera. After the completion of his service he took up private practice. Four years later (1872) he was appointed to the staff of the New York Foundling Asylum.

The deaths of many children by asphyxiation when diphtheria brought about closure of the larynx proved too sad a sight for him, so he tried to find something to keep the larynx open. He used a wire spring and experimented with a small bivalve speculum but to no avail. The solution of the problem was given when he was devising the form of tube that would remain and then ingeniously fashioned instruments for the placing and displacing of the tube. After a dozen years of diligent study this method of reliefting difficulty of breathing proved successful. Most of his medical colleagues were sure that O'Dwyer's scheme was visionary. Before his death it was universally acknowledged that he had made the most important practical discovery of his generation. His tubes and the accompanying instruments for intubation and extubation, with his methods for the care of these patients, have since continued to be employed everywhere throughout the medical world. The tubes are also of great value in stenosis of the larynx due to various other diseases, such as syphilis, and to strictures of the larynx, especially consequent on burns or scalds.

Afterwards O'Dwyer devoted himself to the study of pneumonia, but late in December 1897 he developed symptoms of a brain lesion, probably of infectious origin, which proved fatal. He was a fervent Catholic. His work at the Foundling Hospital helped greatly to make that institution one of the best of its kind.

JAMES J. WALSH.

Geolampadius, Johann, Protestant theologian, organiser of Protestantism at Basle, b. at Weinsberg, Swabia, in 1452; d. at Basle, 24 November, 1531. His family name was Huessen or Hüssen, not Hucshyn (Hausseck), as the hellenized form Geolampadius was later rendered. Having received a preliminary cleralic training at Weinsberg and Heilbronn; he began the study of law at Bologna, but left for Heidelberg in 1499 to take up theology and literature. He was specially interested in the works of the mystics, without obtaining, however, a thorough foundation in Scholastic theology. At Heilbronn he took the study of law at Bologna, but left for Heidelberg in 1499 to take up theology and literature. He was specially interested in the works of the mystics, without obtaining, however, a thorough foundation in Scholastic theology. At Heilbronn, he became acquainted with Brenz and Capito. A little later he was appointed preacher at the cathedral of Basle (1518), where he joined the circle of Erasmus. In 1515 he was made a bachelor, in 1516 licentiate, and on 9 September, 1518, a doctor of theology. He had already resided as preacher at Basle and returned to Weinsberg. In December, 1518, he became cathedral preacher at Augsburg, where he joined the Humanists who sympathized with Luther. He corresponded with Luther and Melanchthon, and directed against Eck the anonymous pamphlet "Ca- nonicum resolutum Lutheri et Melanchthonis". Lampeadius, however, far from having taken a definite stand, was engaged in translating the ascetical writings of St. Gregory of Nazianzus from Greek into Latin.

Suddenly he entered the Brigitten monastery at Allomünster (23 April, 1520). He first thought of devoting himself to study in this retreat, but was soon again enlaged in controversy, when, at the request of Bernhard Adelmann, he wrote his opinion of Luther, which was very favourable, and sent it in confidence to Adelmann at Augsburg. The latter, however, forwarded it to Capito at Basle and he, without asking the author's permission, published it (Geolampadius in judicium de doctore Martino Luther). This was followed by other uncanonical writings, e.g. one against the doctrine of the Church on confession (Augsburg, 1521) and a sermon on the Holy Eucharist (Augsburg, 1521) dealing with transubstantiation as a question of no importance and repudiating the sacrificial character of the Eucharist; these publications finally rendered his position in the monastery untenable. He left Basle, February, 1522, supplied by the community with money for his journey. Through the influence of Franz von Sieckingen he became chaplain in the castle of Ehrenburg. In November of the same year he removed to Basle. He publicly defended Luther's doctrine of justification by faith alone (30 August, 1532). The following February he advocated the mar-riage of priests and used his pulpit to disseminate the new teachings. The progress of Protestantism became much more marked in Basle after the Council had appointed him pastor of St. Martin's (February, 1525), on condition that he should introduce no innovations into Divine service without special authorization of the council, which included Catholics as well as Re- formers, and was still cautious; the spread of the new teachings was partially counteracted by the bishop and the university, which, for the greater part, was still Catholic in its tendency.

After Karlstadt's writings had been proscribed by the Basle Council, Geolampadius, in August, 1525, issued his "De genuina verborum Domini: Hoc est corpus meum, iuxta vetustissime dispositione liber", in which he declared openly for Zwingli's doctrine of the Last Supper, construing as metaphorical the words of institution. The distinction between his explanation and Zwingli's was merely formal. Ge- lampadius, instead of eis interpreted the word corpus figuratively (corpus—figura corporis). Accordingly the last Supper was to him merely an external symbol, which the faithful should receive, less for their own sakes than for the sake of their neighbours, as a token of brotherhood and a means of edification. This monograph was confecrated at Basle, and attacked by Brenz on behalf of the Lutheran theologians, especially in his "Syngramma Suevium" (1525), which (Geolampadius answered with his "Antisyngramma ad ecclesiastes Suevos" (1526). Although Geolampadius had continued to say Mass until 1525, in November of that year he conducted his first "reformation of the Lord's Supper with a liturgy compiled by himself. In 1526 he arranged an order of Divine service under the title "Form und Gestalt, wie der Kirchenzürn und der Humanen Heimsuchung jetzt zu Basel von ethlichen Predikanten gehalten werden". In May, 1526, he took part in the disputation at Baden, but in Zwingli's absence he was unable to cope successfully with his adversaries. In May, 1527, the Council of Basle requested the Catholic and Protestant preachers of the city to give in their views concerning the Mass. The Catholic belief was represented by Augustin Maris, the Protestant by Geolampadius. The Council as yet placed no general proscription on the Mass, but allowed each of the clergy to retain or set it aside. In consequence the Mass was abolished in the churches under Protestant preaching and the singing of psalms in German introduced. Monasteries were suppressed towards the end of 1527. The ancient Faith was, however, tolerated for a time in the churches under Catholic control.

After the disputation at Bern in January, 1528, in which Geolampadius and Zwingli were chief speakers on the Protestant side, the Protestants of Basle threw caution to the winds; at Easter, 1528, and later, several churches were despoiled of their statues and pictures. In December, 1528, at the instance of Geolampadius, the Protestant council petitioned the Council to suppress Catholic worship, but, as the Council was too slow in deciding, the Protestantizing of Basle was com- pleted by means of an insurrection. The Protestants expelled the Catholic members of the Council. The churches previously in the hands of the Catholics, including the cathedral, were seized and pillaged. Geolampadius, who had married in 1528, became pastor of the cathedral and antistes over all the Protestant clergy of Basle, and took the leading part in compiling the Reformation ordinance promulgated by the Council (1 April, 1529). Against those who refused to participate in the Protestant celebration of the Last Supper, compulsory measures were enacted which broke down the last remnant of opposition from the Catholics. In contrast to Zwingli, Geolampadius strove, but with only partial success, to secure for the representatives of the Church a greater share in its management. In October, 1529, Geolampadius joined in the vain attempt at Marburg to close the sacramental dispute between the Lutherans and the Reformed. In 1531, with Bucer and Blarer, he introduced Protestantism by force into Ulm, Biberach, and Memmingen. He was also concerned in the affairs of the universities, and was largely responsible for their having joined forces with the Reformed at this time.

Ecolampadius was a man of splendid, though mis-directed, natural gifts. Among the fathers and leaders of Protestantism he had not, either as theologian or as man of action, the importance of Zwinglei, but his name stands among the first of their supporters. As a theologian, after the full development of his religious opinions, he belonged to the party of Zwingli, though remaining dependent on some important points. The opinion that he was more tolerant than the other Protestant leaders does not accord with facts, though true on the whole as regards his relations to Protestants of other beliefs. The profound differences which had already appeared among the adherents of the new religion, due particularly to variations in opinion concerning the Lord's Supper, were painful to Ecolampadius; but in contrast to Luther's uncompromising attitude, he strove without surrendering his own views to restore harmony through reciprocal toleration. Towards the Catholic religion, however, he bore the same hatred and intolerance as the other Protestant leaders. Likewise in justifying religious war, he shares Zwinglei's standpoint. If his first movements at Basle were more cautious than those of others elsewhere, it was not through greater mildness, but rather out of regard for conditions which he could not change at a single stroke. As soon, however, as he had won over the secular authority, he did not rest until Catholic worship was suppressed, and those who at first resisted were either banished or forced to apostatize.

FRIEDRICH LAUTRECHT.

ECONOMUS, EPISCOPAL (Gr. εκονομός from εἰσεῖν
a hērēstei, and ἑρωθοῦν, to distribute, to administer) (1) one who is charged with the care of a house, an ad-imistrator. In canon law this term designates the individual who is appointed to take charge of the temporal goods of the Church in a diocese; it is used also of the person in charge of the property of a monastery.
This office originated in the Eastern Church and dates back to the fourth century: εαυτος of Honorius and Aecadius in 398 speaks of it as if it were then widespread (Cod. Theodos. IX, tit. 45, lex. 3). The Council of Chalcedon (451) ordered an economist to be appointed in every diocese, to take charge of ecclesiastical property under episcopal authority (canon, v, xi, 307). They were established in the Eastern Church and have continued down to the present day in the schismatic Greek Church (Silbermand, 'Verfassung und gegenwärtiger Bestand des orthodoxen Antistes', 2nd ed., Ratisbon, 1904, 37). The increase of church property after the Edict of Milan (313) and the multiplication of episcopal duties rendered this office very useful; we meet with the economist in Spain (Council of Seville, 619, can. ix), in Sardinia, and perhaps in Sicily, at the end of the sixth century (Jaffé-Wattenbach, "Regesta Pontificum Romanorum", Leipiz, 1881, i, pp. 1282, 1915). But a general rule the Western bishops contented themselves with the aid of a confidential assistant, a vicocolinus, who looked after the temporalities and ranked next to the bishop. The establishment of diocesan churches in connexion with each church made the task of administering the ecclesiastical property much lighter. The office of vicocolinus was modified by the influence of the feudal system, and by the fact that the bishops betook charge of temporal sovereigns. The Council ordered the chapters of cathedral churches to establish,
addition to a capitulary vicar, one or more economi-
administer the temporal property of the diocese during an episcopal vacancy (Sese. XXIV, De Reformatione, c. xvi). At the present time, the bishop is not obliged to appoint an economist, though he is not hindered from so doing. The Second Plenary Council of Baltimore (c. lxxv) advises bishops to select one from among the ecclesiastics or even the laity,
who is skilled in the civil law of the country.

ECONOMICAL COUNCIL. See COUNCILS, GENERAL.

ECONOMUS (εκονομός), Bishop of Trikka (now Trikaka) in Thessaly about 900 (according to Cave, op. cit. infra, p. 112). He is the reputed author of commentaries on books of the New Testament.

A manuscript of the tenth or eleventh century contains a commentary on the Apocalypse attributed to him.
The work consists of a prologue and then a slightly modified version of the commentary of Andrew of Cesarea (sixth cent.). Manuscripts of the eleventh century contain commentaries on the Acts and on the Catholic and Pauline epistles, attributed since the sixteenth century to Economus. Those on the Acts and Catholic Epistles are identical with the commentaries of Theophylact of Achrida (eleventh cent.);
the Pauline commentaries are a different work, though they too contain many parallel passages to Theophylactus. The first manuscripts, however, are older than Theophylactus, so that it cannot be merely a false attribute of his work. It would seem then that Economus copied Andrew of Cesarea and was himself copied by Theophylactus. The situation is however, further complicated by the fact that the authors quoted in these works the name of Economus himself occurs repeatedly. The question then of Economus's authorship is in all cases very difficult.

Bardenhewer (Kirchenlex., IX, 1905, col. 706-709) is doubtful about it; Ehrhard (in Krummacher's "By-sant. Lit." 132) says: "The name Economus represents in the present state of investigation a riddle that can be solved only by thorough critical study of the manuscripts in connexion with the whole question of the Catena." The commentary on St. Paul's Epistles is a compromise between the usual kind of commentary and a catena. Most explanations are given without reference and are therefore presumably those of the author; but there are also long excerpts from earlier writers, Clement of Alexandria, Eusebius, Chrysostom, Cyril of Alexandria etc., especially from Photius. It is a mere that Economus himself is quoted.
The Commentary on the Apocalypse was first edited by Cramer: "Catena in Nov. Test.", VIII (Oxford, 1840), 497-583; the other three (on Acts, translation; his edition is reproduced in P. G.,

Oortel, John James Maximilian, journalist, b. at Ansbach, Bavaria, 27 April, 1811; d. at Jamaica, New York, 21 August, 1882. Born a Lutheran, he was sent to the Lutheran University of Erlangen where he studied theology and five years later was ordained a minister. After his ordination he accepted a call to care for his countrymen in the United States, and arrived in New York in October, 1837. The unorthodox character of his New York Lutherans displeased him, and he left for Missouri early in 1839. Things were not better there, so he returned to New York. Denominational dissensions weakened his faith, and in 1840 he became a Catholic. An account of his conversion in pamphlet form published 25 March, 1850, had quite a vogue in the controversial literature of the day. After his conversion he taught German at St. John's College, Fordham; later he edited in Cincinnati the "Wahrheitfreund", a German Catholic weekly, and in 1846 he left for Baltimore where he founded the weekly "Kirchenzeitung", which, under his editorial direction, was the most prominent German Catholic publication in the United States. In 1851, he moved the paper to New York. In 1859 he published "Alteu und Neues". In 1875 Pius IX made him a Knight of St. Gregory in recognition of his service to the Catholic literature. U. S. Cat. Oettingen (Altötting, Oettinga), during the Carlingovian period a royal palace near the confluence of the Ison and the Inn in Upper Bavaria, near which King Otto I founded a Benedictine monastery in 876, with Werinolf as first abbot, and also built the abbey church in honour of the Apostle St. Philip. In 907 King Louis the Child, gave the abbey in commendam to Bishop Burchard of Passau (905-916), probably identical with Burchard, second and last abbot. In 910 the Hungarians ransacked and burnt the church and abbey. In 1228 Duke Louis I of Bavaria rebuilt them and put them in charge of twelve Augustinian Canons and a provost. The Augustinians remained until the secularization of the Bavarian monasteries in 1803. Under their care was also the Liebfrauen-Kapelle with its miraculous image of Our Lady, dated from the end of the thirteenth or the beginning of the fourteenth century. The pilgrims became so numerous that to aid the Augustinian Canons the Jesuits erected a house in 1591 and remained until the suppression of their order in 1773. Franciscans settled there from 1653 to 1803; from 1803 to 1844 the Capuchins and some secular priests, from 1844 to 1873 the Redemptorists had charge, and since 1872 the Capuchins. About 300,000 pilgrims come annually. Since the middle of the seventeenth century the hearts of the deceased Bavarian princes are preserved in the Liebfrauen-Kapelle.

Ofeta, King of Mercia, d. 29 July, 796. He was one of the leading figures of Saxon history, as appears from the real facts stripped of all legend. He obtained the throne of Mercia in 757, after the murder of his cousin, King Æthelbald, by Beornred. After spending fourteen years in consolidating and ordering his territories he engaged in conquests which made him the most powerful king in England. In 775 he made war on the Huns, with the result that England was divided into three political divisions, Northumbria, Mercia, and Wessex. His next step was to complete the independence of Mercia by inducing the pope to erect a Mercian archbishopric. With the aid of a mercenary from the jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Canterbury. Hadrian I sent two legates, George and Theophylactus, to England to arrange for the transfer of five suffragan sees of Canterbury (viz. Worceter, Hereford, Sligo, Ely, and Dunwich) to the new Archdiocesan of Lichfield, of which Higbert was first archbishop. This was effected at the Synod of Celchyn (787), at which Offa granted the pope a yearly sum equal to one mance a day for the relief of the poor and for lights to be kept burning before St. Peter's tomb. At the same time he associated his son Ecfrith with him in the kingship. He preserved friendly relations with Charlemagne, who undertook to protect the English pilgrims and merchants who passed through his territories. Many charters granting lands to various monasteries are extant, and, though some are forgeries, enough are genuine documents to show that he was a liberal benefactor to the Church. The laws of Offa are not extant, but were embodied by Alfred in his later code. The chief stain on his character is the execution of Æthelbert, King of the East Angles, in 796. In all other respects he showed himself a great Christian king and an able and enlightened ruler.

Offerings (Oblations).—I. The word oblation, from the supine of the Latin verb offerro ("to offer"), is etymologically skin to offering, but is, unlike the latter, almost exclusively restricted to meats or religious gifts. In the English Bibles "oblation", "offering", "gift", "sacrifice" are used indiscriminately for anything presented to God in worship, or for the service of the temple or priest. This indiscriminate use of the words arises from the fact that these words do not purport to render always the same Hebrew expressions. The latter, moreover, are not distinctly specific in their meaning. In this article oblations will be considered in the narrow sense the term has tended to assume of vegetable or lifeless things offered to God, in contradistinction to "bloody sacrifices".

Oblations of this kind, like sacrifices, were found in all ancient Semitic religions—in fact in a world-wide and ever-existing institution. Various theories have been proposed to explain how offerings came to be a part of worship. Unfortunately very many modern scholars assume that mankind began in the savage state. According to one theory, the god being considered the first owner of the land, it was inferred he had a claim to a tribute from the increase of the land; this is the tribute theory. It relies on the fact that the offering of first-fruits is one of the earliest forms of obligations found among ancient peoples. The assumption that primitive men conceived deity under low anthropomorphic forms is the source whence the idea of offering to the god has sprung the gift theory. After the gift the idea of the communion theory. According to the first of these systems, the god is approached through presents which the worshipper counts on to insure favour (Ἡφα τὸ πρόθερον, τῷ θεῷ ἀνάκοινον). That such
The offering of the divinity was prevalent at certain epochs and among certain peoples not so much as milk among the Phenicians, as among nomadic Arabs it is to this very day. Libations of wine were frequent, at least in countries where wine was not too expensive: among the Hebrews, as in Greece and Rome, wine was added to holocausts as well as to victims whose flesh was consumed. The altar was constructed of stones and was then poured out at the base of the altar.

As far as positive information is concerned, the origin of oblations, according to Seder. Cohen, may be traced back to Cain's offerings of the fruits of the earth. Some critics would brush aside the statement as the fancy of a Hebrew writer of the seventh century B.C.: yet the passage expresses the idea that sacrifices and oblations were offered by the very first men. It emphasizes, moreover, the idea that oblation is an act of worship natural to an agricultural population, just as the slaying of a victim is to be expected in the worship of a pastoral people. The belief that bloody sacrifices are more pleasing to God than mere oblations—a belief seemingly inspired by the supremacy the nomad has ever claimed in the East over the bolderman, and it is placed at the head of the government of Jove. Whether exterior worship, especially sacrifice, was in the beginning, as W. R. Smith affirms, an affair, not of the individual, but of the tribe or clan, is questionable. As far as the name goes, side by side with public oblations, are others made by individuals in their own name and out of private devotion.

The things thus made over to the deity were among Semitic peoples most varied in nature and value. Offerings of the first year's crop were especially practised, local usage specifying what should be offered. The produce of the corn crop (wheat, barley, sometime lentils), were generally reserved to the deity; so also among certain tribes the first milk and butter of the year. Sometimes fruits (not only first-fruits, but other fruit-oblations) were offered in their natural state. At Carthage the fruit-offering consisted of a choice branch bearing fruit; possibly such was the form of certain fruit-offerings in Israel. Oblations might also consist of fruit prepared as for ordinary use, in compressed cakes, cooked if necessary, or made the form of jelly (lobosh). The latter preparation was exclusively reserved to the altar in Israel. All cereal oblations, whether of first-fruit or otherwise, among the Hebrews and apparently among the Phoenicians, were mingled with oil and salt before being placed on the altar. As sacrifices were frequently the occasion of social gatherings and of religious meals, the custom was introduced of offering with the victim whatever concomitants (bread, wine, etc.) were necessary. Yet nowhere do we find water offered up as an oblation or used for libations; only the ritual of late Judaism for the Feast of Tabernacles commanded that on each of the seven days of the celebration water drawn from the Fountain of Siloam (O. W. Sellham) should be brought into the Temple amidst the blare of trumpets and solemnly poured out upon the altar. Other articles of food were used for libations, such as, for instance, as milk among the Phenicians, as among nomadic Arabs it is to this very day. Libations of wine were frequent, at least in countries where wine was not too expensive: among the Hebrews, as in Greece and Rome, wine was added to holocausts as well as to victims whose flesh was consumed. The altar was constructed of stones and was then poured out at the base of the altar.

Analogous to offering liquid food to be poured out as a libation was the custom of anointing sacred objects or hollowed trees. The statue of the patriarch bears witness to its primitive usage, and the accounts of travellers certify to its existence to-day among many Semitic populations. In this case, oil is generally used: occasionally more precious ointments, as well as these largely contain oil. The difference in hair, dental. Among nomads where oil is scarce, butter is used, being spread on sacred stones, tombs, or on the door-posts or the lintels of venerated shrines. In some places oil is offered by way of fuel for lamps to be kept burning before the tomb of some renowned wise or in some sanctuary. Also it has always been a general custom in the East to offer, either together with, or apart from, sacrifices, spices to be burned at the place of the sacrifice or of the sacrificial meal, or upon a revered tomb, or at any place sacred to the tribe or individual. Among the Arabs it is hardly justifiable to pray religious honours to the tomb of some saintedGet hit at certain sanctuaries without bringing an offering, however insignificant. If nothing better is at hand, the worshipper will leave on the spot a 'strip from his garment, a horse-shoe nail, even a pebble from the roadside. From this hair-offering we should distinguish the shaving of the head as a kind of purification prescribed in certain cases (Lev., xiv. 9.). Owing undoubtedly to the superstitions of ancient peoples, associated with mourning, the law, as far as it goes, would no longer allow of the offering of human hair, a practice very common among other ancient peoples. This offering was a personal one, and aimed at creating or emphasizing the relation between the worshipper and his god; it was usually in connexion with special vows. From this hair-offering we should distinguish the shaving of the head as a kind of purification prescribed in certain cases (Lev., xiv. 9.).

Besides the offerings mentioned above (usually articles of food), the votive offerings made among early Semites on very special occasions deserve mention. One of the most characteristic is the offering once a year of a portion of the first-year's produce. This offering was a personal one, and aimed at creating or emphasizing the relation between the worshipper and his god; it was usually in connexion with special vows. From this hair-offering we should distinguish the shaving of the head as a kind of purification prescribed in certain cases (Lev., xiv. 9.). of meal, oil, and incense that accompanied the daily holocaust. A handful of this meal-offering mingled with oil was burned on the altar together with incense, and the remainder was allotted to the priests, to be eaten unleavened within the temple precincts (Lev., vi, 14-18; Num., vi, 14-16). In peace-offerings, together with the victim, loaves, wafers, and cakes of flour kneaded with oil, and loaves of leavened bread were presented to the Temple (the loaves of leavened bread were not to be put or burned upon the altar); one cake, one wafer, and one loaf of each kind was the share of the officiating priest (Lev., vii, 11-14; ii, 11). Among the regulations for the sacrifice of thanksgiving to be offered by lepers on their recovery was one that the cleansed, if they had the means, should add to the victims three-tenths of an ephah (the ephah of the second Temple contained about three pecks, dry measure, the old measure being possibly twice as large) of meal tempered with oil; if they were poor, one tenth of an ephah was sufficient (Lev., xiv, 10, 21). Finally the sacrifice of the Nazarite included a basketful of unleavened bread tempered with oil and cakes of like kind, together with the ordinary libations.

For public oblations separate from sacrifices see FIRST-FRUITS; LOAVES OF PROPOSITION; TITHES. More poor, and the remainder was burnt on the altar in his own name and that of the other priests an oblation of one tenth of an ephah (half in the morning and half in the evening) of meal kneaded with oil, to be burned on the altar (Lev., vi, 19-22; cf. Jos., "Aub. Jud.", III, x, 7).

Of these oblations was prescribed by Law. The priest, on entering upon his ministry, offered an oblation, the same in kind and quantity as the daily oblation of the high priest (Lev., vi, 20, 21). A man obliged to a sin-offering, and too poor to provide a victim, was allowed to present an oblation of one tenth of an ephah of flour without the accompaniments of oil and incense (Lev., v, 1-4, 11, 12). A woman accused of adultery was subjected to a trial during which an offering of one tenth of an ephah of barley-flour without oil or incense was made, a part being burned on the altar, in order that the false witness who had made a false accusation might be burnt. The regulations of the Pentateuchal Law concerning oblations were scrutinized and commented upon by Jewish doctors who took up every possible difficulty likely to occur, from the nature of the offering, its origin, preparation, and cooking of the flour to be used, its buying and measuring, the mode of presenting, receiving, and offering the oblation, its division and the attributing of each of the parts (see the forty-second treatise of the Mishna: "Menahoth"). Of these commentaries we will single out only those concerned with the rite to be observed in offering the oblations, because they are the only somewhat reliable explanations of difficult expressions occasioned met with in Holy Writ (D. V.: "to elevate", "to separate", Lev., vii, 34; x, 15, etc.). When an Israelite presented an oblation, the priest was to meet him at the gate of the priests' court; he put his hands under the hands of the offerer, who held oblation, and drew the offerer's hands and the oblation first backwards, then forwards (this was the thersaph, improperly rendered "the separation""); again upwards and downwards (therumah, "the elevation"). These rites were not observed in the oblations by women or Gentiles. The first-fruits offered at the Pasch and the "oblation of jealousy" (on the occasion of an accusation of adultery) were moved about in the manner described, then brought to the south-west corner of the altar; the first-fruits offered at the Pentecost and the log (2 3 of a pint) of oil presented by the leper were subject to the thersaph and the therumah, but not brought to the altar; the sin-offering, the oblations of the priests, and the freewill oblations were only brought directly to the altar; lastly the loaves of proposition were neither "separated" and "elevated" not brought to the altar.

III. OBLATIONS AMONG CHRISTIANS.—Like many Jewish customs, that of offering to the Temple the matter of the sacrifices and other oblations was adapted by the early Christian community to the new order of things. First in importance among these Christian oblations is that of the matter of the Eucharistic sacrifice. Not only the laity, but the whole clergy, bishops, and pope himself included, had to make this offering. These oblations were collected by the officiating bishop assisted by priests and deacons at the beginning of the "Missa Fidelium", after the dismissal of the non-communicants. This collection, at first performed in silence, was, towards the beginning of the fifth century, made amidst the singing of a Psalm, known in Rome as the "Offertorium", at Milan as the "Offerenda", and in Greek churches as the "Cherubikon" (our Offertory is a remnant of the old "Offertorium", curtailed by reason of the actual gathering of the oblations falling into disuse). Part of the oblations was destined for consecration and communication (cf. the French word offrande applied to the matter of the Eucharist). The subdeacon in charge of this part is called in certain "Ordines Romani" the "oblationarius". Another part was destined for the poor at the clergy. So it was this offering held, that the word oblatio came to designate the whole liturgical service. Apart from this liturgical oblation, which has been preserved, at least partly, in the liturgy of Milan and in some churches of France, new private oblations were presented at Mass for blessing, a custom somewhat analogous to the first-fruits offerings in the Old Law; this usage is still in vigour in parts of Germany where, at Easter, eggs are solemnly blessed; but, contrary to Hebrew customs, the Christians usually retained the full disposition of these articles of food. Very early offerings were made over to the Church for the support of the poor and of the clergy. St. Paul emphasized the right of ministers of the Gospel to live by the Gospel (1 Cor., ix, 13-14), and he never tired of reminding the churches founded by him of their duty to supply the wants of poorer communities. Here, within the limits of each community, the poor were cared for we catch a glimpse of in the records of the early Church of Jerusalem (institution of the deacons); that in certain Churches, as the Church of Rome, the oblations for the poor required a fair amount, from the prominence of the deacons, an illustration of which we have in the history of St. Lawrence, and in the fact that the pope was usually chosen from among them.

In time of persecution, manual offerings were sufficient to support the clergy and the poor; but when peace had come, Christians felt it a duty to insure this support by means of foundations. Such donations multiplied, and the word "oblations" (usually in the plural number) came to mean in Canon Law any property, real or personal, made over to the Church.

Offertory (offertorium), the rite by which the bread and wine are presented (offered) to God before they are consecrated and the prayers and chant that accompany it.
I. HISTORY.—The idea of the preparatory blessing of the sacred vessels by offering the bread and wine to God, and the consecration of the Mass by the priest, as set forth in the rule of the Church, is that of every Christian Church. In the earliest period we have no evidence of anything but the offering of the bread and wine on the altar, as we are taught by the Church herself. The priest, after he has要做好圣祭的事，便将圣祭的东西，如饼和酒，放在圣祭台上，然后将它们献给天主和信徒以圣祭，然后便举行圣祭。The Library of "Apost. Const.," VIII, 4, says: "The ceremony of bringing the gifts to the bishop and the other priests is to be found in the Mass of the time of the Emperor Constantine." All Eastern and the old Gallican rites prepare the gifts before the Mass begins. This ceremony was especially elaborate in the Byzantine and the Eastern rites. It takes place on the thrones. The bread and wine are arranged, divided, increased; and many prayers are said over them involving the idea of an offertory. The gifts are laid on the thrones and are handed to the altar in solemn procession at the beginning of the Liturgy of the Faithful. There is no room for another offertory then. However, when they are placed on the altar, prayers are said by the celebrant and a litany by the deacon, which latter repeats the idea of the oblation. The deacon has kept the older custom of one offertory and of preparing the gifts when they are wanted at the beginning of the Mass of the Faithful. Originally at this time of the people brought up bread and wine which were received by the deacons and placed on the altar. Traces of the custom remain at a papal Mass and at Milan. The office of the offertory in the Roman Missal is an oblation of the faithful. In the Middle Ages, as the public presentation of the gifts by the people had disappeared, there seemed to be a need for something which was filled by our present Offertory prayers (Benedicte, op. cit., below, II, 101). For a long time these prayers were considered a private devotion of the priest, like the preparation of the foot of the altar. They are a Northern Gallican addition, not part of the old Roman Rite, and were at first not written in missals. Mierologus says: "The Roman order appointed no prayer after the Offertory before the Secret." (Cf., P. L., CII, 984.) He mentions the later Offertory prayers as a "Gallican order" and says that they occur "not from any law but as an ecclesiastical custom." The medieval Offertory prayers vary considerably. They were established at Rome by the fourteenth century (Ordo Rom. XIV, 55, P. L., LVIII, 1105). The present Roman Missal was approved from various sources, mainly Gallican or Mozarabic. The prayer "Suscipe sancte pater" occurs in the Gallican Missal (647-677) prayer book, "Deus qui sustineas substantia" is modified from the Collect in the Gregorian Sacramentary (P. L., LXXVIII, 32); "Officium tibi Domine" and "Veni sanctificator" (fragment of an old Epikle-

sa. Hoppe, Die Epiklese, Schahausen, 1884, p. 26). The Mass of Pius IV (1565) inserted these prayers, called "offertoria," in the "Offizium," as amplifications of the Secret. The Mass of Pius V (1570) inserted them in the Ordinary. Since then the prayers have formed part of the Roman Missal. The ideas expressed in their text are obvious. Only it may be noted that two expressions: "nasci immaculatum bos- tum" and "sanctificat tuum" dramatically anticipate the moment of consecration, as does the Byzantine Ceremonials.

While the Offertory is made the people (choir) sing a verse of the Offertory in the sense of a text to be sung that forms part of the Proper of the Mass. No such chant is mentioned in "Apost. Const.," VIII, 4, but it may no doubt be supposed as the reason why the celebrant there too prays silently. It is referred to by St. Augustine in the Mass for the feast or occasion of the Mass, never to the offering of bread and wine. Only the requiem has preserved a longer Offertory chant, the requiem has kept the older custom of one Offertory and of preparing the gifts when they are wanted at the beginning of the Mass of the Faithful. Originally at this time the people brought up bread and wine which were received by the deacons and placed on the altar. Traces of the custom remain at a papal Mass and at Milan. At low Mass, the parts of the deacon and subdeacon are taken partly by the server and partly by the celebrant himself. There is no incense. At requiem Masses, the water is not blessed, and the subdeacon does not hold the paten. The Dominicans still prepare the offering before Mass begins. This is one of their Gallican peculiarities and so goes back to the Eastern Praecones. The Milanese and Mozarabic Missals have adopted the Roman Offertory. The accompanying chant is called Sacrificium at-Toledo.

Office, Divine.—I. The expression "Divine Office," signifying etymologically a duty accomplished for God, or in virtue of a Divine precept, means, in ecclesiastical language, certain prayers to be recited at fixed hours of the day or night by priests, religious, or clergy, and, in general, by all those obliged by their vocation to fulfill this duty. The Divine Office comprises only the recitation of certain prayers in the Breviary, and does not include the Mass and other liturgical ceremonies. "Canons," "Hymns," "Breviaries," "Diurnal and Nocturnal Office," "Ecclesiastical Office," "Cursus ecclesiasticus," or simply "curses" are synonyms of "Divine Office." "Cursus" is the form used by Gregory writing: "exercitata ab omnibus sacrificiis et sacrificiis, ad sacrificium eorum, quotannis tamen, (De glor. marty., xv)." "Agenda," "agenda mortuorum," "agenda missarum," "solemnitates," "missae" were also used. The Greeks employ "synaxis" and "canon" in this sense. The expression "officium divinum" is used in the same sense by the Council of Aix-la-Chapelle (800), the IV Lateran (1215), and Vienne (1311); but it is also used to signify any office of the Church. Thus Walfrid Strabo, Pseudo-Aleuin, Rupert de Duy entitled their works on liturgical ceremonies "De officii divinii". Hittorp, in the sixteenth century, entitled his collection of medieval liturgical works "De Catholic Ecclesiis divinis officiis ministrantes" (Cologne, 1568). The usage in France of the expression "saint-office" as synonymous with "office divin" is not correct. "Saint-office" signifies a Roman congregation, the functions of which are well known, and the words should not be used to replace the name "Divine Office," which is much more suitable and has been used from ancient times. In the articles Breviary; Hours, Canonical; Matins; Prime; Terce; Sext; None; Vespers, the reader will find treated the special questions concerning the meaning and history of each of the hours, the obligation of reciting these prayers, the history of the formation of the Breviary etc. We deal here only with the general questions that have not been dwelt on in those articles.

II. Primitive Form of the Office.—The custom of reciting prayers at certain hours of the day or night, has always existed. The Jews, at least, have borrowed it. In the Psalms we find expressions like: "I will meditate on thee in the morning;" "I rose at midnight to give praise to thee;" "Evening and morning, and at noon I will speak and declare; and he shall hear my voice;" "Seven times a day I have given praise to thee," etc. (Cf. "Jewish Encyclopedia", X, 164-171, s. v. "Praeceptio"). The Apostles observed the Jewish custom of praying at midnight, terce, sexta, none, and vesperae atque galli cantu" (VIII, iv). Such were the hours as they then existed. There are omitted only Prime and Complin, which originated not earlier than the end of the fourth century, and the use of which spread only gradually. The elements of these hours were composed at first few in number, identical with those of the Mass of the Catechumens, psalms recited or chanted uninterruptedly (tract) or by two choirs (antiphons) or by a cantor alternating with the choir (responsum and versicles); les-Office of the Dead.—I. Composition of the Office.

The present text is from the Officium de Funeris et Exequiarum, the edition of 1654, published by Bernardus de Buinæo. The office of the Dead is composed of five volumes, each corresponding to the psalms and three lessons: the Last Judgment, the Magi, the Annunciation, the Visitation, and the Nativity. The psalmody is divided into three parts: psalms, antiphons, and responsories. The Mattins, composed of three lessons, are the most significant. The responses, or prayers, are divided into two sections: the 107th, 108th, and 109th Psalms, and the Magnificat. The responsories are divided into two sections: the 107th, 108th, and 109th Psalms, and the Magnificat. The Magnificat is the most important section, as it is the basis for the entire office of the Dead.
For the Ambrosian Liturgy see Magistretti, "Manuale Ambrosianum," I (Milan, 1905), 67; for the Greek Ritual, see Burial, pp. 77-8.

II. History.—The Office of the Dead has been attributed at times to St. Isidore, to St. Augustine, to St. Ambrose, and even to the Biblical composers. There is no foundation for these assertions. In its present form, while it has some very ancient characteristics, it cannot be older than the seventh or even eighth century. Its authorship is discussed in length in the dissertation of Horatius de Turre, mentioned in the bibliography. Some writers attribute it to Amalarius, others to Alcuin (see Batifol, "Hist. du Brév." 181-92; and for the opposing view, Baum-Riron, "Hist. du Brév." II, 37). These opinions are more probable, but are not as yet very solidly established. Amalarius speaks of the Office of the Dead, but seems to imply that it existed before his time ("De Eccles. officiis"). v, xiii, in P.L. CV, 1298). He alludes to the "Agenda Mortuorum" contained in a sacramentary, but nothing leads us to believe that he was its author. Alcuin is also known for his activity in liturgical matters, and we owe certain liturgical compositions to him; but there is no reason for considering him the author of this office (see Cabrol in "Dict. archéol. et de liturgie", v, v. Alcuin). In the Gregorian Antiphonary we find several masses and an office of agenda mortuum, but it is admitted that this part is an addition; a fortiori this applies to the Gelasian. The Maurist editors of St. Gregory are inclined to attribute their composition to Albinus and Etiene de Léger (Mircol., I). But it is impossible to trace the office and its mass in their actual form beyond the ninth or eighth century, it is notwithstanding certain that the prayers and a service for the dead existed long before that time. We find it in the fifth and sixth, fourth and fifth, third and second century. Pseudo-Dionysius, Sts. Gregory of Nyssa, Jerome, and Augustine, Tertullian, and the inscriptions in the catacombs afford a proof of this (see Burial, III, 78; PRAYERS FOR THE DEAD: Cabrol, "La prière pour les morts" in "Rev. d'apologetique", 15 Sept., 1909, pp. 881-93).

III. Practice and Obligation.—The Office of the Dead was composed originally to satisfy private devotion to the dead, and at first had no official character. Even in the eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth centuries, it was recited chiefly by the religious orders (the Cistercians, Carthusians, like the Office of Our Lady (see Guyet, loc. cit., 465). Later it was prescribed for all clerics and became obligatory whenever a ferial office was celebrated. It has even been said that it was to remove the obligation of reciting it if the feasts of double and semi-double rite were multiplied, for it could be omitted on such days (Baum-Riron, op. cit., II, 198). The reformed Breviary of St. Pius V assigned the recitation of the Office of the Dead to the first free day in the month, the Mondays of Advent and Lent, to some vigils, and ember days. Even then it was not obligatory, for the Bull "Quod a nobis" of the same pope merely recommends it earnestly, like the Office of Our Lady and the Penitential Psalms, without imposing it as a duty (Van der Stappen, "Sacra Liturgia" I, Malines, 1908, p. 118). At the present time, it is obligatory on the solemnity of All Souls and in certain mortuary services. Some religious orders (Carthusians, Cistercians etc.) have preserved the custom of reciting it in choir on the days assigned by the Bull "Quod a nobis".

The hymn is commonly sung on the three holy days of All Souls' Day, the Day of the Dead (November 2), and the Day of the departed Saints. It is also used at the beginning of the Office of the Dead, as well as at the conclusion of the service. The text of the hymn is as follows:

O filii et filiae, Rex celestis, Rex glorie, Morte surrexit hodie. Alleluia.

It was written by Jean Tissierand, O.F.M. (d. 1494), an eloquent preacher, and originally comprised but nine stanzas (those commencing with "Discepulis stabantisibus", "Postquam auditis Didymus", "Beati qui non videantur", "Iamque partem trahantem", and "Veni Domine")

The alleluia of the jour de Pasques is a trope on the versicle and response (closing Lauds and Vespers) which it prettily emblazes in the two stanzas:

In hoc festo sanctissimo
Hodie nuncupatur alleluia.

BENEDICTUS DOMINO.—Alleluia.

De quibus nos humiliamur,
Devota atque delectabili,
DEO deo dierum GRATIAS.—Alleluia.

The hymn is still very popular in France, whence it spread to other countries. Guéranger's Liturgical Year (Paris, 1887, pp. 190-192) entitles it "The Joyful Canticule" and gives Latin text with English prose translation, with a triple Alleluia preceding and following the hymn. As given in hymnals, however, this triple Alleluia is sung also between the stanzas (see "The Roman Hymnal", New York, 1854, p. 200). In Lalanne, "Recueil d'anciens et de nouveaux chants de messe et de messe" (Paris, 1836, p. 225) greater particularity is indicated in the distribution of the stanzas and of the Alleluiae. The triple Alleluia is sung by one voice, is repeated by the choir, and the solo takes up the first stanza with its Alleluia. The choir then sings the triple Alleluia, sung by one voice, with its Alleluia, and repeats the triple Alleluia. The alternation of solo and chorus thus continues, until the last stanza with its Alleluia, followed by the triple Alleluia, is sung by one voice. It is scarcely possible for any one, not acquainted with the melody, to imagine the jubilant effect of the triumphal Alleluia attached to apparently less important circumstances of the Resurrection: e.g., St. Peter's being outrun by St. John. It seems to speak of the majesty of that event, the smallest portions of which are worthy to be so chronicled" (Neale, "Medieval Hymns and Sequences", 3rd ed., p. 163). The rhythm of the hymn is that of number and not of accent or of classical quantity. The melody to which it is sung can scarcely be divorced from the modern bit of triple time. As a result, there is to English ears a very frequent conflict between the accent of the Latin words and the music: however unintentional, stress of the melody; e.g.;: Et Mâria Magdalenæ, Scd Joannæ Apostolæ, Ad sepulcrum venit præceps, etc. A number of hymnals give the melody in plain-song notation, and (hence Caussely, at least) this would permit the accented syllables of the Latin text to receive an appropriate stress of the voice. Commonly, however, the hymnals adopt the modern triple time (e.g., the "Modern Hymns and Sacred Sequences", 1671; the "Roman Hymnal", 1884; "Hymns Ancient and Modern", rev. ed.). Perhaps it was this conflict of stress and word-accent that led Neale to repel the hymn in its "rude simplicity." It is better to describe the hymn to the twelfth century in the Contents-page of his volume (although the note prefixed to his own translation assigns the hymn to the thirteenth century). "Migne, Dict. de Liturgie" (s. v. Pâques, 959) also declares it to be very ancient. It is only very recently that its authorship has been discovered, the "Dict. of Hymnology" (2nd ed., 1907) tracing it back only to the year 1560, although Shipley ("Annus Sacrosanctus", London, 1884, and other) has found it in a Roman Processional of the sixteenth century.

The hymn is assigned in the various French Paroissiens to the Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament, on Easter Sunday. There are several translations into English verse by non-Catholics. The Catholic translations comprise one by an anonymous author in the "Evening Office", 1748 ("Young men and maidens, rejoice and sing"), Father Caswall's "Ye sons and daughters of the Lord" and Charles Kent's "O maids and striplings, hear love's story", all three being given in Shipley, "Annus Sacrosanctus". The Latin texts vary both in the arrangement and the wording of the stanzas; and the plain-song and modernized settings also vary not a little. For the origin, authorship, etc., see articles in the Tribuno de Saulcy, April, 1867, pp. 22-90, discussing the origin, authorship, etc., of the Latin hymn with English notes (New York, 1857) gives (p. 206) the Latin text with the same arrangement of stanzas as found in the "Book of Hymns" (Edinburgh, 1910), 33, and in the "Liber Usualis" (No. 700, Tournai, 1908), 67; a different arrangement of the Latin text is found in "Oeuvres de la Nativité de la Vierge" (Paris, 1886), 223; L. Leclercq, "Liturgie du Nouveau Testament", 1893, contains another arrangement. Where the Latin hymn is found, the texts have different readings; the works cited exhibit many variations in melody.

Bishop Wadham attended the New York Provincial Council of 1833 and the Plenary Council of Baltimore of 1884, and held three diocesan synods. His remains are buried in the crypt of St. Mary’s Cathedral, enlarged and embellished.

Henry Gabriels, born at Wannegem-Lede, Belgium, on 6 October, 1838, graduated at Louvain as a priest of the Diocese of Ghent and was invited with three other Belgian priests to teach in the newly-founded provincial seminary of Troy, New York. He was appointed professor of dogma and afterwards professor of church history until 1891. He was consecrated at Albany on 5 May, 1892 by Archbishop Corrigan.

The new bishop developed the work begun by his predecessor. He strengthened the Catholic schools although some of the smaller ones had to be closed; he introduced four new religious communities. Bishop Gabriels has made two visits ad limina, besides other trips to Rome. The former elements of the Catholic population, Irish, French and German, must for permanency rely on their own fecundity. There are a reasonable number of conversions annually, but a new immigration of Poles, Italians, Hungarians, Greeks, Maronites, and others, largely threatens to modify the Catholic body. Yet till now none are numerous enough to form separate congregations except the Poles who are building a church in Mineville.

OGILVIE, JOHN, VENERABLE. eldest son of Walter Ogilvie, of Drum, near Keith, Scotland, b. 1580; d. 10 March, 1615. Educated as a Calvinist, he was received into the Church at Louvain by Father Cornelius a Lapide. Becoming a Jesuit at the age of seventeen he was ordained priest in 1613, and at his own request was sent on the perilous Scottish mission. He landed in Scotland in November, 1613, and during nine months reconciled many with the Church in Edinburgh and Glasgow. He was betrayed in the latter city, but, during a long imprisonment, no torture could force him to name any Catholics. Though his legs were cruelly crushed, he was kept awake for nine nights by being continually pricked with needles, scarcely a sigh escaped him. Under searching examinations, his patience, courage, and gaiety won the admiration of his very judges—especially of the Protestant Archbishop Spottiswood—but he was condemned as a traitor and hanged at Glasgow. The customary beheading and quartering were omitted owing to undisguised popular sympathy, and his body was hurriedly buried in the churchyard of Glasgow cathedral. He was declared venerable in the seventeenth century.

OGILVIE (Ogilvies), MARCO D', Milanese painter, b. at Oggiono near Milan about 1470; d. probably in Milan, 1549. This painter was one of the chief pupils of Leonardo da Vinci, whose works he repeatedly copied. He was a hard-working artist, but his paintings are wanting in vivacity of feeling and purity of drawing, while, in his composition, it has been well said "intensity of colour does duty for intensity of sentiment." He copied the "Last Supper" repeatedly, and one of his best copies is in the possession of the Royal Academy of Arts in England. Of the details of his life we know nothing—not even the date of his important series of frescoes painted for the church of Santa Maria della Pace. His two most noted works—one in the Brescia (representing St. Michael), and the other in the private gallery of the Bonomi family (representing the Madonna)—are signed Marcus. Others of his works are to be seen at Berlin, Paris, St. Petersburg, and Turin, the one in Brescia having as a copy the "Last Supper" by Leonardo. Lanzi gives 1530 as the date of his death, but various writers in Milan say it took place in 1540, and the latest accepted date is the one which we give as 1549. He cannot be regarded as an important artist, or even as a very great copyist, but in his pictures the sky and mountains and the distant landscapes are always worthy of consideration, and in these we probably get the painter's best original work.

O'GROWNEY, Eugene, priest, patriot, and scholar, b. 25 August, 1863, at Ballyfallon, County Meath; d. at Los Angeles, 18 Oct., 1899. Neither parent spoke Irish and it was little used where he was born; in fact, he learned only a fragment of the language of the country until he was about 18. His father was a rice planter and his mother a teacher. The family removed to Galway when he was 13 years old, and he was there educated at the St. Michan's College, a national school. He was a member of the first normal school established in the country by the Directory and took second in the examination. He was sent to the University of Dublin and entered the seminary at Maynooth. He was later appointed Professor of Irish at Maynooth and was for many years the only member of the University who did not speak English. He was a man of great physical strength, possessing great energy and determination. He was a man of great learning, both in Irish and English, and was a leader in the Irish movement for national rights.

O'HANLON, John, b. at Stradbally, Queen's Co., Ireland, 1821; d. at Sandymount, Dublin, 1905. He entered Carlow College to study for the priesthood, but accompanied his parents to America where, completing his studies, he was ordained in 1847, obtaining a mission in the Diocese of St. Louis. In 1853 he returned to Ireland, was appointed to the Archbishop of Dublin and appointed curate in the parish of St. M.

O'HAGAN, John, lawyer and man of letters, b. at Newry, County Down, Ireland, 18 March, 1822; d. near Dublin, 10 November, 1890. He was educated in the day-school of the Jesuit Fathers, Dublin, and in Trinity College, graduating in 1842. Though he made many friendships in Trinity, he was always an earnest advocate of Catholic university education. In this spirit he contributed to the "Dublin Review" (1847) an article which the Catholic Truth Society of Ireland has reprinted under the title "Trinity College No Place for Catholics". Later he contributed to the same Review a criticism of Thomas Carlyle's system of thought, which Carlyle tells in his Diary "gave him food for reflection for several days". In 1842 he was called to the Bar and joined the Munster Circuit. In 1861 he was appointed a Commissioner of National Education, and in 1865 he became Q.C. The same year he married Frances, daughter of the first Lord O'Hanlon. After Gladstone had passed his Irish Land Act, he chose Mr. O'Hagan as the first judicial head of the Irish Land Commission, making him for this purpose a judge of Her Majesty's High Court of Justice. This elevation was a tribute not only to his legal attainments and judicial standing but to the place he held in the esteem of his countrymen. He was an earnest Catholic, as is shown in many of his writings, such as "The Children's Ballad Rosemary". In his earlier work he published "Dear Land", "Ourself Alone", etc., were among the most effective features of "The Nation" in its brilliant youth; in his last years he published the first English translation of "La Chanson d'Island", recognized as a success by the "Edinburgh Review" and all the critical journals. Longfellow wrote to him: "The work seems to me admirably well done."

O'HAGAN, Thomas, first Baron of Tullyhogue, b. at Belfast, 29 May, 1812; d. 1 February, 1886. Called to the Irish Bar in 1836, he resided at Newry, and married Miss Teeling in 1836. Inclined to journalism, he proved a brilliant editor of the "Newry Examiner" from 1838 to 1841. At the Bar he achieved distinction for his defence of Charles Gavan Duffy in 1847. Admitted to the Inner Bar in 1849, and made a bencher of King's Inn in 1859, in 1860 he was appointed Solicitor General for Ireland, and, in the following year Attorney General. After his death in 1871, and being admitted to the Irish Privy Council. He sat as M.P. for Tralee from 1863 to 1865, when he became Justice of the Common Pleas. In 1888 he was made Lord Chancellor of Ireland, the first Catholic in the office since Chancellor Fitzton under James II. Created Baron of Tullyhogue in 1870, two years later he married Miss Alice Mary Townley. His chancellorship expired with the Gladstone Ministry in 1874. In 1880 he was re-appointed Lord Chancellor by Gladstone, but resigned in November, 1881. A year later he was made a Knight of St. Patrick. He published: "Selected Essays and Speeches".

O'HARA, Theodore, b. in Danville, Kentucky, U.S.A., 11 February, 1882; d. in Guerryton, Alabama, 8 June, 1907. The son of James O'Hara, an Irish political exile, who became a prominent educator in Kentucky, O'Hara graduated from St. Joseph's College, Bardstown, Kentucky, studied law, and in the Mexican War attained the brevet rank of major, after which he made several filibustering expeditions to Cuba and Central America. He edited various newspapers and was successfully entrusted by the Government with some diplomatic missions. During the Civil War he served as a staff officer with Generals Johnson and Breckenridge. He wrote little of special merit besides the two poems, "The Bivouac of the Dead" and "A Dirge for the Brave Old Pioneers." The former was written when the State of Kentucky brought back the remains of her sons who had fallen in the Mexican War to the cemetery at Frankfort. The last four lines of the opening stanza are inscribed over the entrance to the National Cemetery at Arlington, Virginia.

THOMAS F. MEEHAN.

O'Hely, Patrick, Bishop of Mayo, Ireland; d. at Kilmainlock, September, 1758. He was a native of Connaught, and joined the Franciscans at an early age. Four years after his profession he was sent to the University of Alcalá, where he surpassed his contemporaries in sacred studies. Summoned to Rome, he was promoted in 1758 to the See of Mayo, now merged in that of Tuam. Gregory XIII empowered him to officiate in adjoining dioceses, if no Catholic bishop were at hand, and supplied him generously with money. At Paris he took part in public disputations at the university, amasing his hearers by his mastery of patristic and controversial theology, as well as of Scotch philosophy. In autumn, 1759, he sailed from Brittany and arrived off the coast of Kerry after a stormy journey. He landed at Smerwick from Portugal with the remnant of Stukeley's expedition. All Munster was then in arms. The House of Desmond was divided, and the political earl had withdrawn from the see. The bishop and his companions, Conn O'Rourke, a Franciscan priest, son of Brian, Lord of Breifne, came ashore near Aisteon, and sought hospitality at the castle where, in the earl's absence, his countess entertained them. Next day they departed for Limerick; but the countess, probably so instructed, for the earl claimed the merit afterwards, gave information to the Mayor of Limerick, who three days later seized the two ecclesiastics and sent them to Kilmainlock where Lord Justice Drury then was with an army. As president of Munster, Drury had recently perpetrated infamous barbarities. In one year he executed four hundred persons by justice and martial law. One of the condemned was sentenced "by natural law, for that he found no law to try them in the realm." At first he offered to secure O'Hely his life if he would acknowledge the royal supremacy and disclose his business. The bishop replied that he could not barter his faith for life or honours; his business was to do a bishop's part in advancing religion and saving souls. To questions about the plans of the pope and the King of Spain for invading Ireland he made no answer, and thereupon was delivered to torture. As he still remained silent, he and O'Rourke were sent to instant execution by martial law. The execution took place outside one of the gates of Kilmainlock.

O'Hernagh (O'HURLLAIG), Thomas, Bishop of Ross, Ireland, d. 1579. Consecrated about 1560, he was one of the three Irish bishops attending the Council of Trent. He incurred such persecution through enforcing its decrees that he fled with his chaplain to a little island, but was betrayed to Ferret, President of the Inquisition, who sent him in chains to the Tower of London. Simultaneously with Primate Creagh, he was confined until released after about three years and seven months on the security of Cormac MacCarthy, Lord of Muskerry. Intending to retire to Belgium, ill-health contracted in prison induced him to return to Ireland. He was apprehended at Dublin, but released on exhibiting his discharge, and proceeded to Muskerry under MacCarthy's protection. Dissatisified with the lavishness of that nobleman's house, he withdrew to a small farm and lived in great austerity, enduring distress to the utmost of his power. He made a visitation of his diocese yearly, and on great festivals officiated and preached in a neighbouring church. Thus, though afflicted with dysentery, lived in his sixth (or seventeenth) year, dying exhausted by labours and sufferings. He was buried in Kilcrea Priory, Co. Cork.

O'Higgins, Ambrose Bernard, b. in County Meath, Ireland, in 1720; d. at Lima, 18 March, 1810. An uncle, a priest in Spain, placed him at school in Cadiz. From there he went to Lima, where he was sent to the University of San Marcos, and afterwards went to Buenos Aires, and thence to Lima, where for a time he was a pedlar. Later he became a contractor for opening new roads, and finally joined the Spanish army in the engineer corps. His reputation and services were soon recognized, and secured for him a series of rapid promotions with a patent of nobility as Count of Ballenar, and later, 26 May, 1788, as Marquis of La Concorzoro, with the Governor-Generalship of the province. The following eight years he spent in developing the resources of the country, his enlightened policy accomplishing much for Spanish interest. In 1796 he was appointed Viceroy of Peru, the highest rank in the Spanish colonial service, reaching Lima with that commission on June sixth of that year. His vice-royalty ended with his death. BERNARD O'HIGGINS, his only son, b. at Chillan, 20 August, 1776; d. at Lima, 24 October, 1842. At the age of fifteen his father sent him to a Catholic school in England. At his father's death he returned to Chile where he joined the revolutionists as a colonel of militia against the domination of Spain. His bravery brought him higher rank, and the battle of Chacabuco, 12 February, 1817, which broke the power of Spain in Chile, was mainly won by his gallant impetuosity. This victory led to the capture of the capital and he was pronounced provisional dictator of Chile. He gave ample evidence of executive ability during an administration of six years, but a feeble populace deposed him from office in February, 1823, and drove him into exile in Peru. His sales were brought back by the Chilean government, and executed with great pomp in 1869, and in 1872 his equestrian statue was inaugurated at Santiago amid national rejoicing. His son Dometrio, a wealthy and patriotic Chilian ranchero, died in 1839.

Ohio, the seventeenth state of the American Union, admitted on 19 Feb., 1803. It is bounded on the north by Michigan and Lake Erie, on the east by Pennsylvania and West Virginia, on the south by West Virginia and Kentucky, and on the west by Indiana. Its greatest breadth is 215 miles, and its greatest length (north to south) 210 miles; its area is 41,060 square miles. The surface is an undulating plain 540-1,550 feet above sea-level. The population (1810) is 4,767,121. The agricultural output in 1900 was valued at $198,502,260; the mineral output at $134,499,335; the value of dairy products was $15,454,849; and the total value of industries $980,811,857. The railroad mileage is 9274 miles, besides 4450 miles of electric railway. Ohio profits commercially by the Ohio River in the south, connecting with the Mississippi, and by Lake Erie on the north. There are also four canals, the Miami and Erie, the Ohio, the Rocking, and the Waltholding.

CIVIL HISTORY.—Ohio was discovered by La Salle about 1670 and formal possession of the territory including the state was taken by the French in 1671. A controversy between France and England was settled by the Treaty of Paris (1763), by which Great Britain obtained all the French dominion in the north, and west as far as the Mississippi River. In 1787 an organization known as the Ohio Company of Associates was formed in New England by a number of those who had served in the American Revolutionary War and under their negotiations a purchase of a large tract of land in the territory northwest of the Ohio River, was made from the Government. This was the first public sale of land by the United States. Marietta, the first settlement, was founded on April 14, 1788.

In connection with this sale was passed the famous ordinance of 1788 guaranteeing forever civil and religious liberty, the system of common schools, trial by jury, and the right of inheritance. In 1788 Cincinnati was founded, and thenceforth settlements in the southern portion of the state multiplied rapidly. In 1791 the settlers were harassed by various Indian tribes, who were effectively checked by the victory of General Anthony Wayne at Fallen Timbers on the Maumee River (1794). In the succeeding year the treaty of peace was concluded by which the Indians ceded a great portion of the territory now embraced in the state. A bill to make the capital was adopted by the eastern division of the territory north-west of the Ohio River, designated by the name "Ohio" and next year the territory was admitted to statehood. From the date of the first settlement down to the year 1842 the nationality of the principal immigration was German. Between 1842 and 1860 the population of Ohio increased very rapidly owing to the great influx of immigrants from both Ireland and Germany. Since 1870 the Slavonic race has been the predominating factor in immigration. In the Civil War, seventy regiments responded to the first call for troops although the state quota was only thirteen. Troops from Ohio were largely the key to the saving of West Virginia to the Union. A number of the most celebrated officers of the Union Army, as Grant, Sherman, McPher, Rosecrans, Sheridan, Garfield, were natives of the state. In national elections Ohio was carried by the Democratic Party from 1853 down to 1886. In that year and ever since, with the exception of the years 1868 and 1882 when it cast its electoral vote for Cline and Pierce, it has been Republican.

Catholic History.—The first Catholic settlement in Ohio was founded among Huron Indian tribes near Sandusky by Father Ignatius Richard in 1761. The principal periods of Catholic immigration are from 1822 to 1842, from 1842 to 1865, and from 1865 to the present day. In the first period the German race predominated; in the second, the Irish and German races, with a majority of Irish immigrants; and in the third, members of the Slavonic race. Ohio has one archdiocese and two dioceses. The Archdiocese of Cincinnati (diocese, 1821; archdiocese, 19 June, 1828), contains the counties of the western half of the state, one-third, members of the Slavonic race. Ohio has one archdiocese and two dioceses. The Archdiocese of Cincinnati (diocese, 19 June, 1821; archdiocese, 19 June, 1828) includes the counties of the state. The Diocese of Cleveland (erected 23 April, 1847) includes that part of the state north of the southern limits of Columbiana, Stark, Wayne, Ashland, Richland, Crawford, Wyandot, Hancock, Allen, and Van Wert Counties. The Diocese of Columbus (erected 3 March, 1888) comprises that portion of the state south of 40° 41′ and between the Ohio River on the east and the Scioto River on the west, with Franklin, Delaware, and Morrow Counties. The Catholic population is 557,650, including 298,725 of the state. The counties in which Catholicism may be mentioned are General Philip H. Sheridan, General W. S. Rosecrans, General Don Carlos Buell, Generals Eugene and Charles Ewing, Honorable Bellamy Storer, Ruben B. Springer, Colonel Mack Grosart, Doctor Bonner, Frank J. Herd, and J. A. McGahan, the liberator of Bulgaria.

Besides the Catholics the principal religious denominations are the Methodist numbering 355,444; the Presbyterians, 128,768; and the Lutherans, 122,438.

Education and Charity.—Besides the Ohio State University, founded in 1870, and attended in 1909 by 3012 students under a faculty of 224 members, Ohio has numerous colleges and universities, as Antioch College, Baldwin College, Bucknell College, Case School of Science, Cedarville College, Defiance College, Dennison University, Franklin University, Miami University, Ohio University, Marietta College. The total number is thirty-six. According to the last report of the state commissioner of public schools, the number of public school buildings in Ohio is 10,723, with 24,188 teachers, 655,783 pupils. The expenditure for education during the year 1909-1910 was $25,011,361. By constitutional provision the principal of funds, entrusted to the State for educational and religious purposes, is not to be diminished, and the income is to be applied solely to the objects of such grants. The General Assembly is empowered to create and maintain an efficient system of common schools in the state. All children between the ages of eight and fourteen years shall attend either a public or parochial school for the full session, of not less than twenty-four weeks each year, unless prohibited by some disability. The course of instruction must extend to reading, spelling, writing, English, grammar, geography, and arithmetic. The employment of any child under sixteen years of age during the school session shall be a misdemeanor, punishable by fine, unless the employer shall have first exacted from the child an age and health certificate from the proper authorities, showing that the child has successfully completed the studies above enumerated, and if the child is between fourteen and sixteen, that he is able to read and write legibly the English language. If a child be absolutely compelled to work, such relief shall be granted out of the contingent funds of the school district in which he resides as will enable child to attend school in accordance with the requirements of the statute. The general supervision of all public charitable institutions of the state is vested in a state board of charities. Direct control of each separate state beneficent association is vested in an individual board of trustees. The following charitable institutions are provided for by statute in Ohio: Institution for Deaf and Dumb; Ohio State School for the Blind; Institution for Feeble Minded; Ohio Soldiers and Sailors Home; Ohio Soldiers and Sailors Orphan Home; asylum for insane at Cleveland, Columbus, Dayton, Athens, Toledo, Massillon, Cincinnati, Lima; Ohio Hospital for Epileptics; Boys' Industrial School; Girls' Industrial Home; homes for the friendless in the various counties; Ohio State Sanitarium for Consumptives; Ohio Institution for Deformed and Crippled Children; hospitals in the various counties; county and city infirmaries and children's homes. All private and public benevolent or charitable institutions shall be open at all times to the inspection of the county commissioners of the various counties, and the board of health of the township or municipality.
LEGISLATION ON RELIGIOUS MATTERS.—It is provided in the Bill of Rights, in the Constitution of Ohio, that no person shall be compelled to support any religion or form of worship against his consent; no preference shall be given to any religion by law; and interference with the rights of conscience shall be permitted; no religious qualifications shall be required for the holding of office, and suitable laws shall be enacted to protect every religious denomination in the peaceful enjoyment of the common modes of worship. The arrest of any person for civil purposes on Sunday is prohibited by statute, also hunting, fishing, shooting, theatrical, dramatic, or athletic performances; common labour or keeping open one's place of business, or requiring any employee to labour on Sunday; the sale of intoxicating liquors is prohibited on that day.

The prohibition of common labour does not apply to those who conscientiously observe and abstain from labour on Saturday. The basis of the observance of Sunday is not religious; it is a municipal or police regulation. As to oaths, a person may be sworn in any form deemed by him binding on his conscience. Belief in the existence of a Supreme Being is a prerequisite, but not a belief in a future state of reward or punishment.

Oath includes affirmation, which may be substituted. An oath is not regarded as having its foundation in Christianity. Profane cursing or swearing by the name of God, Jesus Christ, or the Holy Ghost is a misdemeanor. No use of prayer is provided for in the legislative sessions. There is no recognition of religious holidays as such. New Year's Day and Christmas Day are secular holidays and holidays for business purposes. Under the head of privileged occupations is a profession made to a clergyman or priest in his professional character, in the course of discipline enjoined by his Church, shall be held sacred.

Corporations not for profit, which include churches, may be formed by five persons, a majority of whom are citizens of Ohio, who acknowledge in due form the articles of incorporation containing name of corporation, place where same is to be located, and purpose for which formed. Any person subscribing to the articles of incorporation as set forth in the by-laws of the corporation may become a member thereby. Under the constitution of Ohio houses used exclusively for public worship and institutions for purely charitable purposes are exempt from taxation. The term house includes also the grounds attached thereto and all such buildings necessary for the proper use and enjoyment of such houses. Thus grounds contiguous to churches, schools, and priests' homes used in connection therewith, or for ornamental or recreational purposes, fall within this classification. Buildings belonging to the Roman Catholic Church and occupied by the bishops, priests, etc., are considered to come within the constitutional phrase "institutions of purely public charity". It has been held that the residence of a minister, or parsonage, is not exempt, because in addition to being used for purposes of public worship, it is also a place of private residence. Public schools are especially exempt from taxation, and private schools established by private donations for public or semi-public purposes are exempt as coming within the purview of the constitutional provision. With reference to institutions of purely public charity, while church and school property are exempt from all ordinary state, county, and city taxes, such property is subject to special assessments for improvements. Priests and clergymen are exempt from jury duty, but, apparently, not from military duty. Members of religious denominations prohibited by articles of faith from serving are absolutely exempt from military duty.

A male of eighteen years and a female of sixteen years may contract marriage, but consent of the parents or guardian must be obtained if the male is under twenty-one or female under eighteen.

Marriage of first cousins is prohibited. Marriage may be solemnized by a lawful minister of any religious society, a justice of the peace in his county, or a mayor of an incorporated village in the county where the village is situated. To perform the ceremony must obtain a license from the probate court of one of the counties of the state.

The bans of marriage must be published in the presence of the congregation in a place of public worship in the county wherein the residence of the persons resides, on two days previous to the ceremony. The first publication to be at least ten days prior thereto, or the publication of bans may be dispensed with upon the securing of a licence from the probate court of the county where the female resides. Persons applying for a licence are compelled to answer under oath questions touching the age, name, residence, place of birth, etc., of the two parties concerned. Solemnizing marriage without a licence or without the publication of bans is penalized, and any person attempting to perform the ceremony without a certificate from the probate court is guilty of a misdemeanor. The marriage of persons under the statutory age is voidable, but becomes irrevocable by cohabitation or other acts of ratification after the age limit is reached. Common-law marriage, by the weight of authority, is not recognized in Ohio. Grounds for divorce are: desertion, separation; or existing marriage; wilful absence for three years; adultery; impotency; extreme cruelty; fraudulent contract; gross neglect; habitual drunkenness for three years; imprisonment in penitentiary (but suit must be filed while party is in prison); foreign divorce not releasing party in Ohio. The person applying must be a bona fide resident of the county where suit is filed and must have been a resident of the state for at least two years. The court may order the service of process on the defendant by personal service or publication. A divorce does not affect the legitimacy of the children.

A yearly tax of $1000 is assessed against every person engaged in the trafficking in spirituous, vinous, malt, or other intoxicating liquors. Local option laws provide for the suppressing of the sale of liquor in townships or municipalities where a majority of the electors of the district vote in favour of closing the saloons. The statutes provide for a jail in each county; for a house of refuge for incorrigible or vicious infants; for hospitals for the insane; for workhouses for persons convicted of minor offences; for an Ohio State Reformatory for criminals between the ages of sixteen and thirty; and the Ohio State Penitentiary for persons convicted of a felony. A will, except executory wills, shall be in writing, either handwritten or typewritten, and signed by the testator or by some other person in his presence and by his express direction, and shall be attested and subscribed in the presence of the testator by at least two competent witnesses who will sign him or hear him acknowledge it. Generally speaking, any mark made at the end of the will by the testator with testamentary intent constitutes a good signing. A spoliated or destroyed will may be proven, and its directions carried out, where it was destroyed or lost subsequent to the death of the testator or to his becoming incapable of making a will by reason of insanity. A verbal will made in the last sickness is valid in respect to personal property if reduced to writing and subscribed by proper number of witnesses within ten days after the speaking of the testamentary words. A devise under a will, unless the will is written, but a devise to him fails unless the will can be proven without his testimony. Any bequest for charitable purposes made within one year of the testator's death is void if any issue of the testator is living. The word issue here used means of the blood of the deceased. The Ohio courts have held, however, that a bequest to a Roman Catholic priest "for the saying of masses for the repose of my soul and the soul of my husband" is not within the statute and is good although made within less than a year of the testator's death. Municipal corporations are organised by statute to maintain public cemeteries and burial-grounds, and are empowered to appropriate property for cemetery purposes. The cost of lots in such cemeteries is limited to such an amount as will reimburse the corporation for its outlay. Private associations incorporated for cemetery purposes may by statute purchase, appropriate, or otherwise become holders of title to land for cemetery purposes. Burial-lots are exempt from taxation, execution, attachment, or any other claim, lien, or process if used exclusively for burial purposes, but cemeteries owned by associations are not exempt from assessments for local improvements. Land appropriated for private or individual burying-grounds is not exempt from taxation, execution, etc., if it exceeds $50 in value.

JOHN A. DEARY.

Oehler, Alois Karl, educationist, b. at Mains, 2 January, 1817; d. there, 24 August, 1889. He attended the gymnasium at Mains, studied theology at Gießen, and was ordained priest at Mains on 14 August, 1839. His first charge was that of chaplain at Seligenstadt. Like his colleague, Moufang, he was one of the founders and teachers of the Propygymnasium of that city. He became spiritual director of St. Rochus Hospital at Mains in 1845, and pastor at Abenheim near Worms in 1847. On 21 June, 1852, he was appointed director of the Hessian Catholic teachers' training college at Benzenheim. During the fifteen years of his administration, encouraged by Bishop von Keteler, Oehler laboured to infuse a better spirit into the Catholic teaching body of Hesse. On 8 April, 1857, he was made a canon of the cathedral chapter of Mains, given charge of educational matters, and appointed lecturer in pedagogy and catechetics at the episcopal seminary—a position he held until the seminary was closed during the Kulturkampf in 1873. Oehler's chief work is "Lehrbuch der Erziehung und des Unterrichtes" (Mains, 1861; 10th ed., 1884). The fundamental idea of the work is that the education of Catholic youth should be conducted on Catholic principles, Church and school co-operating harmoniously to that end. The work was intended for the use of the clergy as well as for teachers. Oehler adapted from the Italian: "Cajetanus Maria von Bergamo, Ernennungen im Beichtstuhle" (5th ed., Mains, 1886); "Johannes Baptistia Lamburchini, Der geistliche Führer" (Mains, 1848; 12th ed., 1872), and an abridged edition of the latter, "Der geistliche Führer" (1851; 6th ed., 1881).

FRIEDRICH LAUCHET.

O'Hurley, Dermot, Archbishop of Cashel, Ireland, d. 18-29 June, 1854. His father, William O'Hurley of Lackadown, near Thurles, was of substance and standing, holding land under the Earl of Desmond, secured him a liberal education on the continent. He took his doctorate in utroque iure, taught first at Louvain and then at Reims, and afterwards, appointed Archbishop of Cashel, by Gregory XIII, he was consecrated on 11 September, 1581, per salutum, not having previously taken priesthood. Two years later he landed at Drogheda, stayed a short time with the Baron of Slane, and proceeded for his diocese, expecting protection from the Earl of Ormonde. Loftus, Protestant Archbishop of Dublin, and Sir Henry Wallop, then lord justice, having secret information, so intimidated Lord Slane that he hastened to Munster and brought back his guest. The archbishop was committed to Dublin Castle in October, 1583, while the justices, dreading Ormonde's resentment and his influence with Queen Elizabeth, obtained authority to use torture that he would inform against the Earl of Kildare and Lord Delvin. Still apprehensive, they suggested as Dublin was unprovided with a rack, that their prisoner could be better secured in the Tower of London. Walsingham replied by bidding them put his feet in hot boots over a fire. The barbarous suggestion was adopted, and early in March, 1584, the archbishop's legs were thrust into boots filled with oil and salt, beneath which a fire was kindled. Some groans of agony were wrung from the victim, and he cried aloud, "Jesus, son of David, have mercy on me!", but rejected every proposal to abandon his religion. Ultimately he swooned away, and fearing his death, the torturers removed him; as the boots were pulled off, the flesh was stripped from his bones. In this condition he was returned to prison, and the Justices again sought instructions from England, reporting what had been done, and intimating the lawyer's opinion that no charge of treason could be sustained in Irish law against Dr. O'Hurley. Walsingham, having consulted the queen, wrote back her approval of the torture, and her authority to dispense with the bishop by martial law. He was secretly taken out at dawn, and hanged with a withe on the gibbet near St. Stephen's Green, 19-29 June, 1584. His body was buried by some friends in St. Keyne's Church. He was a Franciscan Friar, b. in the Diocese of Clogher, Ulster. Little is known of his life. The first definite information about him dates from 1 November, 1607, on which day he became one of the original members of the IrishFranciscans at their college of St. Anthony at Louvain. It seems, however, that he had previously been at Douai. At Louvain, he lectured first in philosophy and afterwards in theology. His fame rests upon his profound knowledge of the Irish language, for which, according to the chronicles of his order, he was even in his own time held in high esteem. As far as we know, his works were all written in Irish, and one of his writings, "A Christian Catechism" (Louvain, 1608), was the first book printed on the Continent in the Irish character. The book must have met with considerable success, for we find that it was several times reprinted and revised. Among his other works are to be mentioned: a metrical abridgment in 240 verses of the Christian Catechism, a poem for a friend who had fallen into heresy, a poem on the author entering the Order of St. Francis, and three or four poems preserved in manuscript in the British Museum and the Royal Irish Academy. A letter in Irish from him to Father Nugent, the superior of the Irish Jesuits, is printed in Rev. E. Hogan's "Hibernia Ignitana" (p. 167). O'Hussey remained as guardian of the college at Louvain until his death in 1614.

P. L., LXXI, 730) testifies that a certain substance like flour emanated from the sepulchre of John the Evangelist. The same Gregory writes (ibid., xxxi) that from the sepulchre of the Apostle St. Andrew at Patras emanated manna in the form of flour and fragrant oil.

Following is a list of other saints from whose relics or sepulchres oil is said to have flowed at certain times: St. Antipas, Bishop of Pergamum, martyred under Emperor Domitian ("Acta SS.", April, II, 4); St. Babylasus, Abbot of St. Mary; d. in the seventh century ("Acta SS.", June, VII, 160); St. Candida the Younger, of Naples, d. 586 ("Acta SS.", Sept., II, 230); St. Demetrius of Thessalonica, martyred in 306 or 293 ("Acta SS.", IV, 73-8); St. Eligius, Bishop of Noyon, d. 660 or soon after (Surius, "De probatis sanctorum historiis", VI, 678); St. Euthymius the Great, abbot in Palestine, d. 473 ("Acta SS.", Jan., II, 687); St. Pantinus, confessor, at Taurinum in Calabria, d. under Constantine the Great ("Acta SS.", July, V, 550); St. Felix of Nola, priest, d. about 260 ("Acta SS.", Jan., II, 223); St. Franza, Cistercian abbess, d. 1218 ("Acta SS.", April, III, 392-4); St. Glyceria, martyred ("Acta SS.", May, III, 191); Bl. Gundecar, Bishop of Eichstätt, d. 1075 ("Acta SS.", August, I, 184); St. Humilias, first abbess of the Valombrosan Nuns, d. 1510 ("Acta SS.", May, II, 211); St. John the Almsgiver, Patriarch of Alexandria, d. 630 or 616 ("Acta SS.", Jan., III, 930-1); St. John of Beverley, Bishop of York, d. 721 ("Acta SS.", May, II, 192); St. Luke the Younger, surnamed Theanumturgos, a hermit in Greece, d. 945-6 ("Acta SS.", Feb., II, 99); St. Paphnutius, bishop and martyr in Greece, d. probably in the fourth century ("Acta SS.", April, III, 230); St. Paul, Bishop, near Appleby ("Acta SS.", Feb., II, 174); St. Perpetuus, Bishop of Tongres-Utrecht, d. 630 ("Acta SS.", Nov., II, 295); St. Peter Gonzales, Dominican, d. 1246 ("Acta SS.", April, II, 398); St. Peter Thaumaturgus, Bishop of Cyzicus, d. about 900 ("Acta SS.", May, I, 432); St. Rolendis, virgin, at Gerpinnes in Belgium, d. in the seventh or eighth century ("Acta SS.", May, III, 243); St. Revinianus, Bishop of Autun, and Companions, martyred about 273 ("Acta SS.", June, I, 40-1); St. Sebinus, Bishop of Canossa, d. about 566 ("Acta SS.", Feb., II, 329); St. Sigolena, Abbess of Trocal, d. about 700 ("Acta SS.", July, V, 638); St. Tito Paulus, a Benedictine monk at Solvagn, d. 703 ("Acta SS.", Jan., I, 300); St. Venerius, hermit on the Island of Palamaria in the gulf of Genoa, d. in the seventh century ("Acta SS.", Sept., IV, 118); St. William, Archbishop of York, d. 1154 ("Acta SS.", June, I, 140); and a few others.

Ointment in Scripture.—That the use of oily, fragrant materials to anoint the body is a custom going back to remote antiquity is evidenced by the Old Testament as well as other early literatures. Likewise the ceremonial and sacred use of oil and ointment was of early origin among the Hebrews, and was much elaborated in the prescriptions of the later ritual. The particularly rich unguent known as the "holy oil of unction" is frequently referred to in the "priestly" sections of the Pentateuch and in Paralipomenon. Its composition is mentioned in Exodus, xxx, 23, 24. Besides the regular basis of olive oil, the other ingredients mentioned are chosen myrrh, cinnamon, calamus, and cassia, all of which are to be used in stated quantities. The anointing oil of this holy oil by unauthorised persons was prohibited under pain of sacrilege. In many of the references to ointment in Scripture perfumed oil is meant, and it may have in some cases consisted of oil only. Oil and ointment however, are distinguished in Luke, vii. 46:

"My head with oil thou didst not anoint; but she with ointment hath anointed my feet." Identical or similar preparations, in which myrrh was an important ingredient, were used in anointing the dead body as well as the living subject (Luke, xxii. 56). Ointment of spikenard, a very costly unguent, is mentioned in Mark, xiv. 3, "an alabaster box of ointment of precious spikenard." (cf. John, xii. 3). So prized were these unguents that they were kept in pots of alabaster, and among the Egyptians they were said to retain their fragrance even for centuries. For the oil spoken of by St. James, v. 14, see Extreme Uncertainty.

JAMES F. DISBOS.

Ojeda, Alonso de, explorer; b. at Cuenca, Spain, about 1466; d. on the island of Santo Domingo, about 1508. He came of an impoverished noble family, but had the good fortune to start his career in the household of the Dukes of Medina Sidonia. He early gained the patronage of Juan Rodriguez de Fonseca, Bishop of Burgos and later Patriarch of the Indies, who made it possible for Ojeda to secure command of a shop in his second voyage to the New World. Ojeda distinguishing himself there by his daring in battle with the natives, towards whom, however, he was unduly harsh and vindictive, he was sent to Spain in 1496.
After three years he again journeyed to the New World with three vessels on his own account, accompanied by the cosmographer Juan de La Cosa and Amerigo Vespucci. In 1502, he sighted the mainland north of the Orinoco, and after landing on Trinidad and at other places, discovered a harbour which he called Venezuela (little Venice), from its resemblance to the bay of Venice.
After some further exploration, he made his way to the island of Hispaniola, where he was not received cordially, because it was thought that he was infringeing upon the exploring privileges of Columbus. On his return to Spain in 1500, he took with him many captives whom he sold as slaves. Having still influential friends at home, he was able to fit out a new expedition, which left Cadiz in 1502 and made a landing on the American continent at a place which he named Santa Cruz. There he established a colony which did not last long because of the improvidence of his companions and their extreme cruelty toward the Indians.
Chuano, under his leadership, these companions turned against him and sent him back a prisoner to Spain, accusing him of having appropriated the royal revenues. He was tried and sentenced to pay a heavy fine.
Upon his appeal, however, he was acquitted of all culpability, but was now reduced to poverty.

In some way or other he made his way back to His-paniola, where his former associate Cosa also was.
There he conceived the idea of establishing colonies on the mainland between Cabo de Vela and the Golfo de Uraba, and after some time spent in petitioning the Government, finally the two comrades obtained the necessary permission. He went back to Spain and organized his third and last expedition, only after great effort. Among the persons who embarked in his four vessels was Pizarro, the future conqueror of Peru.
Cortez, who was later to dominate Mexico, would have been among the soldiers of fortune engaged in this adventure, had not a sudden illness prevented him from eading. When he reached his destination, Ojeda found the natives very hostile; they attacked his force and slew every man except Ojeda and one other. The two escaped to the shore, wiped they were surrounded by those whom he had left in charge of the ships. Not despairing, he founded a new colony at San Sebastian. It soon became necessary for him to proceed to Hispaniola to obtain supplies for the settlement, in charge of which he left Pizarro. He was shipwrecked on the way, and only after suffering great privations
did he finally reach Santo Domingo, where he died.

J. D. M. FORD.

Okeghem, Jean d', also called ORGEM, OSKEM, OKEGHON, OKEHEN, OKEHEN, contrapuntist, founder and head of the second Netter School (1450-1550), b. about 1430, presumably at Termonde, in East Flanders; d. 1495. After serving as a choir boy at the cathedral of Antwerp (1445-4), he is said to have become the pupil of his "Maestro" and Guillaume Duyf. He entered Holy orders, and in 1453 assumed the post of chief chanter at the Court of Charles VII of France, where he became choir-master.

At the expense of the king, he visited Flanders and Spain, but most of his time was spent in Tours where he acted, by royal appointment, as treasurer of the church of St. Martin until his death. At first he fol-owed his predecessors and teachers in his manner of writing, but eventually introduced the principle of free imitation in the various voices of his compositions. Previously the strict canon was the ideal contrapuntal form, but he introduced the practice of allowing every new voice to emerge freely on its own tine and at any distance from the initial note of the original theme. The innovation was epoch making and of the greatest consequence in the development of the cappella style. The new principle inaugurated a one preceded era of activity with Okeghem's disciples, chief among whom were Josquin Despré, Pierre de la Rue, Antoine Brunel, Jean Ghiselin, Antoine and Robert de Pevin, Jean Mouton, Jacob Obrecht, etc.

Numerous fragments of his works are contained in the histories of music by Forkel, Burney, Kiesewetter, and Ambrose, while in the Proseke Library of the Rat-chapel archives are preserved his "Magnificat" and Guillaume Crétin, for four voices and a collection of "Cantiones sacres" for four voices. His contemporary, Guillaume Crétin, wrote a poem on the death of Okeghem, in which he mentions that Okeghem produced the greatest masterpiece of his time—a motet in canon form for thirty-six voices. While the belief in the existence of such a monster production was kept alive by tradition, it was feared that it had been lost. In his "Queellenlexikon", Robert Eitner expresses the opinion that the supposedly lost work is contained in a volume "Tomus III psalmorum", printed in Nuremberg in the sixteenth century by Johannes Petreius.

Hugo Riemann reproduces a passage in his "Hand-Der Musikgeschichte", i. ii. While the composition requires thirty-six voices, more than eighteen are never active simultaneously. The only words used are "Deo gratias" and there are no modulations from one key into another—probably to maintain as much clearess as is possible under the circumstances. Riemann doubts whether the composition was intended to be played by vocalists; he thinks that it was to be played on instruments or perhaps to serve as an exhibition of the master's surpassing skill.

Oklahoma.—I. Geography.—Oklahoma, the forty-sixth state to be admitted to the Union, is bounded on the north by Colorado and Kansas, on the east by Arkansas and Missouri, on the south by the Red River separating it from Texas, and on the west by Texas and New Mexico. It includes what was formerly Oklaoma Territory and Indian Territory, lying in the south central division of the United States between 33° and 37° North lat. and between 94° and 103° West long. Its extreme length from north to south is about 210 miles, and from east to west about 450 miles. Its

OKLAHOMA

has an area of 73,910 square miles. Oklahoma is boun-dified with streams although, exactly speaking, there is not a navigable stream in the state. The rivers flow from the northwest to the southeast. With the exception of the mountain districts the entire surface of the state is just rolling enough to render its adaptability to cultivation very beneficial. For zapping as it does the extremes of heat and cold, it is fitted for agricultural purposes even during the winter season. An irregular chain of knobs or buttes, entering Oklahoma from Missouri on the east, extends through the southern part of the state to the western boundary, in a manner connecting the Ozark range with the eastern plateau of the Rocky Mountains. The groups, as they range westward across the state, are the Kiamichi, Arbuckle, and Wichita Mountains and the Antelope Hills. The highest mountain, 2600 feet above sea-level, is the Sugar Loaf peak. II. POPULATION.—The report of the government census bureau relative to the special census of Oklahoma, taken in 1907, shows that the State had in that year a total population of 1,414,177, of whom 733,062 lived in what was prior to statehood called the Indian Territory. There were 1,226,648 white; 11,160 negroes; 75,012 Indians. Since 1907 the influx of people has been enormous. The white people in Oklahoma represent every nationality, having come from every state in the union and from every country since the opening in 1889.

III. INDUSTRIES.—The value of the agricultural output for 1907 was $231,512,903. The principal crops are cotton, corn, and wheat. The production in 1906 being as follows: cotton 492,272 bales; corn 95,230,442 bushels; wheat 17,017,887 bushels. In that year Oklahoma ranked sixth in cotton production, eighth in corn, thirteenth in wheat. First in petroleum products. The oil fields of Oklahoma are now the largest and most productive in the world, there being produced in 1905, 50,455,626 barrels. In 1909 the production of natural gas amounted to 44,000,000 cubic feet. Coal has been mined extensively for a number of years; the production in 1909 was 3,092,240 tons, the number of men employed in this one industry being 14,580. Gold, lead, zinc, sulfur, asbestos, and other minerals are mined in paying quantities. Oklahoma has deposits of Portland cement-stone that are said to be inexhaustible. There are two large cement mills in the state, each operating with a capacity of 50,000 barrels per day. In 1908 there were 5,996.36 miles of railway in the state, exclusive of yard tracks and sidings; the total taxable valuation of same amounted to $74,649,682. During the year beginning July 1, 1907, and ending June 30, 1908, there were built in Oklahoma 107.89 miles of railroad. There are thirteen railroad companies operating in the state.

IV. EDUCATION.—The State University, located at Norman, was founded in 1892 by an act of the legislature of the Territory of Oklahoma. The value of the university lands is estimated at $3,670,000. For 1906-9 the number of teachers in the institution was 84; enrollment was 790. Other state institutions are three normal schools, located at Edmond, Alva, and Weatherford; the Agricultural and Mechanical College at Stillwater; the university preparatory school at Tonkawa; a school for the deaf at Sulpher; an institute for the blind at Waukomis. Home in Pryor Creek; five district agricultural schools, one in each judicial district of the state. There were about 10,000 teachers employed in the public schools of the state, 1906-9, the enrollment of students being about 400,000; the total appropriation for educational purposes during this time was about $500,000.

V. HISTORY.—In 1540 Francisco Vasquez de Coronado commanding 300 Spaniards, crossed with Indian guides the Great Plains region to the eastward and northward from Mexico. In the course of their journey these Spaniards were the first white men to set foot on the soil of Oklahoma. Coronado traversed the western part of what is now Oklahoma, while at the same time de Soto discovered and partially explored the eastern portion of the state. In 1611 a Spanish expedition was sent east to the Wichita Mountains. From that time on until 1629, Padre Juan de la Cruz and other Spanish missionaries laboured among the tribes of that region. La Salle in 1682 took possession of the territory, of which the State of Oklahoma is now a part, in the name of Louis XIV, and in honour of that monarch named it Louisiana. Prior to the Louisiana Purchase, Bienville, accompanied by Washington Irving, had visited and related the wonderful beauty of the region now known as Oklahoma. In 1818 the Government conceived the project of dividing the region now embraced in the state into Indian reservations. This plan was carried out, but at the close of the Civil War the Seminoles, Creeks, Chickasaws, and Choctaws were induced to transfer back to the Government 14,000,000 acres of this land at 18 to 30 cents per acre. Of these lands the Oklahoma that was opened to settlement in 1889, by proclamation of the President of the United States, embraced 1,392,611 acres ceded by the Creeks and 145,084 acres ceded by the Seminoles in 1866. The lands so ceded were the western portions of their reservations, including Oklahoma ("the home of the red man"). The Government's object in obtaining the lands was to "colonize friendly Indians and freedom thereon". Captain David L. Payne and his "boomers" declared the territory was thus public land and open to the squatter-settlement. Payne and his followers made several attempts to settle on Oklahoma soil, but the United States troops drove out the colonists. Much credit is due Payne and his followers for their many attempts at colonization; for they caused the lands of Oklahoma to be opened for white settlement. Finally in 1888 the Spring Bank Bill, which provided for the opening of Oklahoma to settlement, although defeated in the senate, opened the way to partial success, and in Congress it was attached as a ride to the Indian Appropriations Bill, and was thus carried. On 2 March, 1889, the Bill opening Oklahoma was signed by President Cleveland; and on 22 March, President Harrison issued the proclamation that the land would be opened to settlement at 12 o'clock noon, 22 April, 1889. The day previous to the opening it was estimated that ten thousand people were at Arkansas City awaiting the signal. Large numbers were also at Hunnewel, Caldwell, and other points along the south line of Kansas. Fifteen trains carried people into the territory from Arkansas City that morning. On foot, horseback, in wagons, and carriages people entered the promised land all along the Kansas border. Other "boomers" came from the south, crossing the South Canadian at Purcell. The town of Lexington was perhaps the first village established. Two million acres of land were thrown open to settlement and on that eventful day cities and towns and a new commonwealth were created in a wilderness within twenty-four hours. On 6 June, 1890, Congress created the Territory of Oklahoma with six original counties. Nineteen other counties were from time to time created prior to statehood by the various acts of Congress which provided for the opening of different Indian reservations within the territory. On 16 September, 1893, the Cherokee Strip was opened for settlement. This was a strip of land extending from the Cherokee Nation west to "No Man's Land," and Texas, containing about 368 miles wide and containing an area of 6,014,293 acres. This had once been guaranteed to the Cherokee Indians as a perpetual hunting outlet to the western border of the United States. The last great opening in Oklahoma occurred in December, 1898, when 105,000 acres of land, which had been reserved from the Comanche and Apache lands for pasturage, were sold in tracts of 160 acres to the highest bidders by the Government. In this wise 2300 farms were opened to white settlement.

OKLAHOMA 232  OKLAHOMA

Oklahoma and Indian Territories became a state on 16 November, 1907. On 20 November, 1906, pursuant to the enabling act passed by Congress, the constitutional convention assembled at Guthrie and closed its labours on 6 July, 1907. The constitution was adopted by a vote of the people on 17 September, 1907, and at the same election the officers of the new state were elected. The inauguration was held in Guthrie on 16 November, 1907.

VI. CONSTITUTION, LAWS ETC.—When the Congress of the United States passed what is known as the enabling act, enabling the people of Oklahoma and of Indian Territory to form a constitution and be admitted to the Union, it was provided in said act: "That perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured and that no inhabitant of the State shall ever be molested in person or property on account of his or her mode of religious worship and that polygamous or plural marriages are forever prohibited." The Constitution of the State provides for the freedom of worship in the same language as quoted above but provides further: "No religious test shall be required for the exercise of civil or political rights". Under the statute law of Oklahoma it is a misdemeanor for any one to attempt, by means of threats or violence, to compel any person to adopt, practise, or profess any particular form of religious belief. It is also a crime under the law for any person to willfully prevent, by threats or violence, another person from performing any lawful act enjoined upon or recommended to such person by the religion which he professes. Every person who willfully disturbs, interrupts, or disquiets any assemblage of people met for religious worship, by uttering, profane discourses, making unnecessary noise within or near the place of meeting, or obstructing the free passage to such place of religious meeting, is guilty of a misdemeanor. The laws of Oklahoma provide that: "The first day of the week being by very general consent set apart for rest and religious exercise, the law makes a crime to be done on that day certain acts deemed useless and serious interruptions of the repose and religious liberty of the community"; and the following are the acts forbidden on Sunday: service labour; public sports; trades, manufacturing and mechanical employments; public traffic; serving process, unless authorized by law so to do.

Oaths can be administered only by certain judicial officers and their clerks authorized by law, and persons conscientiously opposed to swearing are allowed merely to affirm but are amenable to the penalties of perjury. Oaths can be taken only when authorized by law. Under the state law blasphemy consists in wantonly uttering or publishing words, casting contemptuous reproach or profane ridicule upon God, Jesus Christ, the Holy Ghost, the Holy Scriptures, or the Christian or any other religion. Blasphemy is a misdemeanor. Profane swearing as defined by the state law is: "Any use of the name of God, or Jesus Christ, or the Holy Ghost either in imprecating divine vengeance upon the utterer or any other person, or in light, trifling or irreverent speech." It is punishable by fine, for each offence. It is customary to convene the Legislature of the State with prayer, but the law makes no provision for it. Every Sunday and Christ-
VII. Diocese of Oklahoma.—What is now the Diocese of Oklahoma was formerly the Vicariate Apostolic of Indian Territory. The diocese comprises the entire State of Oklahoma. Prior to the opening of Oklahoma in 1889 there were only a few missions and scarcely any churches. At the present time (1910) there are within the state 53 churches with resident priests and 71 missions with churches, 300 stations attended occasionally and 12 chapels, 60 secular priests and 34 Benedictines, 14 of whom are in the missions. The Benedictine Fathers were the first missionaries and they established themselves at Sacred Heart Abbey in Pottawatomie County in 1880. The first prefect-Apostolic was the Rt. Rev. Isidore Robot, O.S.B., his appointment dating from 1877. Catholicism in Oklahoma owes much to his persevering efforts. A native of France, he introduced the Benedictine order in the Indian country, choosing the home of the Pottawatomie Indians as the centre of his missionary labours. At this time a few Catholics other than the Pottawatomie and Osage Indians were scattered over the vast country. Soon after Robot’s appointment as prefect Apostolic he had the foundations of Sacred Heart College and St. Mary’s Academy well established; the latter under the care of Benedictine Fathers. These institutions have grown and prospered. Father M. Bernard Murphy was the first American to join the Benedictine order and from 1877 was the constant companion and co-worker of Father Robot until the latter’s death. Father Robot fulfilled his charge well and laid a solid foundation upon which others were to build as the great state developed. He died 15 February, 1897, and his humble grave is in the little Catholic Cemetery at Sacred Heart Abbey. W. O. O. Robot wrote: “Going, I went forth weeping, σωμα του θεου; coming, they will come rejoicing, bearing the sheaves.”

The second prefect Apostolic was Rt. Rev. Ignatius Jean, O.S.B., whose appointment followed immediately after the death of Father Robot. Father Jean resigned in April, 1890. From the coming of Father Robot, the Catholics and Indian Territories had been a prefecture Apostolic, but by the Bull of 29 May, 1891, it was erected into a vicariate Apostolic. The Right Rev. Bishop Meereschaert was the first vicar Apostolic of Indian Territory, being consecrated in Choctaw, Miss., on 23 August, 1896, but in a brief of Pius X the vicariate was erected into the Diocese of Oklahoma with the see in Oklahoma City. Prior to this time the see had been in Guthrie. The Right Reverend Bishop Theodore Meereschaert, the first Bishop of Oklahoma, was born at Roussignies, Belgium. He studied at the American College, Louvain, Belgium, finishing his course there. Coming to America in 1872 he laboured in the Diocese of Natchez, Miss., until 1891. By his example and his labours he has endeared himself to his own flock, and also to fairminded non-Catholics. When his administration began, his labours were difficult and perplexing; he was compelled to travel long distances and weary miles on horseback, railroad facilities being very meagre and accommodations poor. In those days Mass was celebrated many times in dugouts, no house being available, and churches were very few and only in the larger towns. Development has come with the multitudes of people who have come to this new country to make homes, bringing with them the best ideas of the old states from which they came. The labours of the bishop have been manifold on account of the great influx of people, but the Church has kept pace with all the other developments under his guidance and perseverance, until at the present time (1910) there are within the diocese about 32,000 Catholics and 86 priests (22 from Belgium, 12 from Holland, 15 from France, 12 from Germany, 3 from Ireland, 1 from Canada, 1 Indian, and 20 American priests). The majority of these priests were educated at Louvain, Strasburg, or Rome. There are two parishes for non-English speaking Catholics in the diocese, one Polish at Harrah and one German at Okarche. The parochial schools are conducted by both Brothers and Sisters, some few by lay-teachers. The Brothers of the Sacred Heart and the Christian Brothers have schools within the diocese. The sisterhoods within the diocese are: Sisters of Mercy (mother-house in Oklahoma City), Sisters of Divine Providence (mother-house in San Antonio, Texas), Sisters of St. Francis, Sisters of St. Benedict, and Sisters of the Precious Blood. There are thirty-six schools for white children, fifteen for Indians, two for coloured children; thirty-six parishes with schools; one industrial school; two colleges for boys: St. Joseph’s College at Muskogee, under the direction of Brothers of the Sacred Heart, and the College of the Sacred Heart under the direction of the Benedictine Fathers. There are eight academies for young ladies, the principal ones being Mt. St. Mary’s Academy at Oklahoma City conducted by the Sisters of Mercy and the academy at Guthrie conducted by the Benedictine Sisters. There is one seminary for students of the Benedictine order. There are in the diocese 14 Benedictine and Christian Brothers, 8 Christian Brothers, 6 Christian Brothers of Omaha, 3 Oblates of St. Mary, 2 Christian Brothers of St. Paul, and 234 Sisters in the various congregations. The novitiates are: Sisters of Mercy at Oklahoma City, Benedictine Sisters at Guthrie, and Benedictine Fathers at Sacred Heart, St. Anthony’s Hospital at Oklahoma City is conducted by the Sisters of St. Francis.

Oklahoma City, the metropolis, with a population of about 65,000 (1910) has one church, St. Joseph’s Cathedral, the pastor of which is Rev. A. P. W. D., D.D., has two assistants: Rev. John Gruenewald and Rev. Victor Van Durme. Muskogee has a population of 25,000 and one church, Rev. Jos. Van Hulse pastor; Enid has a population of 20,000 and one church, Rev. Very Rev. Gustave Dupreiere, vicar-general, pastor. Other cities having one church and a resident priest are Shawnee, Tulsa, El Reno, Guthrie, Chickasha, and Ardmore. There are three churches and two schools for negroes, the latter attended by 120 children.

Most of the Indians within the diocese are Baptists and Methodists. Some of the Pottawatomies are Catholics, among the Cherokees there are a great many, and the Osage tribe in the northern part of the state is entirely Catholic. The spiritual interests of the Osage Indians are attended to by Rev. Edward Van Waeberghhe at Pawhuska. There are Indian Mission Schools at Purrell, Anadarko, Chickasha, Anitlers, Pawhuska, Gray Horse, Quapaw, Ardmore, Muskogee, and Vinita. 1590 Indian pupils attend these mission schools. These schools are supported by money coming from Rev. Mother Katherine Drexel, the Indian Bureau at Washington, D.C., and from Catholic residents of the state. Much credit is due Rev. Isidore Ricklin, O.S.B., of Anadarko, Rev. Edw. Van Waeberghhe of Pawhuska, Rev. Hubert Van Rechem, and Rev. P. S. Teyssier of Anitlers, all of whom have laboured many years in the Indian Missions.

In regard to the immigrants the Italians, Bohemians, Germans, Syrians, Mexicans, and French form settlements; but the people of other nationalities assimilate because they are not numerous enough to form settlements and for the further reason that by assimilation they can learn the English language more rapidly. From the time of the opening of Oklahoma in 1889 many Catholics have moved into this diocese. At the present time (1910) there is a good class of Catholics in the diocese and many practical Catholics are constantly coming from all parts of the world. There are retreats for clergy every two years and eclesiastical conferences are called every four months. In Nagyosombat, 15 Jan., 1568. His father, Stephen, a brother-in-law of John Hunyadi, was of Wallachian descent; his mother was Barbara Huzafir (also known as Sapetza). His autobiography and letters throw light on his life. After having studied at the Chapter School of Várad from 1505 to 1512, he became a page at the court of Vladislaw II, but shortly afterwards chose an ecclesiastical career, and was ordained a priest in 1516 or 1518. With the generous patronage of Sigismund of Poland, he was appointed canon of the Chapter of Stuhlweissenburg, and accompanied the queen-dowager in 1530 to the imperial diet at Augsburg. When in 1531 she became Stadtholder of the Netherlands, he went with her to Belgium, where he remained (with a brief interruption in 1539) until his return to Hungary in 1542. In the following year he was made by Ferdinand I royal chancellor and Bishop of Agram. In 1548 he became Bishop of Er- lan, and in 1553 Archbishop of Gratz. In 1553 he crowned Maximilian King of Hungary, and performed the solemn obsequies (1563) over Ferdinand I. As Archbishop of Gran, Oláh's first care was to put order into the finances and property of the archbishopric. He placed the "Jus Pietasi" again enforced, i.e. the right of supervision over the mint at Körmöcbánya, for which surveillance the archdiocese enjoyed a large revenue. At his own expense, he redeemed the hypocritical provostship of Turócz, also the encumbered possessions of the Diocese of Neutra. Oláh likewise, as Archbishop of Gran, exercised a supervision over the Diocese of Erlan, and (with the consent of the Holy See) administered the Archdiocese of Kalocsa, vacant for 20 years. After the capture of Gran by the Turks, the archiepiscopal residence was at Nagyosombat or Pożomny.

Oláh was particularly active in the Counter-Reformation (q. v.); even before his elevation to the Archbishops of Gran, he had been a very zealous opponent of the new Protestant teachings. As Primate of Hungary he threw himself with renewed energy into the great conflict, aiming especially at the purity of Catholic Faith, the restoration of ecclesiastical discipline, the reformation of the clergy, and the establishment of new colleges. The mountainous parts of Hungary, in which the doctrines of the Reformation had made considerable progress, attracted his particular attention. He organized a visitation of the archdiocese, which he in great part conducted in person, besides convoking, with a similar intention, a number of diocesan synods. The first of these synods was held in 1550 at Nagyosombat; at its close he promulgated a code of dogmatic and moral instructions, intended for the clergy, published during that and the following year. In 1561 a provincial synod was held, likewise at Nagyosombat, to discuss the participation of the bishops of Hungary in the Council of Trent, shortly before re-convened. While it is not certain that Oláh took part in that council, or that he promulgated in Hungary its decrees of 1562 and 1564, it is known that he followed its deliberations with close attention and practically adopted in Hungary some of its decisions. In 1563 Oláh submitted to the council a lengthy memorial, in which he urged the importance of dealing with the critical situation of the Hungarian Church and desiring in strong language the efforts he had made to overcome the demoralization that had set in among the clergy. It was particularly through school-reform and the proper instruction of youth that he hoped to offset the progress of the Reformation. He restored the cathedral school at Gran, which had fallen into decay when that city was captured by the Turks; he transferred it, however, to his archiepiscopal city of Nagyszombat and confided it to the Jesuits, whom he invited to Hungary in 1561, and who, by their preaching and spiritual ministrations, profoundly influenced the religious life of the nation. Among the publications initiated by him were the "Breviarium Ecclesiae Strigoniensis" (1558), and the "Ordo et Ritus Ecclesiae Strigoniensis" (1600). The revival of the custom of ringing the Angelus was due to him. As chancellor and confidant of Ferdinand I, Olah possessed much political influence, which he exercised in the interest of the Catholic religion. In 1562 he acted as royal delegate. He was a diligent writer; his works ("Hungaria et Attila"; "Genesim filiorum Regis Ferdinandi"; "Ephemerides"; and "Brevis descrip-tio vitae Benedicti Zerchesky") were edited by Kovachek, in Vol. I of the "Scriptores minores".

Olba, a titular see in Lusaria, suffragan of Seleucia. It was a city of Cilicia in Cilicia Aspera, later forming part of Isauria; it had a temple of Zeus, whose priests were once kings of the country, and became a Roman colony. Strabo (XIV, 5, 10) and Ptolemy (V, 8, 6) call Olba, a coin of Dioscara, Olba; Hierocles (Syceneum, 709), Olba; Basil of Seleucia (Mirac. S. Thecle, 2, 8) and the Greek "Notitia episcopatum", Olba. The primitive name must have been Ourba or Orba, found in Theophanes the Chronographer, hence Ourbaopolis in "Acts of S. Bartholomew". Its ruins, north of Seleukeia in the valley of Adana, are called Ora. Le Quen (Oeuvres, III, 1031) gives four bishops between the fourth and seventh centuries; but the "Notitia episcopat" mentions the see until the thirteenth century.

Oldcastle, Sir John. See LOLLARDS.

Old Catholices, the sect organised in German-speaking countries to combat the dogma of Papal Infallibility. Filled with the idea of ecclesiastical Liberalism and rejecting the Christian spirit of submission to the teachings of the Church, nearly 1400 Germans issued, in September, 1870, a declaration in which they rejected the dogma of Infallibility "as an innovation contrary to the traditional faith of the Church". They were encouraged by large numbers of scholars, politicians, and statesmen, and were acclaimed by the Liberal press of the whole world. The break with the Church began with this declaration, which was put forth notwithstanding the fact that the majority of the German bishops issued, at Fulda on 30 August, a common pastoral letter in support of the dogma. It was not until 10 April, 1871, that Bishop Hefele of Rotterdam issued a letter concerning the dogma to his clergy. By the end of 1870 all the Austrian and Swiss bishops had done the same.

The movement against the dogma was carried on with such energy that the first Old Catholic Congress was able to meet at Munich, 22-24 September, 1871. Before this, however, the Archbishop of Munich had excommunicated Dollinger on 17 April, 1871, and later, to suspend Johann Friedrich von Schulte, the professor of dogma at Prague. Von Schulte summed up the results of the congress as follows: Adherence to the ancient Catholic faith; maintenance of the rights of Catholics as such; rejection of the new dogmas; adherence to the constitution of the ancient Church with repudiation of every dogma of faith not in harmony with the actual consciousness of the Church; reform of the Church with constitutional participation of the laity; preparation of the way for the reunion of the Christian confessions; reform of the training and position of the clergy; adherence to the State; unity of the whole Church against Ultramontanism; rejection of the holy blood; solemn assertion of the claims of Catholics as such to the real property of the Church and to the title to it. A resolution was also passed on the forming of parish communities, which Dollinger vehemently opposed and voted against. The second congress, held at Cologne, 20-22 September, 1872, was attended by 350 Old Catholic delegates, besides one Jansenist and three Anglican bishops, Russian clergy, and English and other Protestant ministers. The election of a bishop was decided on, and among the most important resolutions passed were those pertaining to the organization of the pastorate and parishes, which was followed by steps to obtain recognition of the Old Catholics by various governments; the general feeling of that time made it easy to obtain this recognition from Prussia, Baden, and Hesse. On 19 September, 1873, was consecrated at Rotterdam by the Jansenist Bishop of Deventer, Heydekamp, 11 August, 1873. Having been officially recognized as "Catholic Bishop" by Prussia on 19 September, and having taken the oath of allegiance, 7 October, 1873, he selected Bonn as his place of residence. The bishop and his diocese were granted by Prussia an annual sum of 4,900 Marks ($150). Pius IX excommunicated Reinkens by name in November, 1873; previous to which, in the spring of 1872, the Archbishop of Cologne had been obliged to excommunicate Hilgers, Langen, Rensch, and Knooth, professors of theology at Bonn. The same year also witnessed the exile of several professors at Braunsberg and Breslau. The fiction brought forward by Friedrich von Schulte that the Old Catholics are the true Catholics was accepted by several governments in Germany and Switzerland, and many Catholic churches were transferred to the sect. This was done notwithstanding the fact that a decree of the Inquisition, dated 17 September, 1870, had forbidden the Old Catholics from joining the Church; and consequently could assert no legal claims whatever to the funds or buildings for worship of the Catholic Church.

The development of the internal organisation of the sect occupied the congresses held at Freiburg in the Breisgau, 1874; at Breslau, 1876; Baden-Baden, 1880; and Krefeld, 1884; as well as the ordinary synods. The synodal constitution, adopted at the urgency of von Schulte, seems likely to lead to the ruin of the sect. It has resulted in unlimited arbitrariness and a radical break with all the disciplinary ordinances of Catholicism. Especially far-reaching was the abolition of celibacy, called forth by the lack of priests.

After the repeal of this law a number of men who were tired of celibacy, none of whom were of much intellectual importance, took refuge among the Old Catholics. The statute of 14 June, 1878, for the maintenance of discipline among the Old Catholic clergy has merely theoretical value. A bishop's fund, a pension fund, and a supplementary fund for the incomes of parish priests have been formed, thanks to the aid given by governments and private persons. In the autumn of 1877 Bishop Schulte founded a residential seminary for theological students, which, on 17 January, 1894, was recognized by royal cabinet order as a juridical person with an endowment of 110,000
Marks (927,500). A house of studies for gymnasiów students called the Paulinum was founded 20 April, 1898, and a residence for the bishop was bought. Besides other periodical publications there is an official church paper. These statements, which refer mainly to Germany, may also be applied in part to the few communities founded in Austria, which, however, have never reached any importance. In Switzerland the clergy, notwithstanding the very pernicious agitation, acquitted themselves well, so that only three priests apostatised. The Protestant cantons, above all Berno, Basle, and Geneva, did everything possible to promote the movement. An Old Catholic theological faculty, in which two radical Protestants lectured, was founded at the University of Berne. At the same time all the Swiss Old Catholic communities organized themselves into a "Christian Catholic National Church" in 1876; in the next year Dr. Herzog was elected bishop and consecrated by Dr. Roikens. Berne was chosen as his place of residence. As in Germany so in Switzerland confession was done away with, celibacy abolished, and the use of the vernacular prescribed for the service of the altar. Attempts to extend Old Catholicism to other countries failed completely. That lastly an apostate English priest named Arnold Mathew, who for a time was a Unitarian, married, the attempt with another suspended London priest named O'Halloran, and was consecrated by the Jansenist Archbishop of Utrecht, is not a matter of any importance. Mathew calls himself an Old Catholic bishop, but has practically no following. Some of the few persons who attend his church in London do so ignorantly in the belief that the church is genuinely Catholic.

The very radical liturgical, disciplinary, and constitutional ordinances adopted in the first fifteen years gradually convinced even the most friendly government officials that the fiction of the Catholicism of the Old Catholics was no longer tenable. The damage, however, had been done, the legal recognition remained unchanged, and the grant from the budget could not easily be dropped. In Germany, although there was no essential change in this particular, yet the political necessity bound to result from it did have the effect of chilling the interest of statesmen in Old Catholics, particularly as the latter had not been able to fulfill their promise of nationalizing the Church in Germany. The utter failure of this attempt was due to the solidarity of the violently persecuted Catholics. In many cases entire families returned to the Church after the first excitement had passed, and the winning power of the Old Catholic movement declined throughout Germany in the same degree as that in which the Kulturkampf powerfully stimulated genuine Catholic feeling. The number of Old Catholics sank rapidly and steadily; to conceal this the leaders of the movement made use of a singular device. Up to then Old Catholics had called themselves such, both for the police registry and for the census. They were now directed by their leaders to cease this and to call themselves simply Catholics. The rapid decline of the sect has thus been successfully concealed, so that it is not possible at the present day to give fairly exact statistics. The designation of themselves as Catholics by the Old Catholics is all the more extraordinary in that they are so much on the defensive, and their self-abnegation and worship they hardly differ from a liberal form of Protestantism. However, the prescribed concealment of membership in the Old Catholic body had this much good in it, that many who had long been secretly estranged from the sect were able to return to the Church without attracting attention. On account of these circumstances only Old Catholic statistics of some years back can be given. In 1878 there were in 44 congregations, including 36 in Baden, 36 in Prussia, 34 in Bavaria, and about 52,000 members; in 1890 there were only about 30,000 Old Catholics, on account of a decided decline in Bavaria. In 1877 there were in Switzerland about 72,000; in 1890 only about 25,000. In Austria at the most flourishing period there were perhaps at the most 10,000 adherents, to-day there are probably not more than 4000. It may be said that the total number of Old Catholics in the whole of Europe is not much above 40,000.

It seems strange that a movement carried on with so much intellectual vigour and one receiving such large support from the State should have gone to pieces thus rapidly and completely, especially as it was aided to large degree in Germany and Switzerland by a violent attack upon Catholics. The reason is mainly the predominating influence of the laity, the leader whose control the ecclesiastics were placed by the synodal constitution. The abrogation of compulsory celibacy showed the utter instability and lack of moral foundation of the sect. Döllinger repeatedly but vainly urged the canonization of the martyrs. But he, too, was turned aside by the leaders of the Church. All things considered, Old Catholicism has practically ceased to exist. It is no longer of any public importance.

For accounts of the movements and tendencies that led up to Old Catholicism see Döllinger; Günter; Herem; Infallibilität; Lamenrais; Syllabus; Vatican Council.

Besides the statements in the statistical year-books in the Döllinger, Geschicht des Katholischen im neunzehnten Jahrhundert (Münster, 1908); Majewski, Geschichte der Katholizismus im neunzehnten Jahrhundert (Münster, 1895); rapid, Geschicht der Katholizismus im neunzehnten Jahrhundert (Paderborn, 1882); Grandnitz, Geschich der Volksthumischen Romanik (Freiburg, 1868-77); Jäger, Geschicht des Volkskatholismus (Freiburg, 1877); in addition, the very full polemic literature of 1868-72 concerning the council and the question of infallibility is of great interest. The most important writings are briefly mentioned in the works just mentioned. The displacement of the Protestant points of view, of Döllinger by Friedrich (Münster, 1897-1901) and Michaelis, (Innsbruck, 1892) contain much valuable material.

Old Chapter, Trier. The origin of the body, formerly known as the Old Chapter, dates from 1625, when after a period of more than half a century during which there was no episcopal government in England, Dr. William Bishop was at length created vicar Apostolic. He survived less than a year, but he organized a regular form of ecclesiastical government, by means of archdeacons and rural deans, throughout the country which continued in force with little change down to the re-establishment of the hierarchy in 1850. An integral part of this was the creation of a chapter consisting of twenty-four canons with Rev. John Cotleton as dean. The ecclesiastical status of the chapter has always been a matter of dispute. A chapter with a diocese is an arrangement unknown in canon law, and Rome always refrained from any positive act of recognition. On the other hand, she equally refrained from any censure, although it was known that the chapter was both exercising and exercising large functions. They therefore argued that the chapter existed "sinece et tacente sede apostolica" (with the knowledge and silent consent of the pope) and that it was sufficient to give it a canonical status. When Dr. Bishop died they sent a list of names from which his successor might be chosen, and the Holy See accepted their action choosing the first name—Dr. Richard Smith. Three years later he had to leave the country and spend the rest of his life in France. After his death the chapter assumed the right to rule the country in the vacancy of the episcopal office, and for thirty years all faculties were issued by the dean who claimed the verbal approval of Alexander VII.

When James II ascended the throne, and England was divided into four districts or vicariates, the position of the chapter became still more anomalous. Dr. Leyburn, the first vicar Apostolic of that reign, was required to take an oath not to recognize the chapter, and a decree was issued in general terms suspending all jurisdiction of chapters of regulars and seculars so long as there were vicars Apostolic in England; but doubt was felt whether this was meant to apply to the Old Chapter, for the very reason that its position was anomalous. In practice, however, they submitted, and ceased to exercise any acts of jurisdiction; but they continued their existence. The vicars Apostolic themselves were usually members.

When the hierarchy was re-established in 1850, a chapter was erected in each diocese, and whatever claims to jurisdiction the Old Chapter had, from that time ceased. Not wishing to dissolve, however, they reconstituted themselves as the “Old Brotherhood of the Secular Clergy”, the dean of the chapter becoming president of the brotherhood. Under this title they have continued to the present day. They meet twice a year and distribute their funds to various charities.

Oldcorne, Edward, Venerable, martyr, b. 1551; d. 1606. His father was a Protestant, and his mother a Catholic. He was educated as a doctor, but later decided to enter the priesthood, went to the English College at Reims, then to Rome, where, after ordination, in 1587, he became a Jesuit. Next year he returned to England in company with Father John Gerard (q. v.), and worked, chiefly in Worcester, until he was arrested with Father Henry Garnet (q. v.) and taken to the Tower. No evidence connecting him with the Gunpowder Plot (q. v.) could be obtained, and he was executed for his priesthood only.

Two letters of his are at Stonyhurst (Ang. III 1; VII 60); the second, written from prison, overflows with zeal and charity. His last combat took place on 7 April, at Red Hill, Worcester. With him suffered his faithful servant, the Ven. Ralph Ashby, who is traditionally believed to have been a Jesuit lay-brother. Oldcorne’s picture, painted after his death for the Ges rather, is extant, and a number of his relics.

Oldenburg, a grand duchy, one of the twenty-six federated states of the German Empire. It consists of three widely separated parts: the duchy of Oldenburg; the principality of Lübeck, situated between Holstein and Mecklenburg; and the principality of Birkensh, in Rhenish Prussia. The duchy is bounded by the North Sea, and by Hanover, which has an area of 2571 sq. miles and (1 Dec., 1906) 438,866 inhabitants. Oldenburg has 2134 sq. miles and 333,789 inhabitants; Lübeck, 217 sq. miles and 38,553 inhabitants; and Birkenfeld, 202 sq. miles and 46,484 inhabitants.

There were in 1905, in Oldenburg: Catholics, 86, 865; Protestants, 264, 805; other Christians, 1163; Jews, 956; in Lübeck: Catholics, 485; Protestants, 38, 064; other Christians, 11; Jews, 23; in Birkenfeld: Catholics, 6717; Protestants, 37, 047; other Christians, 177; Jews, 543. In the entire grand duchy: 96,067 Catholics, 399,916 Protestants, 1351 other Christians, 1922 Jews. The percentage of Catholics among the total population is now 21.9; in 1871 it was 22.4. The cause of this lies in the emigration of a part of the agricultural population to the industrial districts of the neighbouring provinces.

The capital is Oldenburg. In that part of the country facing the North Sea, the population is of Frisian descent; further inland it is Low Saxon. The chief rivers are the Weser and the Hunte. Of great importance to the country are the numerous canals. The chief industries are agriculture, cattle raising, horse-breeding, peat-cutting, and fishing. The country’s industrial establishments include brick factories, briquette manufacture, shipbuilding, metal and iron works, distilleries of alcohol from wine and potatoes. The most important articles of commerce are cattle, grain, lumber, etc.

The country takes its name from the castle of Oldenburg, erected about the middle of the twelfth century. The founder of the reigning house was Egilmar, who is first mentioned in a document dated 1088. His territory, of which the Duke of Saxony was the liege lord, was situated between the counties of the Saxons and the Frisians. The wars with the latter lasted for several centuries, and it was not until 1234 that one of their tribes (the Stedings) succumbed to the Oldenburg attacks in the battle of Altenesch. The Archbishop of Bremen was in these wars in all the counts of Oldenburg. When the famous Saxon duke, Henry the Lion, was forced to flee and the old Duke of Saxony was partitioned by Frederick Barba-rossa in 1181, the counts of Oldenburg obtained the rights of princes of the Empire, but took little part in its development and progress. Of great importance later on was the marriage which Count Dietrich the Fortunate (d. 1440), concluded with Heilig von Schauenburg (Schaumburg). Two sons issued from this marriage, Christian and Gerhard the Valiant. Through the influence of his uncle, Duke Adolf VIII of Schleswig, Heilig’s eldest son, Christian, became King of Denmark in 1448, King of Norway in 1450, and King of Sweden in 1457. This last royal crown Christian lost again in 1471. He became, after the death of Duke Adolf, Duke of Schleswig and Count of Holstein. Christian became the ancestor of the House of Holstein-Oldenburg, branches of which are reigning to-day in Denmark, Greece, Norway, Russia, and Oldenburg.

The ancestral land of Oldenburg were turned over by Christian in 1458 to his brother Gerhard the Valiant. The Emperor Charles V gave Oldenburg as a fief to Count Anton I in 1531. The main line became extinct with the death of George Adolphus (d. 1670). After lengthy quarrels over the succession, Christian V of Denmark became ruler of Oldenburg in 1676. In 1773, however, the Danish King Christian VII surrendered Oldenburg to the Grand Duke Paul of Russia, in consideration of the latter's renunciation of the sovereignty of Schleswig-Holstein. Grand Duke Paul transferred the country, which was raised to a dukedom in 1777, to his cousin Frederick Augustus. The latter, who was born in 1730, inherited Oldenburg to the dignity of a grand duchy and enlarged it by adding to it a part of the French Department of the Saar, the old Wittelsbach Principality of Birkenfeld. After the establishment of the German Federal in 1815, Oldenburg became a member of it. In the war between Prussia and Austria in 1866 Oldenburg added its troops to the Prussian army of the Main; later on it joined the North German Federation and in 1871 the German Empire as an independent state. The reigning grand duke since 1900 is Frederick Augustus (b. 16 Nov., 1852).

The larger part of the country was Christianized by the Bishop of Bremen, and especially through the efforts of St. Willebadus, who was consecrated first Bishop of Bremen in 787. Until the introduction of the Lutheran confession in 1529 by Count Anton I, this district was united with the Archbishopric of Bremen. The reformation here destroyed almost all Catholic life. The southern parts of the duchy, which consist to-day of the administrative districts of Cloppenburg and Vechta, were parishes of the Osnabrück Diocese, attended from the monasteries of the Benedictines at Visbeck and Meppen, which had been established by Charlemagne. These parts, the parishes of which chiefcy devolved on the Benedictine Abbey of Corvey, were subject to the Prince-Bishop of Münster from 1252 until 1803 under the name of "Niedenstein" and, therefore, remained Catholic during the Reformation period. The spiritual jurisdiction over the Niedenstein was exercised by the Bishop of Osnabrück and not by the Bishop of Münster. In 1588 the jurisdiction of Osnabrück was transferred to Münster. These districts were ceded to Oldenburg in the conference of the federal deputies in 1833. In the papal Bull "De salute animarum", 16 July, 1821, in regard to the establishment and limitation of the Prussian bishoprics, all Oldenburg was transferred to the Prussian bishopric of Münster; however, there were very few Catholics in the northern part of the country.

The principality of Lübeck is a part of the Vicariate Apostolic of the Northeast Mission. The Princely Cathedral of Birkenfeld belongs to the Bishopric of Trier. The plan of Grand Duke Paul to have a separate bishopric for Oldenburg failed on account of financial difficulties. The relations between Church and State were adjusted by the convention of 5 Jan., 1800. The Apostolic delegate to these deliberations was the Prince-Bishop of Ermland, Joseph of Hohenzollern. The supreme guidance of the Catholics of Oldenburg was entrusted to the substitute for the Bishop (Bischofssubstitut) of the Bishopric of Münster, who resided in Vechta. The resolutions of the convention became laws by order of the grand ducal cabinet of 5 April, 1831, under the title "Fundamentalstatut der katholischen Kirche in Oldenburg". Simultaneously there was published "Normativ zur Wahrung der landesherrlichen Majestätsrechte circa sacra" (Regulations for the maintenance of the ducal rights circa sacra), of which no notice had been given to the ecclesiastical authorities.

These regulations created a commission for the defense of State rights against the Catholic Church, which exists to this day, and which is composed of two higher State officials, one of whom is usually a Catholic and the other a Protestant. The work of the commission includes all negotiations between the government and the Bishop of Münster, particularly those relating to the appointment of the Officialis, his assessors and his secretary as well as the two deputies; furthermore all negotiations between the government and the Officialis, such as relating to the appointment of priests, the establishment of parishes and of ecclesiastical benefices. The commission furthermore must approve every sale or mortgage of church property. The regulations further decreed that all papal and episcopal edicts must be approved by the grand duke before their publication in Oldenburg and that they shall not be valid without such an approval. On account of this one-sided unjust measure a long controversy arose between the government and the Bishop of Münster. The position of Officialis at this time was vacated in 1836 and filled by 1843 to 1853. In 1852 Oldenburg received a constitution. This led to an amelioration in the relations between Church and State, the ducal placet was abolished and every religious community or sect was permitted to conduct its affairs independently and without interference; church property was distinctly guaranteed. But as the approval of the government was required for the appointment of the clergy and clerical officials, the conflict continued.

The negotiations, begun in Dec., 1852, between the Bishop of Münster and the government, dragged along for almost twenty years. During this conflict the bishop and the Officialis did not appoint any parish priests; only temporary pastors were placed in charge of the parishes in which vacancies occurred. In 1868 an agreement was reached according to which the bishops filled clerical vacancies after an understanding in each case with the Government, and they further agreed that the decrees of the Church should be communicated to the Government simultaneously with their publication. Matters in dispute were settled in 1872. The Catholics of Oldenburg were not affected by the severe trials of the Kulturkampf. Grand Duke Peter openly disapproved of the persecutions and of the severity with which the Church was treated in Prussia.

The Oldenburg part of the Diocese of Münster consists to-day of two deconcries, Cloppenburg and Vechta. The Deaconry of Cloppenburg numbers 38,678 Catholics, 6952 Protestants and 28 Hebrews; the 18 parishes of the Amt Cloppenburg and Friesoythe also belong to it. The Deaconry of Vechta numbers 53,308 Catholics, 264,169 Protestants, 987 Jews; it includes the other 18 parishes of the county. The necessary funds for the payment of clerical expenses were partly taken from the income of several so-called commanderies in the Amt Friesoythe which formerly belonged to it. These and other clerical possessions in the beginning of the nineteenth century, but agreed to turn over the annual income to the Catholic Church, which it has done to this day. Including these revenues the State pays annually about 22,000 Marks for the use of the Catholic Church. In 1910 the Church obtained the right of levying church-taxes. The State does not forbid the foundation of religious houses.

The Dominicans have a boarding college at Vechta, and the Franciscans a house in Mühlen, near Steinfeld. Of female congregations there are 7 houses belonging to the sisters of the third order of St. Fran-cola prospered, particularly under the rule of Thomas Griffiths (1818–34), afterwards Vicar Apostolic of London. He built a larger chapel, designed in the Gothic style by Augustus Welby Pugin and remarkable for the beautiful rood-screen, but he did not live to see the opening of it in 1853 when it was consecrated by Cardinal Wiseman, whose attempts to place the college under the direction of the Oblates of St. Charles led to serious troubles. Connected with these was the appointment of Dr. Henry Vaughan (Cardinal Archbishop of Westminster) as vice-president of the college (1855–61). After the death of Cardinal Wiseman, Archbishop Manning decided to remove the theological students to London, and from 1860 the college was conducted simply as a seminary. In 1871, however, in 1905 Archbishop Bourne decided to send back the theological students. There is now accommodation for 250 students; the college grounds cover 400 acres. The chapel contains a relic of St. Edmund, and the museum many interesting relics of the English College, Douai, and of the penal days. Two ecclesiastical councils have been held at the college, the synod of the Vicars Apostolic in 1803 and the Fourth Provincial Council of Westminster in 1873.

Oldham, Huon, Bishop of Exeter, b. in Lancashire, either at Crumpell or Oldham, d. 25 June, 1353. Having spent a short time at Oxford, he entered Queen's College, Cambridge. After his ordination he became chaplain to the Countess of Richmond and soon obtained many benefices, being appointed but of Wimborne and Archdeacon of Exeter. He also held prebends in the cathedrals of London, Lincoln, and York, and was rector of St. Mildred's, Bread Street, London. Henry VII honoured him by appointing him as one of those who laid the foundation stone of his chapel in 1503. In the following year he was appointed Bishop of Exeter by a Bull of 27 Nov., 1504. Though not a learned man, he encouraged learning and in 1512 founded and endowed Grammar School. Through his influence over his friend Bishop Foxe of Winchester, Corpus Christi College, Oxford, was founded for the secular clergy, instead of for the Winchester monks. He added six thousand marks to Foxe's foundation, where his portrait is still honoured as that of a benefactor. From 1510 to 1513 he with other bishops was engaged in resisting what they considered the undue claims of Archbishop Warham with regard to the probate courts, and in the end won a considerable measure of success. Less fortunate was his litigation with the Abbot of Tavistock concerning their respective jurisdictions, during which he is said to have incurred excommunication. Before the dispute was ended, he died, so that his burial had to be postponed until absolution was procured from Rome. Oldoni, Augustino, historian and bibliographer, b. 6 Jan., 1612; d. at Perugia, 23 March, 1683. He came from La Spezia, and entered the Society of Jesus 4 February, 1628. At the end of this novitiate he made the usual study of the humanities, philosophy, and theology. For some time he taught classics at Perugia, and was then professor of moral philosophy.
In the theological school. His first work, "Alcune difficoltà principali della grammatica" (Ancona, 1637), dealing with Latin grammar, was written while he was engaged in teaching the humanities. He devoted his later years to the study of history and bibliography. He prepared a new annotated edition of the "History of the Popes" by Alphonsus Ciacoonius, up to Clement IX (1667–9). "Vite et res gestae Pontificum Romano- romanorum et S.R.E. Cardinalium Alphonsi Ciacoonii, O. P." (Rome, 1670–77). In connection with this, he also published the following: "Neocrollium Pontificum &c. Pseudo-Pontificum Romanorum" (Rome, 1671); "Clementes tituli sanctitatis vel morum sanctitatis illustres" (Perugia, 1678); "Atheneum Romanum, in quo Summorum Pontificum &c. Pseudo-Pontificum neonon S.R.E. Cardinalium et Pueto-Cardinalium scripta publice expunctorunt" (Perugia, 1670). J. Meuschen published an excerpt from Oldoini's "Catalogus eorum qui de Romanis Pontificibus scripturarunt," in his work, "Ceremonialia elec- tionis Pontificum Romanorum" (Frankfort, 1731). Oldoini also published "Athenaeum Augustum, in quo Peruvianorum scripta publica expunctorunt" (Perugia, 1690), and "Atheneum Ligusticum seu Syllabus Scriptorum Ligurum neonon Sarsenacensium ac Curnen-densum repuiculae Genuensium subditorum" (Perugia, 1690).

O'Leary, Arthur, Franciscan, preacher, polemical writer, b. at Panibos, Irelay, Co. Cork, Ireland, 1729; d. in London, 8 Jan., 1802. Educated with the Franciscans of St. Malo, where he was ordained and acted as prison chaplain till 1771, he returned to Cork to engage in missionary work. Soon famous as a preacher, writer, and controversialist he published tracts characterized by learning, religious feeling, toleration, and steadfast allegiance to the Crown; but his zeal against religious bigotry led him to make rash admissions, and to expose himself unconsciously to the danger of heterodoxy. Among his writings are: "A Defence of the Divinity of Christ and the Immortality of the Soul"; "Loyalty asserted, or the Test Oath Vindicated"; "An Address to the Roman Catholics concerning the apprehended invasion of the French"; "Essay on toleration"; "A reply to John Wesley".

A brilliant wit, an honorary member of the famous "Society of the Scribleri," he was commonly called the Catholic Swift of Ireland. He is charged by Froude with having received secret-service money from the Government, but more impartial historians consider the story false. From 1789 till his death he was chaplain to the Spanish embassy in London, and his society was courted by Burke, Sheridan, Fox, Fitzwilliam, and other leading men of Liberal views.

Olesnicki, Zbigniew (Sioneus), a Polish cardinal and statesman, b. in Poland, 1389; d. at Sandomir, April 4, 1455. At the age of twenty, he was made a knight by King Jagello, and fought with him in the battle of Grunwald on 14 July, 1410. A favourite with the king, he took part in the management of the country's most important affairs, and the king greatly aided him in opposing the Hussites, who had gained royal favour. On 9 July, 1423, he was appointed to the episcopal see of Cracow, and in 1433 was sent by the king as legate to the council of Basle, where he endeavoured to be on friendly terms with both parties. On 18 December, 1439, he was created cardinal priest with the titular church of St. Priscus, by Eugenius IV. The opinion that he accepted the same dignity from the antipope Felix V and adhered to him for some time has recently been attacked by P. M. Baumgarten: "Die beiden ersten Kardinals Konzistoren des Gegenpapstes Felix V" in "Romische Quartalschrift," XXII (March, 1908), 163.

As cardinal, his influence in Poland was second only to that of the king, and, during the frequent absence of Casimir IV in Lithuania, he transacted the affairs of the State. Being a man of great learning, he devoted himself to the study of arts and letters in every possible way, and the flourishing condition of the University of Cracow during his episcopate is due chiefly to his efforts. To repel the spread of Hussitism he called John Capistran and the Minorites to Cracow.

S. VAILLÉ.

Olier, Jean-Jacques, founder of the seminary and Society of St-Sulpice, b. at Paris, 20 Sept., 1606; d. there, 2 April, 1657. At 14 years of age he became administrator of justice, he made a thorough classical course under the Jesuits (1617–25); he was encouraged to become a priest by St. Francis de Sales, who predicted his sanctity and great use to the Church. He studied philosophy at the college of Harcourt, scholastic theology and patristics at the Sorbonne. He preached during this period, in virtue of a benefice with which his father had provided him, adapting the ambitious style of the day; he also frequented fashionable society, causing anxiety to those interested in his spiritual welfare. His success in defending theses in Latin and Greek led him to go to Rome for the purpose of learning Hebrew so as to gain an easy way by defending theses in that language at the Sorbonne. His eye-sight failing, he made a pilgrimage to Loreto, where he not only obtained a cure, but also a complete conversion to God. For a time he meditated on the Carthusian life, visiting monasteries in Southern Italy; the news of his father's death (1631) recalled him to Paris. Refusing a court chaplaincy, with the prospect of high honours, he began to gather the beggars and the poor and catechize them in his home; at Paris he collected the poor and the outcast on the streets for instruction, a practice at first derided but soon widely imitated and productive of much good. Under St. Vincent de Paul's guidance, he assisted his missionaries in Paris and the provinces, prepared for the priesthood, and was ordained 21 May, 1633. He became a leader in the revival of religion in France, associating himself with the followers of St. Vincent and then of Père de Condren, Superior of the Oratory, under whose direction he passed, though he continued to retain St. Vincent as his friend and advisor. To de Condren, more even, it appears, than to St. Vincent, Olier owed the deepest spiritual influence and many of his leading ideas. The work de Condren had most at heart was the foundation of seminaries after the model laid down at the Council of Trent. The hope of religion lay in the formation of a new clergy from among the seminarians. The attempts in France to carry out the designs of the council having failed, de Condren, unable to succeed through the medium of the Oratory, gathered a few young ecclesiastics around him for this purpose, Olier among them. The missions in which he employed them were meant to impress on their minds the religious needs of the country; his ulterior purpose was to fill their souls with a love of God.

A first attempt to found a seminary at Chartres failed. On 29 Dec., 1641, Olier and two others, de Foix and du Ferrier, entered upon a community life at Vaugirard, a suburb of Paris. Others soon joined them, and before long there were eight seminarians, who followed with the priests the same rule of life and were instructed in ecclesiastical sciences. M. Olier translated the Holy Scripture. The pastor of Vaugirard profited by the presence of the priests to take an extended vacation, during which time they reformed his parish. Impressed by the fame of this reform, the cure of St-Sulpice, disheartened by the deplorable state of his parish, offered in execration for some of M. Olier's benefices. In August, 1641, M. Olier took charge of St-Sulpice. His aims were to reform the parish, establish a seminary, and Christianize the Sorbonne, then very worldly, through the piety and holiness of the seminarians who should attend its courses. The parish embraced the whole Pau-Bourg-St-Germain, with a population as numerous and varied as a large city. It was commonly repulsed the largest and most viscious parish, not only in the French capital, but in all Christendom. The enormity of the evils had killed all hope of reformation. Father Olier organized his priests in community life. Those who found the life too strict separated from the work. The parish was divided into eight districts, each under the charge of a head priest and associates, whose duty it was to know individually all the souls under their care, with their spiritual and corporal needs, especially the poor, the uninstructed, the vicious, and those bound in irregular unions. Thirteen catechetical centres were established, for the instruction not only of children but of many adults, known or unknown to the parish. Special instructions were provided for every class of persons, for the beggars, the poor, domestic servants, lackeys, midwives, workmen, the aged etc. Instructions and debates on Catholic doctrine were organized for the benefit of Calvinists, hundreds of whom were converted. A vigorous campaign was waged against immoral and heretical literature and obscene pictures; leadets, holy pictures, and prayer books were distributed to those who could not or would not come to church, and a bookstore was opened at the church to supply good literature. The poor were cared for according to methods of relief inspired by the practical genius of St. Vincent de Paul. During the five or six years of the Fronde, the terrible civil war that reduced Paris to widespread misery, and often to the verge of famine, M. Olier supported hundreds of families and provided many with clothing and shelter. None were neglected in times of rule of relief, adopted in other parishes, became the accepted methods and are still followed at St-Sulpice. Orphans, very numerous during the war, were placed in good parishes, and a house of refuge established for orphan girls. A home was opened to shelter and reform the many women rescued from evil lives, and another for young girls exposed to danger. Many free schools for poor girls were founded by Father Olier, and he laboured also at the reform of the teachers in boys' schools, not however, with great success. He perceived that the reform of boys' schools could be accomplished only through the new congregation which in fact came about after his death through Saint John Baptist de la Salle, a pupil of St-Sulpice, who founded his first school in Father Olier's parish. Free legal aid was provided for the poor. He gathered under one roof the sisters of many of the most prominent confraternities, driven out of their convents in the country and fled to Paris for refuge, and cared for them till the close of the war. In fine, there was no misery among the people, spiritual or corporal, for which the pastor did not seek a remedy.

His work for the rich and high-placed was no less thorough and remarkable. He led the movement against duelling, formed in bodies, and enlisted the active aid of military men of renown, including the marshals of France and some famous duelists. He converted many of noble and royal blood, both men and women. He combined the idea that Christian perfection was only for priests and religious, and inspired many to the practices of a devout life, including daily meditation, spiritual reading and other exercises of piety, and to a more exact fulfillment of their duties at court and at home. His influence was powerful with the Queen Regent, Anne of Austria, to whom he spoke with great plainness, yet with great respect, denouncing her prime minister, Cardinal Mazarin, as responsible for simoniacal and sacrilegious transactions to the episcopate. He persuaded the rich—royalty, nobles, and others—to a great generosity, without which his unbounded charities would have been impossible. The foundation of the present church of St-Sulpice was laid by him. At times as many as sixty or even eighty priests were ministering together in the parish, of whom the most illustrious, a little after Olier's time, was Pélerin, later Archbishop of Cambrai. This was one of the best effects of Olier's work, for it sent trained, enlightened zealous priests into all parts of France. From being the most vicious in France, the parish became one of the most devout in the land; Olier was always the missionary. His outlook was worldwide; his zeal led to the foundation of the Sulpician missions at Montreal and enabled him to effect the conversion of the English King, Charles II, to the Catholic faith, though not to perseverance in a Christian life.

The second great work of Olier was the establishment of the seminary of St-Sulpice. By his effort, which he intended to serve as a model to the parochial clergy, as well as by his seminary, he hoped to help give France a worthy secular priesthood, through which alone, he felt, the revival of religion could come.
OLINDA

The seminary was at first installed in the presbytery, but very soon (1 Oct., 1642) removed to a little house in the vicinity, M. de Foix being placed in charge by Father Olier. The beginnings were in great poverty, which lasted many years, for Olier would not allow any revenues from the parish to be expended except on parish needs. From the start he designed to make it a national seminary and regarded as providential the fact that the parish of St-Sulpice and its seminary depended directly on the Holy See. In the course of two years students came to it from about twenty dioceses of France. Some attended the courses at the Sorbonne, others followed those given in the seminary. His seminarians were instilled into parochial work being employed very fruitfully in teaching catechism. At the Sorbonne their piety, it appears, had a very marked influence. The seminary, fulfilling the hopes of Father Olier, not only sent apostolic priests into all parts of France, but became the model according to which seminaries were founded throughout the kingdom. Its rules, approved by the General Assembly of the Clergy in 1651, were adopted in many new establishments. Within a few years, Father Olier, at the earnest solicitation of the bishops, sent priests to found seminaries in a few dioceses, the first at Nantes in 1648. It was not his intention to establish a congregation to conduct a number of seminaries in France, but merely to lend priests for the foundation of a seminary to any bishop and to recall them after their work was well established. The repeated requests of bishops, considered by him as indications of God's will, caused him to modify his plan, and to accept a few seminaries permanently. The society which formed around him at St-Sulpice was not erected into a religious congregation, but continued as a community of secular priests, following a common life but bound by no special vows, whose aim it should be to live perfectly the life of secular priests. He was a man of great piety to remain a company, deprived of the right to exercise that it should never consist of more than seventy-two members, besides the superior and his twelve assistants. This regulation remained in force till circumstances in France forced Father Emeroy to abolish the limitation.

Father Olier's arduous labours brought on a stroke of apoplexy in February, 1652. He resigned his cure into the hands of M. de Bretonvilliers and on regaining strength visited watering-places in search of health, by command of his physicians, and made many pilgrimages. On his return to Paris, his old energy and enthusiasm reasserted themselves, especially in his warfare against Jansenism. A second stroke, at Péray e September, 1653, rendered him thenceforth a paralytic. His last years were full of intense suffering, both bodily and mental, which he bore with the utmost sweetness and resignation. They were years of prayer, but indeed the whole life of this servant of God, despite its immense external activity, was a prayer; and his principal devotion was to the inner life of Christ. His visions and his mysticism caused the Jansenists to ridicule him as a visionary; but they, as well as all others, acknowledged his sanctity and the angular purity of his intentions. His numerous ascetical writings show him a profound master of spiritual doctrine, and well deserve a close study. His great friend, St. Vincent de Paul, who was with him at his death, considered him a saint; and Father Faber, in his "Growth in Holiness" (Baltimore ed., p. 376) says of him: "Of all the uncanonical servants of God whose lives I have read, he most resembles a canonized Saint." OLINDA, Diocese of, in the north-east of Brazil, suffragan of São Salvador de Bahia. Erected into a vicariate Apostolic by Paul V (15 July, 1614), who also appointed as its priest-auxiliary of São Luís do Maranhão, Olinda was created a bishopric by Innocent XI on 22 November, 1676 (Constitution "Ad Sacram"). Its most distinguished prelate was Thomas of the Incarnation (1747–68), author of "Historia ecclesiae Lusitanae" (Coimbra, 1768). From its original territory Leo XIII erected the Sees of Parahyba (1892) and Alagás (1900). It is now coextensive with the State of Pernambuco, lying between 7° and 10° 45' S. latitude, and 44° 38' and 42° 10' W. longitude, having an area of 49,575 square miles. The maritime regions are low, fertile, and well settled: the hinterland forms a plateau 500 to 700 feet high, is arid, and sparsely populated. The episcopal city was originally Olinda, founded by Duarte Coelho Pereira in 1534. It was held by the Dutch from 1630 till 1654, who established, a few miles south, a new capital, Mortitzacht, now known as Recife. In 1661, Pernambuco, an important seaport having a population of 190,000. The episcopal residence has been transferred thither, to the section called Boa Vista. Pernambuco has a university (founded by the Sisters of Mercy), a college, and many churches, the first being dedicated to Nossa Senhora da Conceição. Outside the city are the pilgrimages of Nossa Senhora dos Prazeres and Nossa Senhora de Monte. The Benedictine abbey founded by Olier was re-established on 15 August, 1885, from Beuron in Hohenzollern, and is in personal union with the abbey founded at Parahyba in 1905. The present Bishop of Olinda, Mgr. Luis Raymundu da Silva Brito (b. at São Bento do Peri, 24 Aug., 1840; ordained, 19 July, 1864; elected, 18 Feb., 1901), succeeded Mgr. Manuel dos Santos Pereira (b. 1827; consecrated, 1863). The diocese contains 81 parishes, 350filial churches and chapels, 88 secular and 22 regular priests; the population is 1,178,000, all Catholics, except about 4000 Protestants.

OLIVA, a suppressed Cistercian abbey near Danzig in Pomerania, founded with the assistance of the dukes of Pomerania some time between 1170–78. After the extinction of the dukes of Pomerania in 1295, Oliva became part of Poland. From 1309–1466 it was under the sovereignty of the Teutonic Order; from 1446–1722 it again formed part of Poland; from 1722–1807 it belonged to Prussia; from 1807–14 to the free city Danzig. In 1831 it was suppressed; the abbey church, a three-naved brick structure in the Romanesque and Gothic style, became the Catholic parish church of the town of Oliva; and nearly all the other buildings were torn down. In 1224 and in 1234 the abbey was burnt down and its monks killed by the heathen Prussians; in 1350 it was destroyed by fire; in 1433 it was pillaged and partly torn down by the Hussites; in 1577 it was pillaged and almost entirely destroyed by the Protestant soldiers of Danzig. In 1626 and in 1636 it was pillaged and burnt by the Swedes. The monks of Oliva have been powerful factors in the Christianization of north-eastern Germany. The dukes of Pomerania and the Teutonic Order liberally rewarded them with large tracts of land.

When Oliva came under the sovereignty of Poland in 1466, it refused to join the Polish province of Cistercia, because most of its monks were Germans.
When about 1500 it asserted its exemptions from the jurisdiction of the bishop of Lescar, the Holy See decided in its favour. Its discipline suffered severely from 1538-1736, because by a degree of the Diet of Potsdam only noblemen could be elected abbots; and especially because from 1557-1736 these abbots were appointed by the Polish kings. An impetus to reform was given by Abbot Edmund of Castigliane, who was sent as visitor. He joined Oliva to the Polish Province, and in 1580 drew up new statutes for the two provinces. But under the Prussian rule the king assumed the right of appointing the abbots and a new period of decline began which continued until the suppression.

Oliva, Gian Paolo, b. at Genoa, 4 October, 1600; d. at Rome, at Sant' Andrea Quirinale, 26 November, 1631. In 1616, he entered the Society of Jesus, in which he excelled by rare intellectual powers, learning, and sanctity. A famous pulpit orator, he was Apostolic Preacher of the Palace under Innocent X, Alexander VII, Clement IX, and Clement X. In 1661, during the critical period of the Provost General Father Goswin Nickel, the general congregation elected him vicar-general with the right of succession. He went to Paris and preached there the new missionizing, the first in Europe, especially in Japan. His book of forty-odd sermons for Lent, and his work of six folio volumes, "In selecta Scriptura Loca Ethica Commentationes," printed at Lyons, evince his scholarship and piety. He was keen interested in the events of his time. Remembering what had happened to Cardinal Pallavicino, Oliva printed one thousand of his letters, in order that they might not be printed by others and be misconstrued.

LUIGI TACCHI VENTURI.

Olivaunt, Pierre, was b. in Paris, 22 Feb., 1816. His father, a man of repute, but an unbeliever and imbittered by reverses of fortune and career, died in 1835 without having returned to the faith. He was survived by his wife, also without religion, and three children. At twenty Pierre left home, and the College of Charlemagne, where he had made a brilliant course of studies, imbued him with the doctrines of Voltaire. His heart, however, had remained remarkably pure, and he writes at this time: "I desire, if by any possibility I should become a priest, to be a missionary, and if I am a missionary to be a martyr." In 1836 Pierre entered the Normal School, and, where so many lose their faith, conversion awaited him. Led away at first by Beau of Buchan, his neo-Catholicism, then won by the sermons of Lacordaire, he made his profession of faith to Father de Ravigan (1837), and from that time became an apostle. At the Normal School he formed a Catholic group which by the piety and charity soon attracted attention and respect. The Conferences of St. Vincent de Paul attracted at that time the élite of the schools, and Olivaunt with twelve of his companions established them in the parish of Saint-Médard. By the instruction of the heroic youths symbolized the religious renaissance in France. In 1836, Olivaunt heard that Lacordaire was going to restore the Dominican Order in France. Several of his friends had already decided to follow the great orator. He wished to follow him also, but was detained by the duty of supporting his mother. After a year of professional study, he returned to Paris, and occupied the chair of history at the College of the Young Greek de la Rochefoucauld.

In 1842 Olivaunt won the junior fellowship in a history competition. His lecture was on Gregory VII, and M. Saint-Marc Girardin closed the Assembly with these words: "We have just heard virtue, pleasing the cause of virtue." At this time war was declared against the Jesuits. Quinet and Michelet changed their lectures into impassioned declarations against the society. On 2 May, 1845, M. Thiers was to conduct before the Assembly an interpellation against these religious. Olivaunt saw that it was his duty to be present. "I hesitated," he said to Louis Veuillot, "I hesitate no longer. M. Thiers shows me my duty. I must follow it. I enter today." And the day of the proposed interpellation he entered the novitiate of Laval.

This sacrifice was hard for Madame Olivaunt who as yet had not been converted by the virtues of her son. After a year's fervent novitiate he was made professor of history at the College of Bruges in Belgium. On 18 April, 1847, he made his first vows, and on the completion of theological studies received Holy Orders. In the meanwhile the Law of 1850 had established, in France, the right of controlling education. Pierre Olivaunt was summoned to Paris, where he remained. On 3 April, 1852, Pierre arrived at the College of Vaugirard of which the Jesuits had accepted charge. He was to spend thirteen years here, first as professor and then as rector of studies. As a model teacher, he trained the heart as well as the mind, and by his exhausting energy, added to the direction of his college, many works of zeal, among others "L'Œuvre de l'Enfant Jésus pour la première communion des jeunes filles pauvres" and "L'Œuvre de Saint François-Xavier", for the workmen of the parish of Vaugirard.

After twenty-five years devoted to teaching, Father Olivaunt was named Superior of the House in Paris (1865). He accepted this burden with courage, and displayed an unbounded zeal. An indefatigable preacher and director, he exercised by his sanctity an irresistible influence over all. His mother yielded to him and under his direction, Madame Olivaunt compared by a life of prayer for a very holy death. In the meantime the spirit of revolt agitated Paris, and spread throughout France. The religious Renaissance of the nineteenth century, in which Pierre Olivaunt had been an example, called forth a retaliation of evil. In January, 1870, Father Olivaunt wrote "Persecution is upon us; it will be terrible: we will pass through torrents of blood." On the descent of Rome by the emperor he followed the disaster of the French troops. The investment of Paris was planned, and to those who urged him to fly Father Olivaunt replied that "I was the post of danger. The most formidable danger impending was the commune, now mistress of Paris. "Let us be generous and ready for sacrifice," said Father Olivaunt. "France must have the blood of the pure to raise her again; which one of us, indeed, is worthy to offer his life, and what a joy should we be chosen." He was chosen. On 4 April, 1871, the fédérés arrested Mgr Darboy and several others. On the fifth, they took possession of the house on the Rue des Sèvres and Father Olivaunt quietly gave himself up. On 24 May, Mgr Darboy and five other prisoners were executed; on the twenty-sixth, fifty-two victims, Father Olivaunt marching at their head, were dragged through Paris and massacred in the Rue Haxo. The day after this melancholy charity and faith this outrage was overturned. The remains of Father Olivaunt and the four priests who fell with him (Fathers Du Couedray, Caubert, Clerc, etc. de Bengy) were placed in a chapel in the Rue de Sèvres, where the pious faithful still continue to invoke them, and numberless groves have been set up in their intercession.

Oliver, GEORGE, b. at Newington in Surrey in 1781; d. at Exeter in 1861. After studying for some years at the Sedgley Park School, he entered Stonyhurst in 1796, went through the full training, and taught "humanities" for five years. Having been ordained priest in 1806, he was sent the following year to the mission formerly belonging to the Jesuits at Exeter, where he spent the remainder of his life. He was not, however, himself a Jesuit; for during his Stonyhurst days the Society had no canonical existence in England, and although the members of the community kept the rule of St. Ignatius so far as was compatible with their circumstances, in the hope of a future restoration of the Society, they continued to rank as secular priests. When the restoration of the Society took place, Oliver did not join it, but lived and died as a secular priest. As a student of archaeology he acquired considerable fame, and although some of his conclusions are not accepted at the present day, yet concerning the limited sources of knowledge which were available when he lived, his researches show both industry and judgment. Most of his work had a local bearing. He became a well-known authority on the history and antiquities of Devonshire, about which he wrote several standard works.

The one which is best known to Catholics in general is his Collections containing numerous biographical notices of Catholics, both clergy and laity, in the West of England. On the re-establishment of the hierarchy, when the Plymouth Chapter was erected (1852), Oliver was nominated as provost. He had already retired from active work, but continued to reside in his old house until his death. Among his works are: "The Monasteries of Devon" (1820); "History of Exeter" (1821); "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Devon" (1828, 2nd edition, much changed, 1839); "Collections of the View of Devonshire in 1630" (1845); "Monasticon Diocesis Exoniensis" (1846); "Collections illustrating the history of the Catholic Religion" etc. (1857); "Lives of the Bishops of Exeter" (1861); numerous pamphlets and smaller works. See Brashfield's bibliography of his works, of which the frontispiece is a portrait of George Oliver.

Olivet, MOUNT (Lat. Mons olivaeus), occurring also in the English Bibles as the Mount of Olives (Mons Olivarum), is the name applied to "the hill that is over against Jerusalem" (II Kings, ix, 7), that is, "on the east side of the city" (Ezech., xi, 23), beyond the torrent Cedron (II Kings, xv, 23, 30), "a sabbath day's journey" from the city (Acts, i, 12). The passage of the books of the Kings shows the high antiquity of the name, undoubtedly suggested by the groves of olive trees which flourished there, traces of which still remain. In the Middle Ages it was called by Arabic writers: Tûr es-Zeitûn, Tûr Zeitâ, or Jebel Tûr Zeitûn, of which the modern name, Jebel et-Tur, appears to be an abbreviation. Mt. Olivet is not so much a hill as a range of hills separated by low depressions. The range includes, from N. to S., the Râs el-Shair (Scopus, 2963 ft.,) an elevated plateau, Râs el-Mabâse (2990 ft.), and Râs el-Tel el-Shâ (2963 ft.), south of the latter, between the old and the new road from Jerusalem to Jericho, is the Jebel el-Tur, or Mt. Olivet proper, rising in three summits called by Christians, respectively: the Men of Galilee (Karem es-Sâyyâd, "the vineyard of the hunter"), 2732 ft., the Ascension (on which the village Kafir es-Tûr is built), and the Prophet, a spur of the preceding, owing its name to the old rock-tombs known as the Tombs of the Prophets; south-west of the new road to Jericho, the range terminates in the Jebel Batn el-Hâwâ, called by Christians the Mount of Olives, tradition locating there Solomon's idolatrous shrine (IV Kings, xxxiii, 13).

Mt. Olivet has been the scene of many famous events of Biblical history. In David's time there was there a holy place dedicated to Yahweh; its exact location is not known; but it was near the road to the Jordan, possibly on the summit of the Karem es-Sâyâd (II Kings, xv, 32). The site of the village of Bahurim (II Kings, iii, 16) lay no doubt on the same road. We have already mentioned the tradition pointing to the Jebel Batn el-Hâwâ as the place where Solomon erected his idolatrous shrine destroyed by Josiah (II Kings, x, 7; IV Kings, xxxiii, 13); this identification is supported by the Targum which suggests in IV Kings, xxxiii, 13, the reading, "Mount of Oil," a good synonym of Mt. Olivet, instead of the traditional, "Mount of Olives," found nowhere else. Accordingly the idolatrous shrines were on the south side of Mt. Olivet proper. Finally we learn from the Jewish rabbis that the Mount of Oil was the traditional place for sacrificing the red heifer (Num., xix, cf. Maimonides, "The red heifer," iii, 1). But to Christians especially is Mt. Olivet a most hallowed place, because it was, during the last days of Our Lord's public life, the preferred resort of the Saviour. In connexion with these spots are singled out in the Gospels: Bethania, the home of Lazarus and of Simon the Leper (Mark, iv, 3; Matt., xxvi, 6); Bethphage, whence started the triumphal procession to Jerusalem; known with some probability by Federlin with the ruins called Habalat el-Ambrâ or Kefr Abû Layn; the site of the Franciscan Chapel of Bethphage, about 1 mile west of El-Arikrieh, is not well chosen; the place where the fig-tree cursed by our Lord stood (Matt., xxi, 18-22; Mark, x, 12-14; 20-21); the spot where Jesus wept over Jerusalem (Luke, xix, 41), the site where He prophesied the destruction of the Temple, the ruin of the city and the end of the world (Matt., xxi, 34-35); the Garden of Gethsemane; lastly the place where the Lord imparted His farewell blessing to the Apostles and ascended into heaven (Luke, xix, 50-51). All these spots in this mountain ranges has, with more or less success, endeavoured to locate and to consecrate by erecting sanctuaries thereon.

Olivetans, a branch of the white monks of the Benedictine Order, founded in 1319. It owed its origin to the ascetic fervour of Giovanni Tolomei (St. Bernard Tolomei), a gentleman of Siena and professor of philosophy. He is said to have vowed himself to religion in gratitude for the recovery of his eyesight through the intercession of the Virgin. In fulfilment of this vow he left his home (1313) and went into the wilderness, to forsake the world and give himself to God. Two companions of his, Ambrogio Piccolomini and Patrizio Patrizio, accompanied him, and selected on a bit of land belonging to Tolomei. It was a mountain top, exactly suited to the eremitical life. Here they devoted themselves to austerities. Apparently they were somewhat aggressive in their asceticism; for, six years later, they were accused of heresy and summoned to give an explanation of their innovations before John XXII at Avignon. The two disciples—Tolomei remained behind—obeyed the mandate and succeeded in gaining the good-will of the Holy Father, who, however, in order to bring them into line with other monks, bade them go to Guido di Pietromala, Bishop of Arezzo, and ask him to give them a Rule which had the approbation of the Church. The bishop remembered that one of them, in a vision, Our Lady had put into his hands the Rule of St. Benedict and bade him give white habits to some persons who knew her before. He did not doubt that these monks were the Sienese hermits commended to his care by the pope. Wherefore, he clothed the three of them with white habits and gave them the Benedictine Rule and placed them under the protection of the Blessed Virgin. Tolomei took the name of Bernard and the olive-clad mountain hermitage was renamed “Monte Oliveto,” in memory of Christ’s agony and as a perpetual reminder to themselves of the life of sacrifice and expiatory penance they had undertaken.

Evidently, in what he did, the good bishop had before his mind the history of St. Romuald—there is even a repetition of the well-known “Vision of St. Romuald” in the story—and hoped, through the enthusiasm of Bernard and his monks, to witness a wide-spread monastic revival, like that which spread from the Hermitage of Camaldoli. He was not disappointed. Through the generosity of a merchant a monastery was erected at Stena; he himself built another at Arezzo; a third sprang up at Florence; and within a very few years there were establishments at Camprena, Volterra, San Geminiano, Eugubio, Foligno, and Rome. Before St. Bernard’s death from the plague in 1153— he had quitted his monastery to devote himself to the care of those stricken with the disease and died a martyr of charity—the new congregation was already great repute, as well for the number of its houses and monks as for the saintliness of its members and the rigour of its observance. Yet it never succeeded in planting itself successfully on the other side of the Alps.

St. Bernard of Pordenone’s idea of monastic reform was that which had inspired every founder of an order or congregation since the days of St. Benedict—a return to the primitive life of solitude and austerity. Severe corporeal mortifications were ordained by rule and carried out in public. The usual ecclesiastical and conventual fasts were largely increased and the daily food was bread and water. The monks slept on a straw mattress without bed-coverings, and did not lie down after the midnight Office, but continued in prayer until Prime. They wore wooden sandals and habits of the coarsest stuff. They were also fanatical total abstainers; not only was St. Benedict’s kindly concession of a hiberna of wine rejected, but the vineyards were rooted up and the wine-presses and vessels destroyed. Attention has been called to this last particular, chiefly to contrast it with a provision of the later constitutions, in which the monks are told to keep the best wine for themselves and sell the inferior product (“Meliora vina pro monachorum usu serventur, pejora vendantur”) and, should they have to buy wine, to purchase only the better quality (“si vinum emendum erit, emetur illud; good melius erit”).

Truly, relaxation was inevitable. It was never reasonable that the heroic austerities of St. Bernard and his companions should be made the rule, then and always, for every monk of the order. But the mandate concerning the quality of the wine chiefly aimed to remove any excuse for differential treatment of the monks in meat and drink. Where everything on the table was of exceptional quality, there could be no reason why anyone should be especially provided for. It was always the custom for each one to dilute the wine given him. Though the foundation of the Olivetans was not professedly an introduction of constitutional reform among the Benedictines, it had that result. They were a new creation and hence, as we may say, up-to-date. They had a superior general, like the friars, and official of the order distinct from those of the abbey. They set an example of adaptation to present needs by the frequent modification of their constitutions at the general chapters, and by the short term of office enjoyed by the superiors. In 1428 Gregory XII gave them the extinct monastery of St. Justina at Padua, which they occupied until the institution there of the famous Benedictine reform. This great movement, out of which the present Cistercian Congregation resulted, may, therefore, in a very literal sense, be described as having followed in the footsteps of the Olivetans. At the present day, the Order of Our Lady of Mount Olivet numbers only 10 monasteries and 122 brethren.

Olivetan, Pierre Jean (Petrus Johannis), Spiritual Franciscan and theological author, b. at Sérgnac, Diocese of Béziers, 1248; d. at Narbonne, 15 March, 1298. At twelve he entered the Friars Minor at Béziers, and later took the baccalaureate at Paris. Returning to his native province, he soon distinguished himself by his strict observance of the rule and his theological knowledge. When Nicholas III prepared his Decretal “Exiit” (1279), Olivet, then at Rome, was asked to express his opinion with regard to Franciscan poverty (sua pauper). Unfortunately there was then in the conduct of Franciscan poverty a controvery about the stricter or laxer observance of the rule. Olivet soon became the principal spokesman of the rigorists, and met with strong opposition on the part of the community. At the General Chapter of Strasbourg (1282) he was accused of heresy, and henceforward almost every general chapter concerned itself with him. His doctrine was examined by seven friars, graduates of the University of Paris (see Anal. Franc., III, 374–75), and censured in thirty-four propositions, whereupon his writings were confiscated (1283). Olivet cleverly defended himself in several responses (1283–85), and finally the General Chapter of Montpellier (1287) decided in his favour. The new general, Matthew of Aquasparta, sent him as lector in theology to the convent of Sta. Croce, Florence, whence Matthew’s successor, Raymond Gaufredi, sent him as lector to Montpellier. At the General Chapter of Paris (1292) Olivet again gave explanations, which were apparently satisfactory. He spent his last years in the convent of Narbonne and died, surrounded by his friends, after an earnest profession of his Catholic Faith (published by Wadding ad a. 1297, n. 33).

Peace, however, was not obtained by his death. His friends, friars and seculars, showed an exaggerated veneration for their leader, and honoured his tomb as that of a saint; on the other hand the General Chapter of Lyons (1299) ordered his writings to be collected and burnt as heretical. The General Council of Vienne (1312), in the Decretal “Fidei catholice dumento” (Bull Franc., V, 86), established the Catholic doctrine against three points of Olivet’s teaching, without mentioning the author; these points referred to: (1) the moment Our Lord’s body was transfigured by the lance, (2) the manner in which the body was caused to return to the body, (3) the baptism of infants. In 1318 the friars went so far as to destroy Olivet’s tomb, and in the next year two further steps were taken against him: his writings were absolutely forbidden by the General Chapter of Marseilles, and a special commission of theologians examined Olivet’s “Postilla in Apocalypse” and marked out sixty sentences, chiefly justchimistical extravagances (see Joachim of Flora. For text see Balussi-Mansi, "Miscellanea", II, Lucau, 1761, 255-70; cf. also Denifle, "Chartularium Universitatis Parisiensis", II, I, Paris, 1891, 238-9). It was only in 1588 that the heresy was really condemned by Pope Paul V, and the sentence pronounced by the French province against Jean XXII, when the fact that Louis the Bavarian used Olivieri's writings in his famous Apelle of Sachsenhausen (1324) had again drawn attention to the author. Olivieri's fate was a hard one, but was perhaps deserved in view of his theological incorrectness. Still Father Ehrle, the most competent judge on this point, considers (Archiv, III, 440) that Olivieri was not the impious heretic he is painted in some writings of the Middle Ages, and states (Ibid., 448) that the denunciation of his theological doctrine was rather a tactical measure of the adversaries of the severe principles of poverty and reform professed by Olivieri. For the rest, Olivieri follows in many points the doctrine of St. Bonaventure. The numerous but for the most part unedited works of Olivieri are appropriately divided by Ehrle into three classes: (1) Speculative Works, of which the chief is his "Questiones" (philosophical and theological), printed partly in an extremely rare edition (Venice, 1509), which contains also his defences against the Paris theologians of 1283-85 which were reprinted by Du Bocage d'Argentor, "Collectio judiciorum", (Paris, 1724), 290-34; Commentarius de Sententia; "De Sacramentis" etc. (2) Exegetical Works: Five small treatises on principles of introduction, printed under St. Bonaventure's name by Bonelli, "Sermo de op. Beati Pauli", Trent, 1775-81, 23-49, 232-47, 348-74; II, 1038-52, 1053-1113. In the same work (I, 52-251) is printed Olivieri's "Postilla in Cant. Cantici". (See S. Bonav. opera., VI, 1512-13, Prolegomena, vi-ix.) The other postilla are: Super Genesis, Job, Psalterium, Proverbia, Ecclesiasten, Lamentationes Jeremiae, Ecclesiæ, Prophetas minorae, on the Four Gospels, Ep. ad Romae, etc. [see index, p. 15. Abend. Schriften zum Luther .... (Rom., i, 17) und justificatio (Mainz, 1905), 156 sq.], ad Corinthios, in epistolae Canonicæ, in Apocalypse; (3) Works on observation of Franciscan Rule (see Francis, Rule of Saint).

OLIVIER. Olivier de la Marche, chronicler and poet. b. 1498, at the Château de la Marche, in Franche-Comté; d. at Brussels, 1501. He was knighted by Count de Chorolais, later Charles the Bold (1465). Two years later Count de Chorolais became ruler of Burgundy and Flanders, and made Olivier bailiff of Amont (now a department of the Haute-Saône) and captain of his guards. Taken prisoner at the battle of Nancy, where the duke lost his life (1477), he regained his liberty by paying a ransom, and rejoined Marie, daughter of Duke Charles and heiress of Burgundy, who made him her maître d'hôtel.

As a writer he is best known by his "Mémoirs", which cover the years from 1435-92, first printed at Lyons in 1539 in a Latin edition, by Hesneau and d'Arboumont, was made for the Société de l'Histoire de France (1883-88). The work is singular and important for a knowledge of the period. The author is sincere, but his style contains many Walloon expressions and, as in his other writings, he introduces too many descriptions of fêtes and tournaments. Most of his works are in verse. Among these are: "Le Chevalier Délibéré", a poem which some think is his own biography, others that it is an allegorical life of Charles the Bold; "Le Parement et le Triomphe des Dames d'Honneur", a work in prose and verse, of which each of the twenty-six chapters is named from some articles of lady's attire; and "La Source du monde; ou qui veut se prouver la corporelle éloquence des Dames". Among his prose works are: "Traité et Avis de quelques gentilhommes sur les duel et gages de bataille", and "Traité de la Maîtrise de célébrer la noble fête de la Toison d'Or".

OLÉ-LAPRUNE, Léon, French Catholic philosopher, b. in 1839; d. at Paris, 19 Feb., 1898. Under the influence of the philosopher Caro and of Père Gratry's book "Les Sources", Ollé-Laprun, after exceptionally brilliant studies at the Ecole Normale Supérieure (1855 to 1861), devoted himself to philosophy. His life was spent in teaching a philosophy illuminated by the light of Catholic faith, first in the lycées and then in the Ecole Normale Supérieure from 1878. As Ossian had been a Catholic professor of history and foreign literature in the university, Ollé-Laprun's aim was to be a Catholic professor of philosophy there. Père de Régnon, the Jesuit theologian, wrote to him: "I am glad to think that God will in our time to revive the lay apostolate, as in the time of Athanasius; it is you especially who give me these thoughts." The Government of the Third Republic was now and then urged by a certain section of the faculty of Ollé-Laprun, but the repute of his philosophical teaching protected him. For one year only (1881-82), after organizing a manifestation in favour of the expelled congregations, he was suspended from his chair by Jules Ferry, and the first to sign the protest addressed by his students to, the minister on behalf of their professor was the future socialist deputy Jean Jaurès, then a student at the Ecole Normale Supérieure.

Ollé-Laprun's first important work was "La philosophie de Malebranche" (1870). Ten years later to obtain the doctorate he defended before the Sorbonne a thesis on moral certainty. As against the exaggerations of Cartesian rationalism and Positivist determinism he investigated the part of the will and the heart in the phenomenon of belief. This work resembles in many respects Newman's "Grammar of Assent"; but Ollé-Laprun must not, any more than the English cardinal, be held responsible for subsequent tendencies which have sought to diminish the share of the intelligence in the act of faith and to separate completely the domain of belief from that of knowledge. "Essai sur la morale d'Aristote" (1881) Ollé-Laprun defended the "Eudémonisme" of the Greek philosopher against the Kantian theories; and in "La philosophie et le temps présent" (1890) he vindicated, against Deistic spiritualism, the right of the Christian thinker to go beyond the data of "natural religion" and illuminate philosophy by the data of revealed religion. One of his most influential works was the "Prix de la vie" (1894), wherein he shows why life is worth living. The advice given by Leo XIII to the Catholics of France found in Ollé-Laprun an active champion. His brochure "Ce qu'on va chercher à Rome" (1895) was one of the best commentaries on the papal policy. The Academy of Moral and Political Sciences elected him a member of the philosophical section in 1897 to succeed Vacherot. His articles and conferences at this growing influence in Catholic life. He became a leader of Christian activity, consulted and heard by all until his premature death when he was about to finish a book on Jouffroy (Paris, 1899). Many of his articles have been collected by Ceyrat under the title "La Vitalité chrétienne" (1901). Here will also be found a series of his unedited meditations, which by a noteworthy coincidence bore the future motto of Pius X, "Omnia instaurare in Christo".
for maltreating John, but declined to give up the fief of Bodovin, whereupon the pope asked Vratislav to expel Jaromir, by force if necessary.

Among the bishops of Olmütz, during the later Middle Ages the following are prominent: Heinrich (called Zdek after his birthplace) transferred his see to the church of St. Wenceslaus, which had been twenty-four years in construction, and at Easter, 1138, took the Premonstratensian habit in the church of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem. Bishop Raim, in 1193, while ordaining priests and deacons at Prague, forgot the imposition of hands. His successor, Engelbert, corrected this omission two years later; but the Cardinal-Deacon Petrus declared the ordination null and void, and caused it to be repeated in its entirety in 1197. When the legate attempted to enforce a strict observance of the laws relating to celibacy, he was expelled from the country; the laws of the Church, however, were henceforth more strictly observed. During the time that Moravia was joined to Bohemia, the Duke of Bohemia appointed the Bishop of Olmütz. In 1182 Moravia became independent, and thereafter the margraves of Moravia exercised the right of appointment. Preysyl Ottokar I, in 1207, granted to the Church of Olmütz freedom from taxes and to the chapter the right of electing the bishop. Innocent III confirmed this grant. After the death of Ottokar II, Rudolph of Hapsburg appointed Bishop Bruno regent in Moravia. Charles IV, in 1343, made Prague the metropolitan see for Leitomischl and Olmütz. The bishopric, as a vassal principality of the Bohemian crown, was the peer of the margrave of Moravia, and from 1365 its prince-bishop was Count of the Bohemian Chapel, i.e., first court chaplain who was to accompany the monarch on his frequent travels. In 1380 the cathedral and the residence of the prince-bishop were both destroyed by fire. During this period the following orders were established: the Premonstratensians (Hradisch, Klosterbrück); Cistercians (Velevrad); the Franciscans and the Dominicans during the lives of their founders; the Teutonic Knights. On the other hand there arose the sects of the Albigenses, Flagellants, Waldensians (Apostolic Brethren, Brethren of the Holy Cross, Joachimites (Bohemian Brethren, Grubenheimer, Piéardians). Thus it happened that Protestantism found a well-prepared field. Lutheranism was preached by Speratus at Iglau; Hubmaier and Hutter were baptists. Exiled from Switzerland and Germany, the Anabaptists came in droves into Moravia; Lotharius Socinus, on his homeward journey from Poland to Turin, successfully sowed the seed of Socianism. Bishop Dubravsky (Dubravina), famous as an author and historian, encouraged the disheartened Catholic (1553). The thirty-three volumes of his history of Bohemia, his five books on fish-raising (Piscologia), and the work entitled "Ueber das heilige Messopfer" justify his reputation.

The Reform movement was finally arrested by the Jesuits. Three of them reached Olomütz in 1566 and rapidly acquired influence and power. Bishop Frasinski granted them a convent and turned over to them the schools as well as the projected university. At a synod strict orders and regulations were adopted. His fourth successor, Pavlovsky, accomplished wondering carrying out the decrees of the Council of Trent. Rudolph II conferred upon him the title of duke and prince and made him a member of the royal chapel. The canons whom he gathered at Olomütz were distinguished for learning and virtue. The most important bishop of this see during the Reformation period was Cardinal Franz Dietrichstein (d. 1636), son of Adam, major-domo of the imperial household. He governed the see for thirty-seven years, and accompanied the elector to the diet as statecounsellor and ecclesiastical. His work, of course, met with considerable opposition. He was imprisoned at Brünn, and the See of Olomütz was abolished. Johannes Sarkander, parish priest of Holleschau, became a martyr for the secrecy of the confessional at Olomütz, 17 March, 1620, and in 1860 he was canonized. Better days soon appeared. The title of prince was conferred on both the cardinal and his brother, whose descendants were to inherit the title. Amos Comenius (Komensky), the last "senior" of the Bohemian Brethren, fled to Poland. Pre-eminent as a pedagogue his influence was felt later on the intellectual life of the country. Dietrichstein was succeeded by Archbishop Leopold Wilhelm, son of Ferdinand II, and by Charles Joseph, son of Ferdinand III. In 1663 Charles Joseph was elected Bishop of Breslau and Olomütz, with a dispensation from Alexander VII, as he was scarcely fourteen years of age; but died the following year. In 1689 Charles, son of Duke Charles of Lorraine, at the age of twenty-three, became sub-deacon and exercised the administrative power in temporal affairs; four years later he obtained the spiritual administration. The dissolution of the Society of Jesus in 1773 affected three hundred and sixty-eight professors in nine colleges of Moravia. In the same year Clement XIV withdrew from the chapter the right of electing its bishop; it was restored, however, by Pius VI.

Maria Theresa, in 1777, raised Olomütz to the dignity of an archbishopric, and subordinated to it the newly-founded See of Brünn. The archdiocese was divided into eight archpriestries and fifty-two deaneries. When the toleration edict of Joseph II appeared in 1781, whole districts forsook the Church. The inhabitants since the Counter-Reformation had been Protestants in secret. The emperor therefore ordered those desirous of renouncing the Catholic belief to make known in person their intention to the Commission on Religion. When Emperor Joseph II began the dissolution of the monasteries, there were in Moravia and Silesia two thousand monks in eighty-three houses. From the sale of this ecclesiastical property, the so-called "Religion Fund", many parishes were established, three in Olomütz alone. In the rural parts the parishes were not to be more than four miles apart. The parish priests received a stipend of four hundred florins, a local chaplain three hundred florins, and an assistant the brilliant chancellor Kutscher. The third Archbishop of Olomütz was Archduke Rudolph, brother of Emperor Francis. Cardinal Maximilian Joseph, Freiherr von Someren-Beckh, had, in 1948, as his adviser and assistant, the brilliant chancellor Kutscher. On 2 December of the same year, in the throne room of the prince-archbishop's residence, Francis Joseph assumed the imperial sceptre. While the Austrian Parliament sat at Kremsier, Olomütz was the political capital of Austria. Eighty years old, Someren-Beckh attended the great assembly of bishops in Vienna in 1849. Here he proposed by legal enactment to abolish the rule requiring every member of the Olmitz chapter to be of noble birth, because this rule was contrary to the spirit of Christianity and the laws of the Church, and an injustice to the untitled clergy of the diocese. The Olmitz chapter for a long time opposed this proposition both at Rome and at the imperial court, but without success. The two last prince-bishops have also been commoners. Cardinal Fürstenberg rebuilt in splendid Gothic style the cathedral with its three arcades of the Council of Trent. Rudolph II conferred upon him the title of duke and prince and made him a member of the royal chapel. The canons whom he gathered at Olomütz were distinguished for learning and virtue. The most important bishop of this see during the Reformation period was Cardinal Franz Dietrichstein (d. 1636), son of Adam, major-domo of the imperial household. By force of ability he secured a position as a brilliant pleader. His first real success was as a substitute for O'Connell on the day of the memorable duel between O'Connell and D'Esteere (1815); from 1820 to 1830 many cases came from O'Connell through whose influence O'Loghlin was appointed solicitor general for Ireland in 1834, the first Catholic since James II. He was also elected M.P. for Dungarvan, and when Perrin was elevated to the Bench in 1835, he was made attorney general. A year later he succeeded Sir William Cusack Smith as baron of the exchequer—the first Catholic judge for almost one hundred and fifty years. Finally, in 1837, on the death of Sir William MacMahon he was given the Irish mastership of the rolls, which he held till his death. As master of the rolls he effected many legal Several ancient authors knew that this was only a natural phenomenon. (The Turks call it Yanar-Tash— Burning Stone.) OMAHA, DIocese of (Omahaensis), embraces all that part of the State of Nebraska north of the southern shore of the South Platte River. Area, 52,996 sq. miles.

EARLY MISSIONARIES.—The first missionaries in Ne- braskas were priests of the Society of Jesus, who, from about 1838, occasionally visited the native Indians, many of whom received baptism. In 1851 the Holy See cut off from the Diocese of St. Louis all the country north from the south line of Kansas to the Canadian border, and west from the Missouri River to the Rocky Mountains, and erected it into the Vicariate of the Rocky Mountains, with Rt. Rev. John B. Milge, S.J., as first Vicar Apostolic (see LEAVER- worth). On 6 January, 1857, this vicariate was again divided, and a new vicariate called the Vicariate of Nebraska was erected, Bishop Milge being authorized to govern it until the appointment of a resident Vicar Apostolic of Nebraska.

The first resident Vicar Apostolic was the Right Rev. James Miles O'Gorman, D.D., b. near Ennag, Co. Tipperary, Ireland, 1804, took the Trappist habit at Mount Mellery, Co. Waterford, 1 Nov., 1829, and was ordained priest, 1843. He was one of the band who came to Dubuque, Iowa, in 1849 to establish New Mellery (see Cistercians). In 1859 he was ap- pointed Vicar Apostolic of Nebraska, and on 8 May of the same year was consecrated titular Bishop of Raphanps by Archbishop Kenrick of St. Louis. The vicariate at this time embraced the present State of Nebraska, the Dakotas west of the Missouri River, Wyoming, and Montana east of the Rocky Mountains. On his arrival at Omaha, Bishop O'Gorman found in his vast jurisdiction a Catholic population of some three hundred families of white settlers living along the river counties, and a few thousand Indians, chiefly in Montana. There were in the entire territory, two seculars, and one Jesuit priest in Montana in charge of the native tribes.

During the fifteen years of his episcopate Bishop O'Gorman laboured to provide for the needs of his scattered flock. He placed priests in the more important centres of population, and in the sixties, priests of the vicariate ministered to the Catholics of Western Iowa. During his administration the Sis- ters of Mercy were established at Omaha, the Bene- dictines in Nebraska City, and the Sisters of Charity in Helena, Montana. At his death (1873) his jurisdiction contained 19 priests, 20 churches, and a Catholic population of 11,722.

The second Vicar Apostolic was the Right Rev. James O'Connor, D.D., b. at Queenstown, Ireland, 10 Sept. 1823. At the age of fifteen he came to America. He was educated at St. Charles's Seminary, Philadelphia, and in the Propaganda College, Rome, where he was ordained priest in 1848. The following year he was appointed rector of St. Michael's Seminary, Pittsburg, and in 1862 rector of St. Charles's Seminary, Overbrook, Pennsylvania. In 1872 he was appointed pastor of St. Dominic's Church, Ombus, titular see and suffragan of Ptolemais in Thessalia Secunda. The city is located by Ptolemy (IV, v, 32) in the nome of Thesprotia, in the district named by the “Itinerarium Antonini” (165); Juvenal (XV, 35); the “Notitia dignitatum”; Heroedes (Synecdemus) etc. As late as the Ptolemaic epoch it was a city, only a small garrison town built on a high plateau to protect the lower course of the Nile. It became afterwards the capital of the nomes Ombit, then of the southern province of Egypt instead of Elephantine (see in “Ptolemaic Geography” ed. Muller, I, 725, note 4, the epigraphic texts relating to this name). Ombus was situated 30 miles north of Syene. Its history is unknown. Le Quen (“Oriens christ.”, II, 513) mentions two of its bishops, contemporaries of the patriarch Theophilus. Another is noted in an inscription of the seventh century (Lefèvre, “Recueil des inscriptions grecques chrétiennes d’Egypte”, Cairo, 1907, no. 561). The city was discovered in the ruins of Roman, a temple of the Ptolemaic epoch could be seen there but it was destroyed in 1893; it had replaced a sanctuary of the epoch of Thothmes III.

O’Meara, Kathleen, novelist and biographer, b. in Dublin, 1839; d. in Paris, 10 Nov., 1888; daughter of Dennis O’Meara of Tipperary, and grand-daughter of Barry Edward O’Meara, surgeon in the British navy, and medical attendant to Napoleon at St. Helena. When about five years old, she accompanied her parents to Paris, which she made her home. She visited the United States in the early eighties. In 1867 she published, under the pen-name of Grace Ramsay, her first novel, “A Woman’s Trials” (London, 1867). This did not meet with success, which came to her only later in life, after hard work. Mindful of her early struggles, she was ever ready with encouragement to young writers. Of her six novels, “Narks, a Story of Russian Life” is probably the best. Great social problems, such as poverty and suffering, are handled in a large-hearted sympathetic way. The problem is stated in an unobtrusive manner and the solution offered in the old yet new method of Christian charity. Throughout them all there runs a wholesome spirit, remarkable for purity of tone and delicacy of feeling.

Her best work, however, is in biography, for which, it has been said, she had a genius. "The Bells of the Sanctuary" (1st, 2nd, and 3rd series) contain a num-

Holmesburg, Pennsylvania. In 1876 he was appointed Vicar Apostolic of Nebraska, and on 20 August of the same year he was consecrated titular Bishop of Dibona by Bishop Ryan of St. Louis. During his episcopate the vicariate developed with wonderful rapidity. The construction of the Union Pacific Railway in 1867, and more especially the extension of the Burlington Railway in the seventies and eighties, opened up Nebraska to colonists, and white settlers began to pour in from the eastern states. It became the duty of the new vicar to provide for the growing needs of the faithful, and the yearly statistics of the vicariate show how successful he was in his labours. In 1880 the Dakotas were erected into a vicariate, and on 7 April, 1887, Montana was cut off.

Diocese of Omaha.—On 2 October, 1885, the vicariate was erected into the Diocese of Omaha, and Bishop O’Connor was appointed its first bishop. The new diocese embraced the present States of Nebraska and Wyoming. On 2 August, 1887, the Dioceses of Cheyenne and Lincoln were erected, leaving Omaha its present boundaries. Through the generosity of the Creighton family, Bishop O’Connor was enabled to erect a Catholic free day college in the city of Omaha. On its completion in 1879, the bishop, who held the property in trust, deeded over the institution to the Jesuit Fathers, who are since in charge and hold the property as trustees (see CREIGHTON UNIVERSITY). Bishop O’Connor also introduced into his jurisdiction the Franciscan Province of the Poor Clares, the Religious of the Sacred Heart, the Benedictines, and the Sisters of Providence. An important work in the bishop’s life was the foundation, in conjunction with Miss Catherine Drexel, of the Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament, in 1889 (see BLESSED SACRAMENT, SISTERS OF THE; also “Indian Sentinel”, 1907). Bishop O’Connor also helped to establish a Catholic colony in Greeley Co., and in 1919 the Holy Name Confraternity, Columbus, and the National Relief Soc. of America.

The present bishop is the Right Rev. Richard Scannell, D.D., b. in the parish of Cloyne, Co. Cork, Ireland, 12 May, 1845. Having completed his classical studies in a private school at Midleton, in 1866 he entered All Hallows College, Dublin, where he was ordained priest 26 Feb., 1871. In the same year he came to the Diocese of Nashville and was appointed assistant at the cathedral. In 1878 he became rector of St. Columba’s Church in Dublin, Bath, and in 1879 rector of the cathedral. From 1880 to 1883 he was administrator of the diocese, sede vacante. In 1883 he organized St. Joseph’s parish in West Nashville and built its church. The following year he was appointed vicar-general, and on 30 Nov., 1887, was consecrated first Bishop of Concordia by Archbishop Feehan.

On 30 January, 1891, he was transferred to Omaha. During his administration the diocese shows the same wonderful growth that characterized this territory in the time of his predecessors. Parishes, parochial schools, and academies have more than doubled in number. The diocesan priests have increased from 58 to 144, and the religious from 23 to 37. The old frame churches are fast being replaced by structures of brick and stone, and a fine cathedral of the Spanish style of architecture is in process of erection. The Creighton Memorial St. Joseph’s Hospital, costing over half a million dollars, has been erected, and a new hospital—St. Catherine’s—has just been opened, a home of the Good Shepherd has been established, and Creighton University has been many times enlarged. Bishop Scannell introduced the following orders: (men) the Third Order Regular of St. Francis, which conducts a refounding college; (women) the Sisters of St. Joseph, of the Presentation of the Resurrection, of St. Benedict, of the Blessed Sacrament, of the Good Shepherd, the Dominicans, Feliciana, Ursulines, and Franciscans.

be of delightful sketches of noted Catholic men and women. "Madame Mohi, her Salon and her Friends, a Study of Social Life in Paris" (London, 1885; another edition, Boston, 1886) presents with a nice sense of discrimination a delightful picture of that unique institution, the Parisian Salon, introducing the men and women who were leaders in the social, literary, and political world. "Thomas Grant, First Bishop of Southwark" (London, 1874, besides doing justice to the character of a saint much misused, of course, gives a vivid view of the restoration of the Catholic hierarchy in England. "Frederick Ozanam, Professor at the Sorbonne, His Life and Works" (Edinburgh, 1876) is a deeply interesting narrative and is proof of the author's genius for biography. Had she written nothing else, this would entitle her to distinction. No better book can be placed in the hands of a young man to quicken his sympathies and bring out the good that is in him. Her last work "The Venerable Jean Baptiste Vianney, Curé d'Ars" (London, 1891) was not published till after her death. She was Paris correspondent of "The Tablet", and a frequent contributor to American magazines, such as the "Atlantic Monthly" and the "Ave Maria".

OMER, SAINT, b. of a distinguished family towards the close of the sixth or the beginning of the seventh century, at Guldenand, Switzerland; d. 670. After the death of his mother, he, with his father, entered the monastery of Luxeuil in the Diocese of Besançon, probably about 615. Under the direction of Saint Eustachius, Omer studied the Scriptures, in which he acquired remarkable proficiency. When King Dagobert requested the appointment of a bishop for the important city of Tournon, the episcopal See of the ancient territory of the Morini in Belig Cau, he was appointed and consecrated in 637.

Though the Morini had received the Faith from Saints Fussian and Victorics, and later Antimmund and Adelbert, nearly every vestige of Christianity had disappeared. When Saint Omer entered upon his episcopal duties the Abbots of Luxeuil sent to his assistance several monks, among whom are mentioned Sainte Berain, Mammolin, and Eulcrat, and Saint Omer had the satisfaction of seeing the true religion firmly established in a short time. About 654 he founded the Abbey of Saint Peter (now Saint Bertin's) in Sithiu, soon to equal if not surpass the old monastery of Luxeuil for the number of learned and zealous men educated there. Several years later he erected the church of Our Lady of Sithiu, with a small monastery adjoining, which he turned over to the monks of Saint Bertin. The exact date of his death is unknown, but he is believed to have died about the year 670. The place of his burial is uncertain; most probably he was laid to rest in the church of Our Lady which is now the cathedral of Saint Omer's. His feast is celebrated on 9 September—when and by whom he was raised to the altar cannot be ascertained.

OMISSION (Lat. omittere, to lay aside, to pass over) is here taken to be the failure to do something which one can and ought to do. If this happens adventitiously merely because a sin is committed. Moralists took pains formerly to show that the inaction implied in an omission was quite compatible with a breach of the moral law, for it is not merely because a person here and now does nothing that he offends, but because he neg-

OMINATE (Latin omnipotentia, from omni and poter, able to do all things is the power of God to effect whatever is not intrinsically impossible. These last words of the definition do not imply any imperfection, since a power that extends to everything possible must be perfect. The universality of the object of the Divine power is not merely relative but absolute, so that the true nature of omnipotence is not clearly expressed by saying that God can do all things that are possible to Him; it requires the further statement that all things are possible to God. The intrinsically impossible is the self-contradictory, and its mutually exclusive elements could result only in nothingness. "Hence", says St. Thomas (Summa I, Q. xxv, a. 3), "it is more exact to say that the intrinsically impossible is incapable of production, than to say that God cannot produce it." To include the contradictory within the range of omnipotence, as does the Calvinist Vossius, is to acknowledge the absurdity of the object of the Divine intellect, and nothingness as an object of the Divine will and power. "God can do all things the accomplishment of which is a manifestation of power", says Hugh of St. Victor, "and He is almighty because He cannot be powerless" (De sacram., I, ii, 22).

As intrinsically impossible must be classed: (1) Any action on the part of God which would be out of harmony with His nature and attributes. (a) It is impossible for God to sin.—Man's power of preferring evil to good is a sign not of strength, but of infirmity, since it involves the liability to be overcome by unworthy motives; not the exercise but the restraint of that power adds to the freedom and vigour of the will. "To sin", says St. Thomas, "is to be capable of failure in one's actions, which is incompatible with omnipotence" (Summa I, Q. xxv, a. 3). (b) No fall of God cannot be reversed.—From eternity the production of creatures, their successive changes, and the manner in which these would occur were determined by God's free will. If these decrees were not irrevocable, it would follow either that God's wisdom was variable or that His decisions sprang from caprice. Hence theologians distinguish between the absolute and the ordinary, and regulated, power of God (potentia absoluta; potentia ordinaria). The same is not true of God extends to all that is not intrinsically impossible, while the ordinary power is regulated by the Divine decrees. Thus by His absolute power God could preserve man from death; but in the present order this is impossible, since He has decreed otherwise.
(c) The creation of an absolutely best creature or of an absolutely greatest number of creatures is impossible, because the Divine power is inexhaustible.—It is sometimes objected that this aspect of omnipotence involves the contradiction that God cannot do all that He can do; but the argument is sophistical; it is no contradiction to assert that God can realize whatever is possible, but that no number of actualized possibilities exhausts His power. (2) Another class of intrinsic impossibilities includes all that would simultaneously connot mutually repellent elements, e. g. a square circle, an infinite creature, etc. God cannot effect the non-existence of actual events of the past, for it is contradictory that the same thing that has happened should also not have happened.

Omnipotence is perfect power, free from all mere potentiality. Hence, although God does not bring into external being all that He is able to accomplish, His power must not be understood as passing through successive stages before its effect is accomplished. The activity of God is simple and eternal, without evolution or change. The transition from possibility to actuality or from act to potentiality, occurs only in creation. When it is said that God can or could do a thing, the terms are not to be understood in the sense in which they are applied to created causes, but as conveying the idea of a being possessed of infinite unconditioned power, the possession of Whose activity is limited only by His sovereign Will. "Power", says St. Thomas, "is not attributed to God as a thing really different from His Knowledge and Will, but as something expressed by a different concept, since power means that which executes the command of the will and the advice of the intellect. These three (viz., intellect, will, power), coincide with one another in God" (Summa I, Q. xxv, a. 1, ad 4). Omnipotence is a sufficient power. The adaptation of means to ends in the universe does not argue, as J. S. Mill would have it, that the power of the designer is limited, but only that God has willed to manifest His glory by a world so constituted rather than by another. Indeed the production of secondary causes, capable of accomplishing certain effects, requires greater power than the direct accomplishment of these same effects. On the other hand, even though no creature exists, God's power would not be barren, for creatures are not an end to God.

The omnipotence of God is a dogma of Catholic faith, contained in all the creeds and defined by various councils (cf. Denzinger-Bonet, "Enchiridion," 828, 1790). In the Old Testament there are more than seventy passages in which God is called Shaddai, i. e., omnipotent. The Scriptures represent this attribute as infinite power (Job, xii, 2; Mark, x, 27; Luke, i, 37; Matt., xix, 26, etc.) which God alone possesses (Tob., xiii, 4; Eccles., i, 8; etc.). The Greek and Latin Fathers unanimously teach the doctrine of Divine omnipotence. Origen testifies to this belief when he infers the amplitude of Divine providence from God's omnipotence: "Just as we hold that God is incorporeal and omnipotent and invisible, so likewise do we confess as a certain and immutable dogma that His providence extends to all things" (Genes. Hom. 3). St. Augustine defends omnipotence against the Manichaeans, who taught that God is unable to overcome evil (Haeres. xlii and Enchir., c. 100); and he speaks of this dogma as a truth recognized even by pagans, and which no reasonable person can question (Serm. 240, de temp., c. ii). Reason itself proves the omnipotence of God. "Since every agent produces an effect similar to itself" (St. Thomas (Summa, I, Q. xxv, a. 3), "to every active power there must correspond as proper object, a category of possibilities proportioned to the cause possessing that power, e. g. the power of heating has for its proper object that which can be heated. Now Divine Being, which is the basis of Divine power, is infinite, not being limited to any category of being but containing within itself the possibility of all being. Consequently it can be considered as being contained among the absolute possibilities with respect to which God is omnipotent." (See CREATION; GOD; INFINITY; MIRACLES.)

The question of omnipotence is discussed by philosophers in works on natural theology and by theologians in the treatises on God (De Deo Unde).See also the titles of Q. xxv, IDRA, Contra Gentes, ii, ii sqq.; SCALAM, De Deo, iii, 1; HUTTER, Compendium theologii dogmatici, i (Innsbruck, 1883), 70 sqq.; FOSSER, Lehrbuch der Dogmologie (Freiberg, 1908), 143 sqq.

O'Neill, Hugh, Earl of Tyrone, b. 1540; d. at Rome, 1616; was the youngest son of Mathew, of questionble parentage, but recognized as heir by Conn, and was invested by him as the 1st Earl of Tyrone. As such he was enthroned at the court of Dungan. His title of Baron of Dungan. Shane O'Neill contested this arrangement and in the petty war which followed both Mathew and his eldest son lost their lives. His son Hugh, the youngest son, became the 2nd Earl of Dungan. His early years were spent partly in Ireland and partly at the English court, where he learned English ways and became more like an English noble than an Irish chief. He did not object even to go to the Protestant church. He was arrested, under the title of licel and died one. Camden describes him as a man "whose industry was great, his mind large and fit for the weightiest businesses... he had much knowledge in military affairs and a profound, dismembering heart, so as many deemed him born either for the great good or ill of country". In his early years he interfered but little in the quarrels and contests of the Irish chiefs, and had no share in the final overthrow of Shane O'Neill, but in 1574, he aided the Earl of Essex to lay waste the territory of O'Neill of Clanaboy, and in 1580 helped the Earl of Ormonde to crush the Geraldines. In 1583 he sat as a peer in Parliam, 2nting to the attaining of the Earl of Desmond and the confiscation of his lands; in the following year he accompanied Perrot to Ulster to put down the Antrim Scots. His loyalty to England was gratefully recognized by the viceroy and queen who conferred on him the title of Earl of Tyrone and in possession of all the lands he held by his grandfather. On his side, O'Neill undertook to provide for the sons of Shane O'Neill, to lay no "cost" (tax) on the Ulster chiefs, and to build an English fort in Tyrone. His position soon became difficult, and he went to London where he justified himself, undertaking at the same time to renounce forever the name of O'Neill, to make Tyrone a shire, with English law and English officials, and to have in it neither nuns nor priests.

At the Irish Council his enemies were the viceroy and Marshal Bagnal, whose sister he had married; but the queen censured Bagnal and recalled Fitzwilliam, appointing in his place Sir William Russell. This was in 1594, when O'Donnell, Maguire, and MacMahon were already in open rebellion. The same year O'Neill's brother joined the rebels, which caused O'Neill himself to be suspected, and when he appeared in Dublin he was charged by Bagnal with favouring the rebels, with being in league with the pope and the papists, and he was imprisoned without trial. O'Neill. Though these charges could not be proved, the queen ordered him detained; but secretly warned, he hurriedly left Dublin and the next year broke out into rebellion, provoking the most formidable with whom England had ever been called to deal, cool, wary, far-seeing, laying his plans were, never moved by passion, never boasting, skilful in the council chamber as on the battlefield. He had been allowed to have a certain number living at the queen’s expense, and none he changed readily, thus training to arms a large number of his men at the queen’s expense. Pretending he reject for roofing, he had purchased large quantities of timber. He had, in fact, built quite a community with the Ulster chiefs. Thus he took the field together unprepared, and had no difficulty in capt. Fortmore on the Blackwater, and defeating the army of the Irish and the English forces at Clontarf, thus preventing the relief of ghan. He protested, however, his loyalty to England entered into negotiations demanding the lice of Ulster freedom to practise their religion, security in their lands. These conditions being d, the war was successfully renewed in 1597. In 1597 Bagenal, sent with five thousand men to Portmore, was defeated at the mouth of the

Owens, Owen Roe, b. 1582; d. near Cavan, 6 Nov., the son of Art O'Neill and nephew of Hugh, the Earl of Tyrone. He was too young to take part in war in which his uncle was engaged, and when e came in 1603 Owen went over to the court, with the archdukes in Flanders. By 1606 he had the rank of captain and was then residing at
s. When Richelieu determined to interfere in the war, Owen Roe was one of the commanders, ill, and courage, and resource stood deservedly among Spanish commanders. He was, therefore, set to defend Arras against the French in 1649;
ough he had but 1500 men and was assailed by ish from 30,000 was subsequently increased t times that number, he stubbornly held his d for nearly two months. His conduct extorted imation of the French commander who cap-tered the place and who told O'Neill that he had sus-passed the French in everything but fortune. Meantime important events had taken place in Ireland.
The flight of the earls, the plantation of Ulter, the persecution of the Catholics, and the tyranny of Stradford proved that Irish Catholics had no security either in their religion or their lands. O’Neill was informed of all these events by the Irish leaders at home, and was equally determined as they that, as peaceful measures were unavailing, there should be a resort to arms. He was not, however, able to be in Ireland when the rebellion broke out in 1641, nor did he come till the summer of 1642, when he landed on the coast of Donegal bringing with him a good supply of arms and ammunition and 200 Irish officers, who like himself had acquired experience in foreign wars. O’Neill was at once appointed commander-in-chief of the rebel forces in Ulster. At that date the prospects were not war. Dublin Castle had not been taken, nor Drogheda, Dundalk had not been held, and Sir Phelim O’Neill had but 1500 untrained men, while there were 12,000 English and Scotch soldiers in Ulster.
While waiting to get a trained army together Owen Roe wanted to avoid meeting the enemy, nor did he fight except at Clones, where he was beaten, and at Portlester in Meath, where he defeated Lord Moore. Then, in 1643, came the cessation with Ormond. The Pur-tians ignored both Ormond and the cessation, and continued active in the several provinces. This compelled O’Neill to be vigilant and prepared, and in 1646 sought to fight the battle of Benbrow with General Monroe. The latter was superior in numbers, and he had artillery which O’Neill lacked; but the Irishmen had the advantage of position, and won a great victory.
Monroe fled to Lissburn without hat or cloak leaving more than 3000 of his men dead on the field, and arms, stores, colours, and provisions fell into O’Neill’s hands.
The fruits of this splendid victory were fricter away
by futile negotiations with Ormond and by divisions
among the Catholics. O’Neill, backed by the nuncio, Rinuccini, wanted to cease negotiating, and to fight
both the Puritans and the Royalists; but the Pale Catholics were more in agreement with Ormond than with O’Neill, and in spite of the fact that he was the only Catholic general who had been almost uniformly successful, they went so far as to declare him a rebel.
Nor would Ormond even in 1649, make any terms with him until Cromwell had captured Drogheda. Then Ormond made terms on the basis of freedom of religion and restoration of lands. At the critical moment when O’Neill’s services would have been invaluable against Cromwell he took suddenly ill and died. The story that he was poisoned may be dismissed, for there is no evidence to sustain it.

Oonias (Oyan), name of several Jewish postiffs of the third and second centuries before Christ. I.— Oonias I, son and successor of the high-priest Jaddus who, according to Josephus (Antiq., XI, viii, 7) received Alexander the Great in Jerusalem. Succeeding his father soon after the death of Alexander (ibid.), he held office for twenty-three years (322–300
b. c.). In I Mach., xii, 7, he is said to have received a friendly letter from Arius, ruler of the Spartans.
The letter is mentioned by Josephus (Antiq., XII, iv, 10), who gives its contents with certain modifications of the form in Machabees (xii, 20–23). During Oonias’s posticate Palestine was the scene of continual conflicts between the forces of Egypt and Africa, who several times alternated as masters of the country.
During this period also, and because of unsettled conditions at home, many Jews left Palestine for the newly founded city of Alexandria.
ONTARIO 254

II.—Oniás II, son of Simon the Just. He is not mentioned in the Bible, but Josephus says (Antiq., XII, iv, 1–6) that, though a high-priest, he was a man "of little soul and a great lover of money." He refused to pay the customary tribute of twenty talents, or silver to Ptolemy Euergetes, who then threatened to occupy the Jewish territory, a calamity which was averted by the tactful activity of Joseph, a nephew of Onias, who went to Ptolemy and purchased immunity from invasion.

III.—Onias III, son and successor (198 B.C.) of Simon II, and grandson of Onias II. Josephus erroneously attributes to him the correspondence witharius of Sparta (see above, Onias I). He is mentioned in II Macc., xv, 12, as a good and virtuous man, modest and gentle in his manner. During his pontificate Seleucus Philopator, King of Syria, sent his minister, Heliodorus, to Jerusalem with a view to obtain possession of the alleged treasures of the Temple (II Macc., iii).

IV.—Onias, also called Menelaus. Mention is made in II Macc., iv, of Menelaus, brother of Simon, who became the unjust accuser of Onias III, and later a venal usurper of the priesthood. According to Josephus, on the other hand, he originally bore the name Onias, changed for political reasons into the more characteristically Greek (Antiq., XII, v, 1).

V.—Onias IV, son of Onias III, too young to succeed his father in the priesthood, which was usurped successively by Jason and Menelaus (see above) and later by Alcimus. In the meantime Onias withdrew into Egypt, where he obtained from Ptolemy Philometor a tract of land near Heliopolis, on which (about 190 B.C.) he erected a sort of temple. Here a regular temple worship was resumed in defiance of the Law, but the innovation was doubtless justified in the mind of Onias by the scandalous conditions at the home sanctuary, and by the great number of Jews resident in Egypt. The project was censured by the authorities in Jerusalem (Mishna, Menachoth xiii, 10) and it was blamed by Josephus (Bell. Jud., VII, x, 3). Nevertheless, the worship was maintained until after A.D. 70, when it was abolished by Lupa, prefect of Alexandria (Josephus, "Bell. Jud." VII, x, 4).

VI.—Onias, a pious Jew of Jerusalem in the days of the high-priest Hyrcanus, i.e. about the middle of the first century B.C. (see Mishna, Thaanith iii, 9, and Josephus Antiq., XIV, ii, 1).

JAMES F. DRAISCOLL

Ontario, the most populous and wealthy province of Canada, has an area of 140,000,000 acres, exclusive of the Great Lakes, of which approximately 24,700,000 acres have been sold, 115,300,000 remaining vested in the Crown. It is bounded on the south and southwest by Lakes Ontario, Erie, Huron, and Superior, with their connecting waters, and Minnesota: on the north-east by Quebec, and the Ottawa River; on the north by James Bay; on the north-west by Keewatin; and on the west by Manitoba. It is probable that a large part of Keewatin will soon be added to the province. Old Ontario (lying between the Ottawa River, the St. Lawrence River, and Lakes Ontario, Erie, and Huron) is well settled and cultivated: New Ontario, lying north and west, is sparsely inhabited.

CLIMATE.—Moderate near the Great Lakes, subject to extremes of heat and cold in the north and north-west, the climate is everywhere healthful, the extremes being of short duration and easily endured owing to the dryness of the atmosphere inland.

HISTORICAL INCIDENTS.—Held by France up to 1763, Quebec, including Ontario, was then ceded to Great Britain. Vast areas were to be annexed. Explored by French missionaries and voyagers, it had been the scene of frightful Indian wars and massacres, and of the martyrdom in 1649 of the Jesuit, Brebeuf and Lallemant. Except for missionaries and their entourage, trappers, soldiers in some isolated posts, and a few settlers on the Detroit and Ottawa Rivers, and near the Georgian Bay, Ontario in 1763 was an uninhabited wilderness roamed over by Ojibways and Algonquins. After the American War of Independence many colonial adherents of the British Crown crossed to Upper Canada. In 1786 some 4487 of them were settled on the St. Lawrence and Lake Ontario, and about 1815 the immigration from the United States was extensive. With accessions from Ireland, Scotland, and England, it brought the population in 1806 up to 70,000. This was the nucleus of the Province of Ontario. In 1791 Upper Canada (Ontario) was separated from Quebec and given its own governor and legislature, which first met in 1792 at Newark, now Niagara-on-the-Lake. The laws of England were then introduced. In 1797 the capital was moved to York (Toronto). In 1812 Upper Canada sustained the brunt of the war between Great Britain and the United States and was the scene of several noted battles, Queenston Heights, Lundy's Lane, etc. In 1837 abuses by the dominant party and irresponsible executives provoked a rebellion in Upper and Lower Canada, which resulted in their union and the establishment of responsible government in 1841.

In 1866 Fenian raids from the United States were successfully repulsed. Difficulties of administration due largely to racial differences led to confederation in 1867, Upper Canada becoming a distinct province under the name of Ontario. Subsequent growth has been rapid; population and the monetary value of the wealth has increased many fold; and development of industries and resources has been enormous.

POPULATION.—The last census (1901) gives the population as 1,287,947. Municipal assessor's return for 1909 placed it at 2,288,435, of which 1,049,240 was rural, 515,978 dwelt in towns and villages, and 725,120 in cities. The Ontario Department of Agriculture considers that the population in 1910 is not far from these figures by 10 per cent. On this basis the population in 1909 is estimated at 2,518,362.

CITIES.—The principal cities, with their estimated populations are: Toronto, the provincial capital, 380,000; Ottawa, the capital of Canada, 90,000; Hamilton, 77,250; London, 55,000; Brantford, 22,750; Kingston, 21,000; Fort William, 20,000.

AGRICULTURE.—In 1909 the value of farms, implements and live stock was $1,241,019,109; field crops were worth $167,996,577, hay and clover, oats, wheat, barley, corn, potatoes, peas, and mixed grains being the principal items; dairy produce was officially estimated at $31,000,000; live stock at $184,747,900, sold or slaughtered at $64,464,923. Peaches and grapes, grown chiefly in the south-west, are a large industry. The average yearly value of the apple crop for the years 1901–06 was $5,671,273. In 1910 the Government Agricultural College at Guelph had 975 students; the Macdonald Institute for farmers' daughters, 411. The Government maintains experimental farms and liberally aids agricultural institutes. 24,000,000 acres are now under cultivation.

MINING.—The province is rich in minerals of various kinds. The figures given are for 1906, when mining products realized $99,532,814. The most important nickel deposits in America are in the Sudbury district, producing 18,638 tons, about 80 per cent of the world's output. Iron occurs in various places (principally hematite at Michipicoten on Lake Superior) yielding 231,433 tons. The output of gold bullion is 3246 oz. Important gold fields are being opened up at Porcupine. The fame of the silver mines of the Cobalt district is world-wide. At Armoury mine, from 2000 to 4000 oz. to the ton; 955 tons of silver yielded $15,436,994. Petroleum and natural gas are important products of the southwest. Portland cement brings $5,144,000. Arsenic, cobalt, copper, cor-

1, graphite, gypseum, marble, mica, salt, and are also found.

holding portfolios are: the president of the council (at the present the prime minister), the attorney-general,

the secretary and registrar, the treasurer, the minister of lands, forests, and mines, the minister of agriculture,

Judiciary. — The Constitutional Act assigns to the province “the constitution, maintenance, and organ-

of the provincial courts”, civil and criminal, and to the Dominion the appointment and remuneraof judges. Judges of the superior courts are appointed for life. Those of the county and district courts must retire at the age of eighty. The province

appoints surrogate court judges, police magis-and justices of the peace. The Supreme Court of Judeicature comprises the Court of Appeal, with five judges, and the High Court, with twelve judges. The county and district judges have limited powers as local judges of the High Court. In the Division Courts

(small debt) they try claims, ascertained by signature

up to $200, upon contract up to $100, and other per-claims up to $60. In the County and District courts they have jurisdiction, speaking generally, in actions upon contract up to $500, in other personal actions up to $500, and in actions respecting rights of property, where the value of the property affected does not exceed $500. Unless the defendant disavows jurisdiction, these courts may deal with any civil case whatever the amount involved. The jurisdiction of the High Court is unlimited. In important cases an appeal lies from the provincial court to the Supreme Court of Canada, or to the Judicial Commitee of the Imperial Privy Council.

Officials. — Sheriffs, court officers, Division Court

bailiffs, etc., are appointed by the provincial govern-

to, officiating clergymen, and disturbance of meet-

is strictly observed.

Exemptions. — Places of worship and lands used in connexion therewith, churchyards and burying-grounds, and buildings and grounds of educational and charitable institutions are exempt from taxation. Clergymen are exempt from jury duty and military service.

Incorporation. — Religious organizations can readily obtain incorporation, with liberal powers of acquiring and holding real estate. Land may be given for “charitable uses”, by deed made more than six months before the grantor’s death, or by will, but must be sold within two years, unless the High Court, being satis-

ied that it is required for actual occupancy for the purpose of the charity, sanctions its retention. All

Catholic church property is vested in the bishop of the diocese who is a statutory corporation sole.

Catholicism. — In 1763 the few French settlers were Catholics. Immigration from the United States after 1783 was almost exclusively Protestant. Some Scotch

Catholics settled in Glengarry, and a considerable number of Irish Catholics, principally after the War of 1812 and particularly from 1847 to 1861, in various parts of Ontario. The See of Kingston, established in 1826, included the entire province. Rt. Rev. Alex.

Macdonell was the first bishop. Kingston became an archdiocese in 1889. The Diocese of Toronto, erected in 1841, became an archdiocese in 1870. The Diocese of Ottawa, erected in 1847, became an archdiocese in 1886. The Province has now seven suffragan sees, Hamilton, London, Pembroke, Temiskaming (Vicariate), Peterborough, Alexandria, and Sault Sainte Marie. Portions of Ottawa, Pembroke, and Temiskaming are in Quebec; the other dioceses are wholly in Ontario. Diocesan priests number 383; priests of religious orders were 244, in 1901, 300, and in 1910 (est.) 450,000. These, 190,000 (est.), residing chiefly in East of Ontario, East, Nipissing, and Algoma, are French Canadians: the remainder principally of Irish descent. The Apostolic Delegate to Canada resides at Ottawa. The headquarters of the Catholic Church Extension Society of Canada (canonically established) are at Toronto. Catholic charitable institutions are numerous, and receive a fair share of government and municipal aid. As a minority, Catholics have reason to be satisfied with their status and recent treatment.

Education.—At Confederation the British North America Act conferred on the province power to deal with education, saving rights and privileges, with respect to denominational schools then enjoyed. Quebec, losing the union of Protestant Upper Canada (Ontario) and Catholic Lower Canada (Quebec), from 1841 to 1867, provision was made for denominational schools for Protestant religious minority in each province. The Ontario Separate Schools law, fundamentally as it stands to-day, was enacted in 1863. The rights then conferred on the Catholic minority are now constitutional.

Expenditure.—The educational system is administered by the Department of Education. Out of $3,891,004.68 revenue, the Government in 1910 expended $3,337,307.23; the balance of $553,697.45 was raised by local taxation for primary and secondary education.

System.—The system embraces free primary education in public and separate schools; intermediate education in high schools, partly free; and university training at slight cost to the student. Every person between the ages of five and twenty-one years of age, every child between eight and fourteen, unless lawfully excused, must, attend a public or separate school. The courses of study and textbooks are controlled by the Department, which selects for separate schools only books approved by the Catholic authorities. Subject to departmental regulations, primary schools are managed by trustees locally elected, there being distinct boards for public and separate schools. Every teacher must hold a certificate of qualification from a provincial normal school. With its own taxes the municipality collects for each board the amount it requires for its purposes. For public schools, attended in 1910 by 401,386 pupils, government aid was $731,160.99 and local taxation (1909) $6,565,987.90. For separate schools, attended in 1910 by 55,024 pupils, government aid was $35,033.65 and local taxation (1910) $764,771.95. Where Catholics are the majority at they sometimes use and control public schools; in some localities they are too few to support a separate school. The separate school attendance is therefore substantially less than the number of Catholic school children.

High Schools.—For High Schools attended in 1910, by 33,101 pupils, government aid was $157,383.03, and local taxation (1910) $1,451,535.05. There is no legal provision for separate high schools. On its Normal College (Hamilton) and two normal schools at Toronto and Ottawa the Government spent in 1910, $298,524.11, training 1198 students.

Separate Schools Law.—Catholic separate schools are legally exempt from public school taxation. They elect their own trustees, who determine their rate of school taxation. Catholic teachers are employed and Catholic religious training is given. Separate schools are specially appointed by the Government. Many of the teachers are Christian Brothers and Sisters of teaching orders, all holding government certificates. At the government examinations (1910) for entrance to high schools, in Toronto the percentage of men and women school candidates who passed was 54.56; that of separate school candidates was 57.81.

Universities.—The University of Toronto is supported by the Government. In 1910 it had 4000 students. The revenue from tuition duties, in 1910, $519,999.27, is devoted to it; it also received $15,000 for the faculty of education. With it is affiliated St. Michael's College, Toronto, conducted by the Basilians. There are also: the Western University, London; Queen's (Presbyterian), Kingston; and McMaster (Baptist), Toronto. Victoria College (Methodist), Wycliffe (Anglican), Knox (Presbyterian), Trinity (Anglican), all at Toronto, are affiliated with the University of Toronto. The University at Kingston received $42,000 from the Government for a school of mining, and $10,500 for its faculty of education.

The Catholic University of Ottawa, conducted by the Oblate Fathers, with complete French courses and, in 1910, 547 students, receives no government aid. It holds a charter from the Papal Court as well as from the province.

There are other Catholic colleges: Regiopolis at Kingston, conducted by secular priests; St. Jerome's, at Berlin, by Fathers of the Resurrection, and Assumption, at Sandwich, by Basilians. In nearly every city and town there is a good school for Catholic children, conducted by religious.

Catholic Seminary for ecclesiastical education, capable of accommodating, at first 110, and later 310 students, the gift of Mr. Eugene O'Keefe, Private Chamberlain to His Holiness, is in course of construction. Ottawa has a diocesan seminary.

Marriage and Divorce.—By the British North America Act, marriage and divorce is assigned to the Dominion Parliament, while the solemnisation of marriage is under provincial jurisdiction. Marriage.—Under the Ontario Marriage Act, marriage may be solemnised by "the ministers and clergymen of every church and religious denomination, duly licensed or appointed by the Congregations of God or of Christ, the Salvation Army, the Farrand Independent Church, the Brethren, and the Society of Friends. There is no provision for purely civil marriage. The person solemnising marriage must be "a resident of Canada". The marriage must be preceded by publication of banns, or authorized by a licence, or certificate of the Provincial Secretary, issued by a local issuer appointed by the Government. Unless necessary to prevent illegitimacy, the marriage of any person under fourteen is prohibited. To obtain a licence for the marriage of a person under eighteen, not a widower or widow, consent of the father if resident in Ontario, and if not, of the mother if so resident, or of the guardian (if any), is required. Marriage within any degree of consanguinity closer than that of first cousins is prohibited. But the validity of marriage, an agreement of a deceased wife or with a deceased wife's sister is legalised; yet marriage with a daughter of a deceased wife's brother, with a brother of deceased husband, and with a deceased husband's nephew is illegal. The validity of marriage depends on the lex loci contractus.

Divorce.—There is no Divorce Court. Divorce can be obtained only by Act of the Dominion Parliament.
Ontologism is the sole ground on which it is granted. In 1807 Parliament granted 3 divorces for Ontario; in 1808, 8; in 1809, 8; and in 1910, 14. Ontario courts recognize a foreign divorce only where it is valid according to the law of the state in which it is obtained, and the husband had at the time a bona fide domicile, as understood in English law, in such state. Subject to these provisos provision in favor of a person who, in good faith and on reasonable grounds, believes his or her spouse to be dead, and of a person whose spouse has been continually absent for seven years and who has not now such spouse to be alive at any time during that period, any married person, not validly divorced, who goes through a second form of marriage in Canada commits bigamy; any such person who, being a British subject resident in Canada, goes through such ceremony elsewhere, if he left Canada with intent to do so, also commits bigamy under Canadian law.

Nullity.—The Ontario High Court has jurisdiction to adjudicate marriage void, and it has special statutory power to declare a marriage null, if the plaintiff was under the age of eighteen when married, and the ceremony was without the consent required by law, and was not necessary to prevent illegitimacy. The action must be brought before the plaintiff attains the age of nineteen, and it must be proved in open court and after notice to the attorney-general (who is authorized to intervene) that there has not been cohabitation after the ceremony.

Ontologism (from ὁντός, ὁντος, being, and άιδης, science), an ideological system which maintains that God and Divine ideas are the first object of our intellectual knowledge. Exposition.—Malebranche (q.v.) developed his theory of “la vision en Dieu” in different works, particularly “Recherche de la vérité,” III, under the influence of Platonic and Cartesian philosophies, and of a misunderstanding of St. Augustine's and St. Thomas's principles on the origin and source of our ideas. It is also in large part the consequence of his theory of occasional causes (see Occasionalism). Our true knowledge of things, he says, is the knowledge we have of them in their ideas. The ideas of things are present to our mind, endowed with the essence of universality, necessity, and eternity, and are not the result of intellectual elaboration or representations of things as they are, but the archetypes which concrete and temporal things really have their source and real existence in God; they are the Divine essence itself, considered as the infinite model of all things. "God is the locus of our ideas, as space is the locus of bodies." God is then always really present to our mind; we see all things, even material and concrete things, in Him who contains and manifests to our intelligence their nature and existence. Vincenzo Gioberti (1801-52) developed his Ontologism in "Introduzione allo studio della filosofia" (1840), I, iii; II, 1. Our first act of intellectual knowledge is the intuitive judgment "ens creat ex tantibus" (Being creates existence). By that act, he says, our mind apprehends directly and immediately in an intuitive synthesis (a) being, not simply in general nor merely as ideal, but as necessary and real, viz., God; (b) existence or contingent beings; (c) the relation which unites being and existence, viz., the creative act. In this judgment being is the subject, existence the predicate, the creative act the copula. Our first intellectual perception is, therefore, an intuition of God, the first intelligible, as creating existence. This intuition is finite and is obtained by means of expressions or words (la parola). Thus the primum philosophicum includes both the primum ontologicum and the primum psychologicum, and the ordo scientiâ is identified with the ordo rerum. This formula was accepted and defended by Orestes A. Brownson, "On the Existence of God," 267 sq.; "Schools of Philosophy, 296 sq.; "Principles of Thought", 418 sq. etc.

Ontologism was advocated, under a more moderate form, by some Catholic philosophers of the nineteenth century. Maintaining against Malebranche that concrete material things are perceived by our senses, they asserted that our universal ideas endowed with the characteristics of necessity and eternity, and our notion of the infinite cannot exist except in God; and they cannot therefore be known except by an intuition of God present to our mind and perceived by our intelligence not in His essence as such, but in His essence as the archetype of all things. Such is the Ontologism taught by C. Ubahes, professor at Louvain, in "Essai d'ideologie ontologique" (Louvain, 1860); by Abbé L. Branchereau in "Pratique des Philosophes"; by Abbé F. Hugonin in "Ontologie ou études des lois de la pensée" (Paris, 1856-7); by Abbé J. Fabre in "Défense de l'ontologisme"; by Carlo Vercellone, etc. We have also the fruit of Ontological Positivism as Rosmini's philosophy, although there have been many attempts to defend him against this accusation (cf. G. Morando, "Essai critique de l'ontologie rosminiana condannate dalla S.R.S. inquisizion" (Milan, 1835). According to Rosmini, all our thoughts is being in its ideality (l'essere ideale, l'essere intiale). The idea of being is innate in us and we perceive it by intuition. Altogether indetermined, it is neither God nor creature; it is an appurtenance of God, it is something of the Word ("Teosofia", I, n. 490; II, n. 848; cf. "Rosminianarum propositionum trutina theologica", Rome, 1892). At the origin and basis of every system of Ontologism, there are two principal reasons: (1) we have an idea of the infinite and this cannot be obtained through abstraction from finite beings, since it is not contained in them; it must, therefore, be innate in our mind and perceived through intuition; (2) our concepts and fundamental judgments are endowed with the characteristics of universality, eternity, and necessity, e.g., our concept of man is applicable to an indefinite number of individual men; our principle that all is God, however is, is, is true in itself, necessarily and always. Now such concepts and judgments cannot be obtained from any consideration of finite things which are particular, contingent, and temporal. Gioberti insists also on the fact that God being alone intelligible by Himself, we cannot have any intellectual knowledge of finite things independently of the knowledge of God: that our knowledge to be truly scientific must follow the ontological, or real, order and therefore must begin with the knowledge of God, the first being and source of all existing beings. Ontologists appeal to the authority of the Fathers, especially St. Augustine and St. Thomas.

Refutation.—From the philosophical point of view, the immediate intuition of God and of His Divine ideas, as held by Ontologists, is above the natural power of man's intelligence. We are not conscious, even by reflection, of the presence of God in our mind; and, if we did have such an intuition we would find in it (as St. Thomas rightly remarks) the full satisfaction of all our aspirations, since we would know in God's essence (for the distinction between God in His essence and God as containing the ideas of things, as advanced by Ontologists, is arbitrary and cannot be more than logical) error or doubt concerning God would be impossible. (Cf. St. Thom. in Lib. Iste: Bzth de Trinitate, Q. 1, a. 3: de Veritate, Q. XVIII, a. 1.) Again, all our intellectual thoughts, even those concerning God, are accompanied by sensory images; they are made of elements which may be grouped to creatures as well as to God Himself; only in our idea of God and His attributes, these elements are divested of the characteristics of imperfection and limit which they have in creatures, and assume the highest possible degree of perfection. In a word, not the idea of God is not definite and proper; it is analogous (cf. GOD; ANALOGY).

This shows that God is not known by intuition.

The reasons advanced by Ontologiæ rest on confusion. The human mind has an idea of the infinite; but this idea may be and is in fact, obtained from the notion of the finite, by the successive processes of abstraction, elimination, and transcendence. The notion of the finite is the notion of being having a certain perfection in a limited degree. By eliminating the element of limitation and conceiving the perfect perfection as realised in its highest possible degree, we arrive at the notion of the infinite. We forget in this way, a negativo-positive concept, as the Schoolmen say, of the infinite. It is true also that our ideas have the characteristics of necessity, universality, and eternity; but these are essentially different from the attributes of God. God exists necessarily, viz., He is absolutely, and cannot not exist; our ideas are necessary in the sense that, when an object is conceived in its essence, independently of concrete being, in which it is realized, it is a subject of necessary relations: man, if he exists, is necessarily a rational being. God is absolutely universal in the sense that He eminently possesses the actual perfection of all perfection; our ideas are universal in the sense that they are applicable to an indefinite number of concrete beings. God is eternal in the sense that He exists by Himself and always identical with Himself: our ideas are eternal in the sense that they are not determined by any special place in space or moment in time.

It is true that God alone is perfectly intelligible in Himself, since He alone has in Himself the reason of His existence; finite beings are intelligible in the very measure in which they exist. Having an existence distinct from that of God, they have also an intelligibility distinct from Him. And it is precisely because they are dependent on us and their existence is secondary to the existence of God, the first intelligible. The assumption that the order of knowledge must follow the order of things, holds of absolute and perfect knowledge of all knowledge. It is clear knowledge that it affirms as real that which is truly real; the order of knowledge may be different from the order of reality. The confusion of certain Ontologists regarding the notion of being opens the way to inconsistency (q. v.). Neither St. Augustine nor St. Thomas favours Ontologism. It is through a misunderstanding of their theories and of their expression that the Ontologist appeals to them. (cf. St. August. "De civitate Dei", lib. X, XL; "De utilitate credendi", lib. 83, cap. XVI, Q. xiv, etc.; St. Thomas, "Summa Theol.", 1, Q. ii, a. 11; Q. lxxxiv-lxxxvii; "Q. disp. de Veritate", Q. xvi, a. 1; Q. xii, "De magistro", a. 3, etc.)

The Condemnation of the Council of Vienna (1311-12) had already condemned the doctrine of the Begards who maintained that we can see God by our natural intelligence. On 18 April 1861, ten propositions by the Ontologiæ, concerning the immediate and the innate knowledge of God, being, and the relation of finite things to God, were declared by the Holy Office tuto tradi non potest (cf. Denzinger-Baumgart, nn. 1858-85) in the same congregation. In 1862, pronounced the same sentence against fifteen propositions by Abbé Brancheau, subjected to its examination, two of which (xii and xiii) asserted the existence of an innate and direct perception of ideas, and the intuition of God by the human mind. In the Vatican Council, Cardinals Pecci and Sforza presented a postulatum for an explicit condemnation of Ontologism. On 14 December, 1887, the Holy Office reproved, condemned, and proscribed forty propositions extracted from the works of Saint Anselm, in which the principles of Ontologism are contained (cf. Denzinger-Baumgart, nn. 1891-1930).

GEORGE M. SAUVAGE.

Ontology (Gr. ὄντα, being, and μόρφος, science, the science or philosophy of being).—I. Definition.—Though the term is used in this literal meaning by Clauberg (1625-1665) (Opp., p. 281), its special application to the first department of metaphysics was made by Christian von Wolff (1679-1754) (Philos. nat., sec. 73). Prior to this time "the science of being" had retained the titles given it by its founder Aristotle: "first philosophy," "theology," "wisdom". The term "metaphysics" (q. v.) was given a wider extension by Wolff, who divided "real philosophy" into general metaphysics, which he called ontology, and metaphysics proper, included cosmology, psychology, and theology. This programme has been adopted with little variation by most Catholic philosophers. The subject-matter of Ontology (q. v.) is the concept of being in its widest range, as embracing the actual and potential, is first analyzed, the problems concerned with essence (nature) and existence, "act" and "potency" are discussed, and the primary principles—contradiction, identity, etc.—are shown to emerge from the concept of entity. (2) The properties coextensive with being—unity, truth, and goodness, and their immediately associated concepts, order and beauty—are next explained. (3) The fundamental divisions of being into the finite and the infinite, the contingent and the necessary, etc., and the subdivisions of the finite into the categories (q. v.) substance and its accidents (quantity, quality, etc.) follow in turn—the objective—reality of substance, the meaning of personality, the relation of accidents (q. v.) to substance being the most prominent topics. (4) The concluding portion of the Ontology is usually devoted to the concept of cause and its primary divisions—efficient and final, material and formal—the objectivity and analytical character of the principle of causality received most attention. Ontology is not a subjective science as Kant describes it (Ub. d. Fortschr. d. Met., 98) nor "an inferential Psychology", as Hamilton regards it (Metaphysics, Lect. VII); nor yet a knowledge of the absolute (theology); nor of some ultimate reality, whether conceived as matter or as spirit, which Monists suppose to underlie and produce individual real beings and their manifestations. Ontology is a fundamental interpretation of the ultimate constituents of the world of experience. All these constituents—individuals with their attributes—have factors or aspects in common. The atom and the molecule of matter, the plant, the animal, man, and God agree in this that each is a being, has a characteristic essence, an individual unity, truth, goodness, is a substance and (God excepted) has accidents, and is or may be a cause. All these common attributes demand definition and explanation—definition not of their mere names, but analysis of the real object which the mind abstracts and reflectively considers. Ontology is therefore the fundamental science since it studies the basic constituents and the principles presupposed by the special sciences. All the other parts of philosophy, cosmology, psychology, theology, ethics, even logic, rest on the foundation laid by ontology. The physical sciences—physics, chemistry, biology, mathematics...
OOSTACKER, SHrine OF, a miraculous shrine of the Blessed Virgin, and place of pilgrimage from Belgium, Holland, and Northern France. It takes its name from a little hamlet two miles from Ghent in the Province of East Flanders, Belgium. Its origin as a centre of pilgrimage is comparatively recent, dating from 1873. In 1871 the Marquise de Calonne de Courtebouche had built in the park of her estate at Oostacker an aquarium in the form of an artificial cave or grotto. One day, while on a visit to the park, M. Fabre, the parish priest, suggested that a statue of Our Lady of Lourdes be placed among the rocks. For two years the grotto remained simply an aquarium, but gradually the members of the family formed the habit of stopping there to recite a Hail Mary. Soon it was decided to bless the statue publicly. The ceremony took place on 23 June, 1875, and was attended by nearly all the inhabitants of the village. The pious Flemish peasants asked permission of the owner to come frequently to the park to give vent to their devotion. Accordingly, access was allowed them on Sunday afternoon. At that time the water was being raised with the fame of Lourdes, and the shrine at Oostacker soon became popular; marvellous graces and wonderful cures were reported. Before long Sunday afternoon no longer sufficed to receive the throngs of pilgrims, and the park was opened to the public by the generous owner. Then a large Gothic church was built, the corner-stone being laid on 22 May, 1875, by Mgr Brasca. A priest’s house followed, and the marchioness in memory of her son, a deceased Jesuit, confided shrine, church, and house to the Society of Jesus. The fathers took possession on 8 April, 1877, and on 11 September of the same year the Apostolic nuncio, Seraphino Vannutelli, consecrated the church. That part of the estate, in which the grotto was, was now definitely given over to the service of Our Lady, a long avenue being built from the road to the shrine and a Way of the Cross erected. Fully 60,000 pilgrims come annually from Belgium, Holland, and Northern France, in about 450 organized pilgrimages.

Ophir, in the Bible, designates a people and a country.

The people, for whom a Semitic descent is claimed, is mentioned in Gen., x, 29, with the other “sons of Jecan”, whose dwelling “was from Mesha as we go on as far as Schar, a mountain in the east” (Gen. x, 30).

Oporto, Diocese of (Portugalsis), in Portugal; comprising 26 civil concelhos of the districts of Oporto and Aveiro; probably founded in the middle of the sixth century. At the third Council of Toledo (580) the Ariac usurer Argivito was deposed in favour of Constance the rightful bishop. In 610 Bishop Argeberto assisted at a council at Toledo, summoned by King Gundemar to sanction the metropolitan claims of Toledo. Bishop Ansulfo was present at the Sixth Council of Toledo (638) and Bishop Flavio at the Tenth (656). Bishop Froarico attended the Third Council of Braga (675) and the Twelfth, Thirteenth, and Fifteenth Councils of Toledo (681, 683, and 688). Bishop Felix appeared at the Sixteenth Council (903). No other bishop is recorded under the Visigothic monarchy. After the Arab invasion Justinus seems to have been the first bishop. Comado was probably elected 692, and when King Affonso III won back the city. The names of only four other prelates have been preserved: Froarengo (906), Hermogino (912), Ordonho, and Diogo. Oporto fell again into Moorish hands, and on its recovery, Hugo became bishop (1114-1134-6). He secured exemption from the Archbishop of Braga. He greatly enlarged his diocese and the cathedral patrimony increased by the donations he secured; thus, in 1126, he received from D. Theresa jurisdiction over the City of Oporto with all the rents and dues thereof. John Peculiar was promoted to Braga (1138), his nephew, Pedro Rabaldes, succeeding at Oporto. Next came D. Pedro Pires (1145 to 1152 or 1155), D. Pedro Seniur (d. 1172), and D. Fernao Martins (d. 1185). Martinho Pires instituted a chapter, was promoted to Braga, 1159 or 1190. Martinho Rodrigues ruled from 1191 to 1235. He quarrelled with the chapter over their share of the rents of the see. Later on, fresh disagreements arose in which King Sancho intervened against the bishop, who was deprived of his goods and had to flee, but was restored by the king when Innocent III espoused the bishop’s cause. Another quarrel soon arose between prelates and king, and the bishop was imprisoned; but he escaped and fled to Rome, and in 1209 the king, feeling the approach of death, made peace with him. His successor, Pedro Salvadoros, figured prominently in the questions between the clergy and King Sancho II, who refused to ecclesiastics the right of purchasing or inheriting land. Portugal fell into anarchy, in which the clergy’s rights were violated and their persons outraged, though they themselves were not guiltless. Finally, Pope Innocent IV committed the reform of abuses to Affonso, brother of Sancho, who lost his crown.

Under Bishop Julian (1247-49) the jurisdiction difficulty became aggravated. A settlement was effected at the Cortes of Leiria (1254), which the bishop refused to ratify, but he had to give way. When King Affonso III determined (1258) that all rights and properties usurped during the disorders of Sancho’s reign should revert to the Crown, nearly all the bishops, including the Bishop of Oporto, then D.
proceeded; and seven went to Rome for receiving Portugal under an interdict. When the was dying, in 1278, he promised restitution.ite (d. 1296) was one of the negotiators of the ord in 1289 and the supplementary Accord of 6 Articles. Pedro I re ruled until 1300. Geraldo Domingues resigned 08 to act as councillor of the King's daughter fargas, future Queen of Castile. Tredolu was p for two and a half years. The Ministro Frei was succeeded in 1315 by his nephew Fer nans. Both uncle and nephew quarrelled King Denis and left the realm. Owing to the lity of the citize, Bishop Gomes lived mostly of his diocese. When Pedro Afonso Suspen p in 1343, he had a quarrel over jurisdiction and, his predecessor, departed, leaving the diocesan interdict. Six years later he returned, but the monarch began to encroach, and it was not 1354 that the bishop secured recognition of his. His successor was Afonso Pires. Egido is ubly the bishop represented in the old Chronicles going threatening with scourging by King Pedro for being lived in sin with a citizen's wife. The accusa was probably groundless, but Egido left the city, for twelve years had no bishop. In 1373 or 1374 he succeeded and appeared before the lawful pope, Great Schism, and the Master of Avis against his claims.

his bishops were: John de Zambuje, or Estevan; Gil, who in 1406 sold the episcopal rights over to an unwanted; Pero da Guerra, who in 1425 was created Archbp. of Braga; Vasco—Antão Martins de Chavis, successor in 1430, was chosen by the pope Constantinople to induce the Greek emperor to d the Council of Basel. He succeeded, and as a cardinal was made cardinal. He died in 1447. Sue n successors were: Bartolomeo Gomes de ao; Luis Pires (1454-64), a negotiator of theordat of 1455 and a reforming prelate; John de e (1465-1494), a benefactor of the cathedral chapter, as was his successor Diego de Sousa, ards Bishop of Braga and executor of Manuel. The see was then held by two diocesan in succession, Diego da Costa (1505-7); Pedro da Costa (1511-39), who restored the see; later Gabriel de Oliveira enriched the parish with public revenue of his own purse; Belchior Belio; and the Card e Frei Baltazar Limpo (1538-52), the fifteenth p. He held a diocesan synod in 1540, the time of Rodrigo Pinheiro, a learned humanist, to be visited by St. Francis Borgia and the established themselves in the city. Ayres da v, rector of Coimbra University, after ruling years, fell in the battle of Alcacer in 1578 with Sebastian. Simão Pereira was followed by the ciscan Frei Marcos de Lisboa, chronicler of his. He added to the cathedral and convoked a san synod in 1585. In 1591 another ex-rector simbra, Heironymo de Meneses, became bishop; as succeeded by the Benedictine Frei Gonçalo de és, a zealous defender of the rights of the Church, cut a new scarcity and chancel in the cathedral. Bishop Rodrigo da Cunha, author of the his of the Bishops of Oporto, was appointed. His alolo describes the state of the cathedral and rates the parishes of the diocese with their popu and income in 1623 and is the earliest account ossess. His successor was Frei John de Valla, transferred from the See of Miranda. Gaspar zoo da Fonseca, who held the see four years in 1652, founded St. Philip II named Francisco Pereira, but the revolution in 1610 prevented his taking sion, so that the see was considered vacant until being ruled by administrators appointed by the chapter. In 1641 John IV chose D. Sebastião Caer de Menezes as bishop, but the pope, influenced by Spain, would not recognise the new King of Portugal nor confirm his nominations. Next came Frei Pedro de Menezes; Nicolau Monteiro took possession in 1671, Fernando Correia de Lacerda, in 1673, who was succeeded by João de Sousa. Frei José Saldanha (1697-1708), famed for his austerity, never relinquished his Franciscan habit, a contrast to his successor Thomas de Almeida, who in 1716 became the first Patriarch of Lisbon. The see remained vacant until 1739, and, though Frei John Maria was then elected, he never obtained confirmation. In the same year Frei José Maria da Fonseca, formerly Commissary General of the Franciscans, became bishop. Several European States selected him as arbiter of their differences. He contributed to the canonization of a number of saints. He founded and restored many convents and hospitals.

Next in order were: Frei Antonio de Tavora (d. 1766), Frei Aleixo de Miranda Henriques, Frei John Raphael de Mendonça (1773–91), and Lourenço Correia de Sá Benedites (1785–92). Frei Antonio de Castro became Patriarch of Lisbon in 1714, being followed at Oporto by John Avellar. Frei Manuel de Santa Inês, though elected, never obtained confirmation, but some years after his death the relations between Portugal and the Holy See were re-established by a concordat and Jeronimo da Costa Rebelo became bishop in 1843. From 1854 to 1859 the see was held by Antonio da Fonseca Moniz; on his death it remained vacant until 1862, when John Castro e Moura, who had been a missionary in China, was appointed (d. 1868). The see was again vacant until the confirmation of Americo Ferreira dos Santos Silva in 1871. This prelate was obliged to mediate in the growing Liberalism of his flock and the Protestant propaganda in Oporto. A popular lawyer named Mosquita started a campaign against him, because the bishop refused to dismiss some peces, reputed reactionary, who served the Aguedente Chapel; getting himself elected judge of the Brotherhood of the Temple, he provoked a great outburst of agitation with the result that the chapel was secularized and became a school under the patronage of the Marquis of Pombal Association. In 1879 America was created cardinal and on his death the present (1911) Bishop, Anto inio Barroso, an ex-missionary, was transferred from the see of Mylapore to that of Oporto.

The Diocese of Oporto is suffragan to Braga. It has 479 parishes, 1190 priests, a Catholic population of 650,000, and 500 Protestants.

Oppenordt (Oppenord), Gilles-Marie, b. in Paris, 1672; d. there, 1742; a celebrated rococo artist, known as "the French Borromini". As a boy he was sent to Rome as a royal pensioner, where, for eight years he studied, principally under Borromini and Bossi. The way he had been paved in France for this style, for in the latter days of Louis XIV a change had appeared in the architectural productions of the Baroque style. The crowning of the Renaissance was adapted to the taste of Louis XV's time. It was called the Style of the Regency, the salon et boudoir style. Oppenordt, in connexion with Robert de Cotte, developed the exuberant and plush rococo border and shell ornamentation founded on the Italian Grottesque. The high altar of St. Germain des Prés and that of Saint-Sulpice (1704) gained for him the favour of the regent. He was en trusted with the restoration and decoration of the Château Villers Cotterets, for the reception of the king after his anointment at Reims. Oppido Mamertina, diocese of (oppidensis), suffragan of Reggio Calabria, Italy, famous for its prolonged resistance to Roger (eleventh century). Bishop Stefano (1295) is the first prelate of whom there is mention. In 1472 the see was united to that of Gerace, under Bishop Athanasius Calceolofo, by whom the Greek rite was restored, although it remained in use in a few towns. In 1536 Oppido became again an independent see, under Bishop Pietro Andrea Ripanti; among other bishops were Antonio Cesconi (1609) and Giovanni Battista Gentitsani (1622), who restored the cathedral and the episcopal palace; Bianzio Fili (1696), who founded the seminary; Michele Caputo (1632), who was transferred to the See of Ariano, where it is reported that he poisoned King Ferdinand II; eventually, he apostatized. Oppido has 10 parishes, with 28,000 inhabitants.

Opatus, saint, Bishop of Milevis, in Numidia, in the fourth century. He was a convert, as we gather from St. Augustine: "Do we not see with how great a bootiy of gold and silver and garments Cyprian, doctor sacrisius, came forth out of Egypt, and likewise Lactantius, Victorinus, Opatus, Hilary?" (De Doctrina Christi, xl). Opatus probably had been a pagan rhetorician. His work against the Donatists is an answer to Parmenian, the successor of Donatus in the See of Carthage. St. Jerome (De viris ilius, cx) tells us it was in six books and was written under Valens and Valentinian (364–75). We now possess seven books, and the list of popes is carried as far as Siricius (384–98). Similarly the Donatist succession of anti-popes is given (II, iv), as Victor, donatus, exomius, Macrobius, Urbanus, Claudianus (the date of the last is about 380), though a few sentences earlier Macrobius is mentioned as the actual bishop. The plan of the work is laid down in Book I, and is completed in six books. It seems, then, that the seventh book, which St. Jerome did not know in 392, was an appendix to a new edition in which St. Opatus made additions to the two episcopal lists. The date of the original work is fixed by the statement in I, xii, that sixty years and more had passed since the persecution of DIOCLETIAN (303–5). Photinus (d. 376) is apparently regarded as still alive; Julian is dead (363). Thus the style of St. Opatus is vigorous and animated.

The style of St. Opatus is vigorous and animated. He aims at terseness and effect, rather than at flowing periods, and this in spite of the gentleness and clarity which are so admirable in his polemics against his "brethren," as he insists on calling the Donatist bishops. He uses Cyprian a great deal, though he refutes that saint's mistaken opinion about baptism, and does not copy his easy style. His descriptions of events are admirable and vivid. It is strange that he himself should have called him minus nitidus ac politus, for both in the words he employs and in their order he almost incurs the blame of preciosity. He is as strict as Cyprian as to the metrical cadences at the close of every sentence. He writes evidently a man of good taste as well as of high culture, and he left us in his one work a monument of convincing dialectic, of elegant not be only in a corner of Africa; it must be the catho-licos (the word is used as a substanti tive) which is troughout the world. Parmenian had enumerated six do tes, or properties, of the Church, of which Optat us accepts five, and argues that the first, the episcocopital chair, cathedra, belongs to the Catholics, and there fore they have all the others. The whole schism had arisen through the quarrel as to the episcopal succesion at Carthage, and it might have been expected that Opatus would claim this property of cathedra by pointing out the legitimacy of the Catholic see at Carthage. But he does not. He replies: "We must examine who sat first in the chair, and where. . . .

You cannot deny that you know that in the city of Rome upon Peter first the chair of the bishop was conferred, in which sat the head of all the Apostles, Peter, whence also he was called Cephas, in which one chair

unity should be preserved by all, lest the other Apostles should each stand up for his own chair, so that now

he should be a schismatic and a sinner who should against this one chair set up another. Therefore in the one chair, which is the first of the do tes Peter first sat, to whom succeeded Linus," and to Damasus Siricius, who is to-day our colleague, with whom the whole world

with us agrees by the communication of commenda tory letters in the fellowship of one communion. Tell us the origin of your chair, you who wish to rouse the Holy Church for yourselves. Opatus then mocks at the recent succession of Donatist antipopes at Rome.

Opatus argues, especially in book VII, against the discourse which the Donatists had inherited from

Cyprian that baptism by those outside the Church cannot be valid, and he anticipates St. Augustine's argument that the faith of the baptizer does not matter, since it is God who operates. The ament of the objective efficacy of the sacraments ex

opere operato is well known: "Sacramenta per se esse sancta, non per homines" (V, iv). Thus in baptism

there must be the bishop, who is the minister, and their importance is in this order, the third being the least important. In rebuking the sacri elies of the Donatists, he says: "What is so profane

as to break, scrape, remove the altar of God, on which you yourselves have once offered, on which both the prayers of the people and the members of Christ have been borne, where God Almighty has been invoked,

where the Holy Ghost has been asked for and has come down, from which very many have been baptized to the pledge of eternal salvation and the safeguard of faith and the hope of resurrection? . . . For what is an altar but the seat of the Body and Blood of Christ?"

In book VII a notable argument for unity is added:

St. Peter sinned most grievously and denied his Master, yet he retained the keys, and for the sake of unity and charity the Apostles did not separate from his fellowship. Thus Opatus defends the willingness of the Catholics to receive back the Donatists to unity

without difficulty, for there must be always sinners

in the Church, and the cackle is mixed with the wheat; but charity covers a multitude of sins.

The Bishop of Milevis was acquainted with the Catholic Church, and had to deal with heretics. The former have rejected unity, but they have true doctine and true sacraments, hence Parmenian should not have threatened them (and consequently his own party) with eternal damnation. This mild doctrine is a great confirmation of the security of many of the peers against schism. It seems to be motivated by the notion that all who have faith will be saved, though after long torments,—a view which St. Augustine has frequently touched upon. Donatus and his party were great enemies of the necessary unity of the Church. The question was, where is this One Church? Opatus argues that it can be

Optimism (Latin optimus, best) may be understood as a metaphysical theory, or as an emotional disposition. The term became current in the early part of the eighteenth century to designate the Leibnizian doctrine that this is the best of all possible worlds. The antithesis of optimism is pessimism (q.v.). Between these extremes there are all shades of opinion, so that it is at times hard to classify philosophers. Those, however, are to be classed as optimists who maintain that the world is on the whole good and beautiful, and that man can attain to a state of true happiness and perfection either in this world or in the next, and those who do not are pessimists. The term optimism as thus extended would also include "meliorism," a word used in print by G. W. Leibniz to designate the theory of those who hold that things are, indeed, bad, but that they can be better, and that it is in our power to increase the happiness and welfare of mankind.

As an emotional disposition optimism is the tendency to look upon the bright and hopeful side of life, whereas pessimism gives a dark colouring to every event and closes the vistas of hope. The emotional disposition is one that depends upon internal organic conditions rather than external good fortune. To what extent the emotional disposition has influenced the opinion of philosophers cannot be decided off-hand. It has no doubt been a factor, but not always the only or even the decisive factor. A list of optimists will show that in general the greater minds have taken the hopeful view of life. As optimists are to be reckoned: Plato, Aristotle, Epicurus, St. Augustine, St. Thomas and the Scholastics, Leibniz, Kant, Fichte, Hegel (sought to unite optimism and pessimism), Lotze, Wundt.

It has been held by some that the Old Testament is pessimistic, and the New Testament pessimistic. The evidence brought forward for this theory is found mainly in the passages of the Old Testament which point to the rewards of the present life, and those in which all attention is given to the transitoriness of all human joys. This view is too narrow, and is not correct. Optimism as a philosophical term means that the universe as a whole is good and that man's ultimate destiny is one of happiness. The Old Testament is optimistic because of such passages as the following: "And God saw all things that he had made, and they were very good" (Gen. 1, 31). Even in Eccl. we read: "He hath made all things for his time" (iii, 11). The New Testament is optimistic because it shows that the sufferings of this life are not worthy to be compared to the glory that is to come. If optimism and pessimism are to be taken as emotional dispositions, either one or the other may exist in the ascetic or the profigate. It cannot be argued that the doctrine of Our Lord was pessimistic because He taught asceticism and celibacy. For as a rule ascetics and celibates have been and are, as a matter of fact, disposed to look upon the bright side of life. They surely believe that it is better to live than not to live, that the world which God has made is good and beautiful, and that man's destiny is eternal bliss.

As typical metaphysical exponents of optimism one may mention the extreme position of Leibniz, and the more moderate doctrine of St. Thomas Aquinas. Leibniz looked upon the series of possible worlds as actually infinite. This entire series must have passed as it were, through the mind of the All-Good and Omniscient God. In spite of the fact that the series is infinite, He must have seen that one of its parts was supremely perfect. Each one of these series strives to be realized in proportion to its perfection. Under such circumstances, it is impossible that a less perfect world should come into being. Since, furthermore, the wisdom and goodness of God are infinite, it is necessary that the world that proceeds from His intellect and will should be the best possible one that under any circumstances can exist. Only one such world is possible, and therefore God chooses the best. The very fact of the world's existence makes it metaphysically certain that it is the very best possible. [See Leibniz, IX, 137, subsection (4) Optimism.] This argument might seem convincing, if one overlooks the fact of the evil in the world. The world as it is, Leibniz maintained, with all its evil, is better than a world without evil. For the physical evil of the universe only serves to set off by contrast the beauty and glory of the good. As to moral evil, it is a negation and therefore cannot be looked upon as a real object of the Divine Will. Its presence, therefore, does not conflict with the goodness of the Divine decrees by which the world was ordained. Furthermore, since a morally evil being is only a less perfect creature, the absolutely perfect series of beings in order to contain all possible perfection, must, by necessity, contain the less as well as the more perfect. For if the series contained no beings lacking in moral perfection, it would be a shortened series, and therefore lacking in the types of less perfect beings.

Against the extreme optimism of Leibniz, one might say that God is not necessitated to choose the best of all possible worlds, because this is in itself an impossibility. Whatever exists besides God, is finite. Between the finite and the infinite there is always a field of indefinite extent. And since the finite cannot become infinite, simply because the created can never be uncreated, it therefore follows that besides God, is, and always will be, limited. If so, no matter what may exist, something better could be conceived and brought into being by God. An absolutely best possible world would, therefore, seem to be a contradiction in terms and impossible even to the Omnipotence of God, who can bring into being all and only that which is intrinsically possible. If, then, one should take the words "doing the best possible" as meaning creating something better than which nothing better is possible, no world could be the best possible. But there is another sense in which the words may be taken. Though one is not making the best thing that can be made, he still may be doing what he does in the best possible manner. In this sense, according to St. Thomas, God has made this world relatively the best possible. "When it is said that God can do anything better than He does it, this is true if the words 'anything better' stand for a noun. No matter what you may point out, God can make something that is better. . . . If, however, the words are used adverbially, and designate the mode of operation, God cannot do better than He does, for He cannot work with greater wisdom and goodness" (I, Q. xxv, a. 5, ad 1um). It is just this distinction which Leibniz failed to make, and was thereby led to his extreme position. According to St. Thomas, God was free to make a less or more perfect world. He made the world that would best fit the purposes of creation, and wrought it in the best possible manner.

Against this optimism may be urged the same objections from the presence of physical and moral evil which troubled Leibniz. But there are several considerations that reduce their force. (1) We see only in part. We cannot criticize the Divine plan intelligently until we see its full development, which indeed will only be in eternity. (2) The physical evils and sufferings of this life are not worthy to be compared with the glory that is to come. Should one object that it would be better to have glory both in this world and the next, one might answer that this is not certain true. Only by the endurance of suffering and sorrow do we attain to the true strength and glory of our manhood. That which we acquire by the sweat of our brow is earned and truly our own. That which comes to us by inheritance is but loaned and possessed by us for a time, till we can hand it on to another. What is true of the individual is true of the human race as a whole. It seems to be the Divine plan that it should work its way on, from little beginnings, with great toil and suffering, to its final goal of perfection. What is fulfilled in eternity can then look back upon something as its own. Perhaps this will then seem to us much more beautiful and glorious than God had allowed us to remain forever in a garden of paradise, happy indeed, but lifting nothing with the strength He gave us. Option. Right of.—In canon law an option is a way of obtaining a benefice or a title, by the choice of the new titular himself. Many chapters enjoyed this right formerly and it is still the privilege of some: the canon, who has held his office for the longest time, may, in conformity with the statutory regulation, resign the prebend he enjoys to accept another that has become vacant. A second right of option existed in France before 1789: by virtue of a custom a prebendary, who was appointed to and had entered into possession of a benefice incompatible with one he already held, was entitled to select whichever of the two he preferred, when, according to the common law, he had already lost the incompatible benefice which he had previously held. The right of option still exists with regard to cardinalitial titles (see CARDINAL).

O'QUEELY, MALACHIAS (Malacheshlachain O Cadhla), Archbishop of Tuam, Ireland, b. in Thomond, date unknown; d. at Ballinaclough, 27 October, 1645 (N.S.). He studied in Paris at the College of Navarre. Having administered Killala as vicar Apostolic, he was transferred to the see of Tuam at Galway, 11 October, 1631. His subjects, who received him unwillingly, soon learned to admire him. He held a provincial synod at Galway in 1632 to promulgate the Tridentine decrees and correct abuses, and his unremitting labours in Tuam provoked a complaint from the Protestant archbishop in 1641. Dr. O'Quelley attended the national synod of 1643, by which the Catholic Confederation was organized, and at the first meeting of the General Assembly he was elected to the Supreme Council, being afterwards appointed President of Connaught. He undertook to recover Sligo from the Scottish Covenanters in 1645, but the Scots surprised his camp at Ballysodare, 17-27 October, 1645. Everyone abandoned him but his secretary, Father Thaddeus O'Connell, and another priest. The archbishop was cut down with his companions, and the victors discovered in his carriage a draft of a secret treaty between King Charles and the Confederates, which the English Parliament published to prejudice both parties. His body was redeemed for £30 and buried with solemn ceremony, and in an account of the Aran Islands, printed in Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum". Oracle (oramulum, orare, to speak), a Divine communication given at a special place through specially appointed persons; also the place itself. This form of divination (q. v.) was found among various peoples of the ancient world.

I. BABYLON AND ASSYRIA.—Extremely ancient texts present the oracle-priest (bārû, 'he who sees': bārû, 'to see a sight'; hence, to give an oracle, to utter a prophecy') as one of the two main divisions of the acēredakē caste. He is the special servant of Shamas and Aššad; his office is hereditary (cf. the "sons of Aaron", "of Zadok"); blemish of person or pedigree (cf. Lev., xxii, 23) disqualifies him; he forms part of a college. Lengthy initiation, elaborate ritual, prepare him for the reception of the oracle, the bārūtu. Is the bloodred, jewelled Babylonian scapular the analogate to the Hebrew ephod and pectoral? After a preliminary sacrifice (usually of a lamb: but this, as those of expiation and thanksgiving, we cannot, in our limits, detail), he exacts the inquirer to the presence of the gods, and sits on the seat of judgment: Shamas and Aššad, the great gods of oracle, lords of decision, come to him and give him an unfailing answer (bārūtu, pessa: Divine teaching. Probably not connected with šurrā). There is no likely borrowing or adaptation of Babylonian oracle-words by the Hebrews (Lagrange, op. cit., 234, n. 8). All the customary modes of divination (interpretation of dreams, of stars, monstrosities, of signs in the oil, the liver etc.) culminated in oracles, but an enormous literature of preconceptions and principles left little initiative to a bārūtu whose memory was good. We may add a characteristic example of oracle text (about 880 B.C.).

O Shamas, great lord, to my demand, in thy faithful favour, deign to answer! Between this day, the 3rd day of this month, the month of Art, until the 11th day of the month of Abū of this year, within these hundred days and these hundred nights... within this space of time will Kashtarit and his troops, or the troops of the Cimmerians... or all other enemy, succeed in their designs? By assault, by force... by starvation, by the names of the god and goddess, by parley and amicable confercence, or by any other stratagem and all shall they take the town of Kishassu? shall they enter the walls of this town of Kishassu?... shall it fall into their hands? Thy great godhead knoweth it. Is the taking of this town of Kishassu, by whatsoever enemy it be, from this day unto the [last] day appointed, ordained and decreed by the order and mandate of thy great godhead, O Shamash, great Lord?
Shall we see it? Shall we hear it? etc. Observe the preoccupation of leaving the god no avenue of elusion—
every possible contingency is named.

Among the nomad Arabs the priest is primarily a charger of oracles (by means of arrow-shafts, cf. Ezck., xxi, 21), though named Kēth the Hebrew being.
But since in Hebrew, Phœnician, Aramaic, and Ethiopian Kēth means priest, and cannot be etymologically con-ected with any "divine," we must conclude (Lagrange, op. cit., 218) that the Arabian oracle-monger is a degenerate priest, not (Wellhausen) that all Semitic priests were aboriginally oracle-mongers.

II. THE HEBREWS.—Oracles were vouchsafed to the Hebrews by means of the Thummim, the seer's jewel, which is a form of the Urim and Thummim, which together are to be connected with the Epidh.
The Urim (see Ephod) was (i) a linen dress worn in ritual circumstances (by priests, I Sam., xxii, 18, the child Samuel, and David; II Sam., vi, 14); (ii) the epidh
as described in Exod., xviii, peculiar to the high-priest;
over it was worn the pectoral containing Urim and Thummim;
(iii) an idolatrous, oracular image, connected with the Thummim (otherwise oracular); that is, Gideon erected weighed 1700 sikels of gold ( Judges, viii, 27; xvii, 5; xviii, 14, 20; Osee, iii, 4 etc.).
But why was this image called an epidh (a dress)?
In Isaiah, xxx, 22, it is the silver overlaying of idols, is parallel to νήστιν, their golden sheath. If then the Israelites were already familiar with an oracle operating in close connection with a jewelled epidh, it will have been easy to transfer this name to a richly plated oracular image.

The law directs (Num., xxvii, 18) that the leader of the people shall stand before the priest, and proffer his request that the priest shall "define the value of Urim and Thummim before Yahweh".
The priest alone (for the Abi-jah of I Sam., xiv, 3, 18, is the Ahi-melek of xxi, 1, xxii, 9, with the Divine name corrected) carries the epidh before Israel, and inquires on behalf of the chief alone (for Abi-melek, I Sam., xxi, 13-15, denotes having inquired for David while Saul still is king; see van Hoovenker, op. cit., 376).
Thus history would agree with the Law as to the unity of the oracle, and its exclusive use by priest and prince.

Josephus thought the θυραρικαί were stones of changing lustre. The meaning of the names is unknown. Though they seem to have been used for sacred lots, and though 1 Sam., xiv, 37 sqq. (especially in LXX) makes it fairly clear that they gave answer by Yes and No (in I Sam., xxii, 2, 4, 11, 12; xxx, 8, the long phrase "and it is said" is priestly language), and though I Sam., xiv, 42 (if indeed this still refers to the oracle and not to a private oracle offered by Saul to, and rejected by the people), by using the word θυραρικαί, "to throw (both to me and Jonathan)" suggests a casting of lots, yet the U and T were not mere pebbles (e.g.
black and white), for besides answering Yes and No,
they could refuse answer altogether. This happened when the inquirer was ritually unclean (so Saul, in the personification of 1 Sam., 37:1; the exorcist from the new-moon meal, ibid., xx, 26; sexual intercourse precludes from eating sacred bread, ibid., xxi, 4).—Observe the lack, in Yahweh's oracle, of the magical element, and enjoy the gratitude, which disguise those quoted in I. Notice, too, how Hebrew priest and prince alike submit unquestioningly to the Divine communication. The prince does not dare to seek to cajole or terrify the priest; nor the priest distort or invent the oracle. Finally, when the epica of the great prophets opens, it is through them

God manifests His will; the use of the epidh ceases;
the Urim and Thummim are silent and ultimately lost.

III. GREECE AND ROME.—"(Oraculum: quod inest
in his deorum oratio", Cic. "Top.", xx, "Voluntas divina hominis ore enuntiata", Senec., "Controv.", I.
prst. M. Aurelii

Macro as in μανοια, mens. The adverter was the mouthpiece, the προφορης, the interpreter of the oracle (so already Plato, "Tim.", lxxii, 2, "χρηστος ορατος εχει, furnish what is needful"; hence active), to give (middle), to consult an oracle.

Oracles, in the familiar sense, flourished best in Greek or Hellenised areas, though even here the escstatic element probably came, as a rule, from the East.
The local element, however (for Hellenic oracles escentially localize divine revelations), and the praxis of interpreting divine voices as heard in wind, or tree, or water (φημα της θεος, λόγος δια—Zeus was ῥαμπαδος of the Italian saenta, karmeneta) were rooted in Greek or pre-Greek religion. A formidable history and theorizing behind the oracles of "classical" times. Thus at Delphi the stratification of cults shows us, undermost, the prehistoric, chthonian worship of the pre-Achaeans:
Gaia (followed by, or identified with, "Themis") and the impersonal nymphs are the earliest tenants of the famous chasm and the spring Kassotis. Dionysos, from orgiast Thrace, or, as was then held, from the mystic East, invaded the shrine, importing, or at least accommodating, elements of enthusiasm and religious delirium; for the immense development and Orphic reformation of his cult, in the seventh century, can but have modified, not introduced, his worship. Apollo, dismembering with the Achaeans on the Kranian shore, strives to outstrip him, and, though but sharing the year's worship and the temple with his predecesssors, eclipses what he cannot destroy. Echoes of this savage light, this stubborn resistance of the dim, old-fashioned worship to the brilliant new-comer, reach us in hymn and drama, are glossed by the devout Aeschylus (Eumen. prol.), and accentuated by the rationalist Euripides (Ion, etc.). Yet the ornamented and the ultimate reconciliation. For, in the end, a compromise is effected: the priestess still sits by the docht, drinks of the spring, still utters the frantic inarticulate cries of ecstasy, but the prophets of the new Apollo discipline her ravings into hexameters, and thus the will of Zeus, through the inspiration of Apollo, is uttered by the pythons to all Greece.

Apollo was the cause at once of the glory and the downfall of Delphi. Partly in reaction against him, partly in imitation of him, other oracles were restored or created. In our brief limits we cannot describe or even enumerate these. We may mention the extremely ancient oracle of Dodona, where the spirit of Zeus (ι της Δοδονης—(the oracles began) spoke to the priestesses in the oak, the echoing bronze, the waterfall; the underground Trophonius oracle in Lebeda was, with its violent sanctification (Paus., IX, 39, 11; Plut., "Gen. Soc.", 22); and the incubation oracles of Asklepios, where the sleeping sick awaited the epiphany of the hero, and miraculous cure. Thousands of votive objects, gilded wounds and straightened limbs are unearthed in these shrines;
and at Dodona, leaden tablets inquired after a vanished blanket, whether it be lost or stolen; or by prayer to what god or hero faction-rent Corcyra may find peace.

Other especially famous oracles were those of Apollo
at Atea, Delos, Patar, Claros; of Poseidon at Onchae-

whites, the remainder belonging to the coloured races—mostly Kafirs and Hottentots. The climate is excellent. With a mean altitude of from four to five thousand feet above sea level and an average yearly rainfall of only twenty-two inches, it is a country well suited to persons suffering from pulmonary troubles, the air being dry and invigorating and the nights always cool. Being an immense grassy plateau with almost treeless, its scenery is uninteresting (impressing) except on the eastern border where the vast Drakensberg mountain range comes into view. It is mainly a pastoral country, though a portion of it alongside Basutoland contains some of the finest corn lands in Africa. The exports, valued at 17,800,000 dollars, are principally diamonds, wool, ostrich feathers, and maize; its imports in the same period amounted to 15,000,000 dollars.

The white inhabitants are mostly the descendants of the Voortrekkers (or emigrant Dutch farmers) from the old Cape Colony, who in 1830 and subsequent years crossed the Orange River in thousands and settled on territories people by various Bantu tribes until their virtual extermination by Moselekeats and his hordes of Matabile warriors—a short time previously. The "Great Trek", as the migration of these farmers came to be called, brought about an abnormal political situation. Although not true under British rule in the Colony, they had abandoned their homes and sought independence in "the wilderness". But the British Government, whilst always claiming them as its subjects and forbidding them to molest the neighbouring native tribes, refused to annex the territory to which they had fled. Such a state of things manifestly could not long endure, and so in 1848 the country between the Orange and Vaal Rivers was officially proclaimed British territory under the title of the "Orange River Sovereignty". The emigrant Boers, headed by a farmer named Andreas Pretorius, struggled to retain their independence but were defeated at the battle of Boomplaats by the English general, Sir Harry Smith, in August, 1848. The British Government, finding the newly annexed territory of little value and desiring in view of European complications and the enormous cost of Kafir wars to limit its responsibilities in South Africa, soon determined to restore their country to the Boers; thus, at a conference held in Bloemfontein on 23 February, 1854, Sir George Clark in the name of Queen Victoria renounced British dominion over the Orange River Sovereignty. The Boers thereupon set up a Republic, which, under the name of the Orange Free State, enjoyed a period of peace and prosperity that lasted up to the Anglo-Boer War of 1889-1902. In that struggle the Free States, having joined the Transvaalers, shared in their defeat, and their country was annexed by the British Empire under the title of the Orange River Colony. For some years the new colony was administered by a governor and a lieutenant-governor assisted by an executive and a legislative council, but in June, 1907, responsible government was conferred on it with a legislative council of eleven, and a legislative assembly of thirty-eight members.

Since 31 May, 1910, under the title of "The Orange Free State Province of the Union of South Africa", it forms part (together with the Transvaal, Natal, and the Cape of Good Hope) of a self-governing dominion of the British Empire, the first parliament of which was opened at Cape Town on 4 November, 1910. In that parliament the Orange Free State Province is represented by sixteen senators—one-fourth of the entire number—and by seventeen members of the House of Assembly (out of a total of 121). English and Dutch are the official languages. The former is spoken mostly in the towns and the latter—or rather a dialect of it known as the Afrikaansche Taal—in the country districts. The religion of the great majority of the white inhabitants is Calvinism (Dutch Reformed). Those of English origin belong to the different dominations usually found in the British colonies and in the United States of America. The Orange Free State contains a good number of neat little towns with populations varying from one to eight thousand. Bloemfontein, capital of the province, so called from a spring (fontein) on the farm of Jan Bloem, an early German settler, is a spacious, clean, and well-built city of 33,000 inhabitants, and the seat of the provincial council as well as the legal and judicial centre of the entire Union. It is distant 400 miles from East London, the nearest seaport, and 290 miles from Pretoria, the executive capital. Other important towns are Kroonstad, Harrismith, Jagersfontein, and Smithfield, in each of which there is a Catholic church. The total number of Catholics in the Orange Free State is about 30,000, mostly of European origin or descent. The province forms part of the Vicariate of Kimberley (q. v.), which is in the Cape Province, and in which the vicar Apostolic resides. The present (1910) vicar Apostolic is the Right Reverend Matthew Gaughavn, O.M.I., titular Bishop of Tenytiva. Catholics enjoy absolute freedom of worship, but receive no governmental aid for their clergy or schools. The Roman Dutch Law, which is administered in the courts, is favorable to Catholics on many points as tenure of ecclesiastical property, marriage, wills, and charitable bequests. The clergy are not liable to serve on juries or as jurors on "command," nor are churches taxed. Flourishing convent schools and academies are directed by the Sisters of the Holy Family at Bloemfontein and Jagersfontein, and by the Sisters of Notre Dame (of Namur) at Kroonstad.

ORANGE RIVER. Vicaire Apostolic of, and the Prefecture Apostolic of GREAT NAMAQUALAND, in South Africa. The vicariate was erected in 1897 after having been a prefecture Apostolic since July, 1885. It comprises the whole of Little Namaqualand (beginning on the northern line of the Orange River Colony, i.e. 30° 35' S. lat.), extends to the Atlantic Ocean on the west, and to the Orange River on the north. It further includes Bushmanland, the districts of Kenhardt, Van Rhyns, Dorp, and Frazerburg on the east, and extending to the Orange River, the districts of the Orange River in Bechuana and. The prefecture, detached from the vicariate in July, 1909, is bounded on the west by the Atlantic Ocean. It extends from the Orange River as far as Damaraland (29° 20' S. lat.), and comprises the city of Rehboth and its district. The eastern boundary line is 20° E. long.

GREAT NAMAQUALAND. For thirty or forty, or in certain districts even a hundred miles inland, this district is only a sandy desert, which extends on the eastern side to the great Kalahari desert. The central portion depends for its fertility almost exclusively on thunder-storms, without which it would be nearly destitute of water. The vicariate is but little better in this respect. When, however, a sufficiently long rain waters these fororn regions, the richest pastures spring up in an incredibly short time. The very air then becomes saturated to such a degree with the odour of vegetation that many suffer from headache. Swarms of locusts devour the exuberant produce, unless some powerful east wind carries them into the sea. The "Gottersoch" in Great Namaqualand consists of German immigrants, and, in the other parts of the mission, of English, Irish, and Boer settlers, while the Hottentots form the bulk of the scanty population in the two Namaqualands. They are not negroes. Their skin is like that of whites much browned by jaundice, and their build more like that of the Egyptians seen on ancient monuments; or again, resembling that of the Chinese, only exceeding them or any other race on earth in their ugliness, equally when burdened with years. Unselfish hospitality appears to be their only natural virtue. They love music. Their habit of imitating is such as to rouse either a smile or excration; a crowd of Hottentots at Holy Mass, when receiving the priest's blessing, all repeated the sign of the Cross over him! The late Max Müller, nevertheless, vouched for their ancestors having been a cultured race. Although they have in their language a word signifying Deity, it took a long time to make them understand spiritual doctrines other than that of the existence of the devil. They are extremely disinclined to any form of labour or exertion. To induce them, for example, to navigate, the missionaries built a boat by which to cross the Orange River. For weeks, neither encouraging words nor exhibitions of safe sailing appeared to make any impression on them. One missionary relates that, among his Hottentots each human, there was one who never could learn how to make the sign of the Cross, nor the answers of the catechism, nor any prayer except these words of the Pater Noster: "Our Father, give us this day our daily bread." The missionaries have shown here what an uplifting influence the Catholic Church exercises over the most forlorn nations, since the younger generation, trained as far as circumstances allowed, are considerably more intelligent and susceptible of culture than their elders.

BUSHMANLAND. In this territory are found the Bushmen (or Boisemans), a tribe kindred to the Hottentots. They are short and thick-set, in a clumsy and inarticulate. Intellectually and morally they are not on a higher level than the Hottentots, but, as far as they have been accessible to the missionaries, they have improved in both respects.

BECHUANALAND. The Bechuanas belong to the Kaif race. Many of them show some skill in iron and copper working and in mining, also in tanning hides. Very different from the Hottentots, many of them present a pleasing appearance, and some are handsome.

MISSIONS. When the Oblates of St. Francis de Sales arrived in Little Namaqualand, to which the mission was then confined, they found not one hundred Catholics. In 1903, without any change of population, they counted 2735. There were six stations with churches and resident priests, five other stations regularly attended, 123 conversions, 80 marriages, and 98 children were baptized; 122 confirmations, 25 marriages; 3 hospitals and homes for the aged, 8 schools, 3 orphanages, 82 orphans, 8 missionary priests, 3 catechists; 15 missionary sisters aided the mission. Some fifty places are now visited by the priests to attend to the spiritual and temporal wants of the people. In several places, all Catholic adults receive Holy Communion on the first Friday of every month and the great feasts of the year. Sells is the residence of the vicar Apostolic, and Hirschkals that of the prefect Apostolic. These results are most encouraging, when the great difficulties confronting the missionaries are considered. In 1909 the approximate statistics for the two missions were: 1 bishop; 14 priests; 3 catechists; 22 missionary sisters; 460 children in Catholic schools; 175 baptisms of children, 316 of adults. In Little Namaqualand the natives understand Dutch or English; but in Great Namaqualand, besides German, the extremely difficult language of the Hottentots has to be mastered.

For reports and statistics of the missions, consult the following periodicals: Annuaire du Sénégal (Paris), an illustrated monthly; Lioti (Vienna); Bulle des Oblats de Saint François de Sales (Childs, Maryland). Cf. also Missions Catholiques (Rome, 1907); Statehouse's Year Book (London).

Orans (Orante).—Among the subjects depicted in the art of the Roman catacombs one of those most numerously represented is that of a female figure with extended arms known as the Orans, or one who prays. The custom of praying in antiquity with outstretched, raised arms was common to both Jews and Gentiles; indeed the iconographic type of the Orans was itself strongly influenced by classic representations (see Leclercq, "Manuel d'arch. chrét.", I, 135).

But the meaning of the Orans of Christian art is quite different from that of its prototypes. Numerous Biblical figures, for instance, depicted in the catacombs—Noah, Abraham, Isaac, the Three Children in the Fiery Furnace, Daniel in the lions' den—are pictured asking the Lord to deliver the soul of the person on whose tomb they are depicted as he once delivered the particular personage represented. But besides these Biblical Orans figures there exist in the catacombs many ideal figures (153 in all) in the ancient attitude of prayer, which, according to Wilpert, are to be regarded as symbols of the deceased's soul in heaven, praying for its friends on earth. This symbolic meaning accounts for the fact that the great majority of the figures of this order are female, even when depicted on the tombs of men. One of the most convincing proofs that the Orans was regarded as a symbol of the soul is an ancient lead medal in the Vatican Museum showing the martyr, St. Lawrence, under torture, while his soul, in the form of a female Orans, is just leaving the body (see Kraus, "Gesch. der christl. Kunst", I, 126, fig. 56). An arcosolium in the Ostrianum cemetery represents an Orans with a petition for her intercession: Victoria Virgo, Pater. The Acts of St. Cecilia speaks of souls leaving the body in the form of virgins: "Vidit ecgridentes animas eorum de corporibus, quasi virgines de thalamo", and so also the Acts of Sts. Peter and Marcellinus.

Very probably the medieval representations of a diminutive body, figure of the soul, issuing from the mouths of the dying, to be received by angels or demons, were reminiscences of the Orans as a symbol of the soul. The earlier Orantes were depicted in the simplest garb, and without any striking individual traits, but in the fourth century the figures become richly adorned, and of marked individuality—indeed an indication of the approach of historic art. One of the most remarkable figures of the Orans cycle, dating from the early fourth century, is interpreted by Wilpert as the Blessed Virgin interceding for the friends of the deceased. Directly in front of Mary is a boy, not in the Orans attitude and supposed to be the Divine Child, while to the right and left are monograms of Christ.

MAURICE M. HASSETT.

Orate Fratres, the exhortation ("Pray brethren that my sacrifice and yours be acceptable to God the Father almighty") addressed by the celebrant to the people before the Secrets in the Roman Mass. It is answered: "May the Lord receive the sacrifice from thy hands to the praise and glory of his name, and for our benefit also and for that of all his holy Church."

THE BLESSED VIRGIN AS AN ORANTE
Fourth Century fresco in the Crypta Sacra Ostrianum

The celebrant adds: "Amen". The form is merely an expansion of the usual Orans before any prayer. It is a medieval amplification. The Jacobite rite has an almost identical form before the Anaphora (Brightman, "Eastern Liturgies", Oxford, 1896, 83); the Nestorian celebrant says: "My brethren, pray for me" (ib., 274). Such invocations, often made by the deacon, are common in the Eastern rites. The Gallican rite had a similar one (Duchene, "Christian Worship", London, 1904, 109); The Mozarabic invitation at this place is: "Help me brethren by your prayers and pray to God for me" (P. L., LXXXV, 537). The medieval derived rites had similar formulae (e.g. "Missale Sarum", Burntisland, 1861–3, 596). Many of the old Roman secrets (really Optional prayers) contain the same ideas. Durandus knows the Orate Fratres in a slightly different form ("Rationale", IV, 32). A proof that it is not an integral part of the old Roman Mass is that it is always said, not sung, aloud (as also are the prayers at the foot of the altar, the last Gospel etc.). The celebrant after the "Suscipe Sancta Trinitas" kisses the altar, turns to the people and says: Orate fratres, extending and joining his hands. Turning back he finishes the sentence inaudibly. At high Mass the deacon or subdeacon, at low Mass the server, answers. The rubric of the Missal is: "The server or people around answer, if not the priest himself." In this last case he naturally changes the word tuus to meus.
ORATORIANS. See ORATORY OF SAINT PHILIP NERI.

Oratorio, as at present understood, is a musical composition for solo voices, chorus, orchestra, and organ, to a religious text generally taken from Holy Scripture. The dramatic element contained in the text depends for its expression on the music alone. On the other hand the oratorio originated in St. Philip Neri's oratory has recently been attacked, notably by the historian and critic E. Schelle, in "Neue Zeitschrift für Musik" (Leipzig, 1864). The chief point he makes is that the oratories of San Giovanni and Santa Maria in Vallicella, at Rome, were unsuitable for the performance of sacred dramas. In refutation, it suffices to recall the established fact that Eligio del Cavallero's raffrezzamento sacra, "Anima e corpo", had its first performance in the Vallicella (Chiesa Nuova) in 1600, five years after the death of St. Philip. Although the name oratorio was not applied to the new form until sixty years later (Andreas Bontempi, 1624-1705), there is an unbroken tradition connecting the exercises established by St. Philip with the period when the new art-form received its definite character. While in the sixteenth century liturgical polyphonic music reached its highest development, secular music boasted only one ensemble or choral form, the madrigal. The spirit of the Renaissance, that is the revolt against the domination of the arts by the spirit of the Church of Greek monody, and gradually perfected compositions for one or more voices and instruments which ultimately culminated in the opera.

St. Philip, realizing the great power of music, provided in the rule for his congregation, "that his fathers together with the faithful, should rouse themselves to the contemplation of heavenly things by means of sacred music." He set upon the goal in the new trend and made it the foundation of a new form upon which he, perhaps unconsciously, put a stamp retained ever since. He practically created a style midway between liturgical and secular music. His love of simplicity caused him to oppose and counteract the prevailing artificial semi-pagan, literary, and oratorical style which had its musical counterpart in the display of contrapuntal skill for its own sake practiced at the time. He drew to himself masters like Giovanni Annunccia and Pier Luigi da Palestrina, formed them spiritually, and bade them set to music in simple and clear style, for three or four voices, short poems in the vernacular, generally written by himself, and called "Laudi spirituali". Many of these were preserved by F. Soto di Langa, a musician and a disciple of the saint. Their performance alternated with spiritual reading, prayer, and a sermon by one of the fathers, by a layman, or even by a boy. From these exercises, which attracted enormous crowds, and obtained great renown throughout Italy, it was but a step to the Commenda harmonica "Amphiarnasso", by Orazio Vecchi (1550-1605), in dialogue in madrigal form between two choirs (first performed at Modena in 1694), and the rappresentazione en plein air, "Anima e corpo", by Cavaglieri. The latter consisted of short phrases for a single voice, more varied in form than the recitativo secco, but not yet sufficiently developed to have a distinct melodic physiognomy, accompanied by instruments, and choral numbers, or madrigals. Similar productions multiplied rapidly. Wherever the Oratorians established themselves they cultivated this form to attract the young people. The municipal library of Hamburg contains a collection, headed by Chrysander, of twenty or twenty-two different texts which originated with the disciples of St. Philip during the second half of the seventeenth century. Even more active in the creation and propagation of these musical-dramatic productions throughout this period were the Jesuits, who, especially in Germany, used these musical plays in their schools and colleges everywhere. Up to the latter part of the seventeenth century the burden of the texts for these compositions was either a legend, the history of a conversion, the life of a saint, or the passion of a martyr.

Among those who cultivated, or helped in developing, the oratorio in Italy were Benedetto Ferrari (1597-1651), "Salsone", Agostino Bazzani (1578-1640), dramma pastorale, "Euridice" (1658), "La pellegrina costante", "Sant' Ignazio Loyola", Giacomo Carissimi (1604-74), through whom the oratorio made a notable advance, was the first master to turn to Holy Scripture for his texts. His works, with Latin or Italian texts, many of which have been preserved (see Carissimi), together with those of his contemporaries, show practically the same construction as is followed in the present time: recitatives, arias, duets, and terzettes, alternating with single and double choruses and instrumental numbers. The historio or narrator (in some scores designated by the word text, "text") has replaced scenic display and dramatic action. Carissimi's orchestration exhibits a resourcefulness and charm before unknown. His oratorio "Jephtha" (in an arrangement by Dr. Emanuel Wack) was performed successfully at Leipzig recently in 1873. After him, the greatest Italian master was Alessandro Scarlatti (1659-1725) a pupil of Francesco Provenzale and Carissimi. "Chief among his works are "I dolori di Maria" and "Il Sacrificio di Apollo". About this time the leadership passed to Germany, where Heinrich Schütz (1585-1672) had previously prepared the soil by his compositions known as "passion music" and other forms, met by the Italian oratorio. Others who had received their formation in Italy, but whose activity was chiefly confined to Germany, and who transplanted the oratorio either, were Ignazio Jacob Hofhaimer (1714-1771), who wrote "Balthia liberta"; Johann Adolphe Hasse (1699-1783), "La Conversione di S. Agostino" etc.; Antonio Caldara (1670-1730); Nicolo Jomelli (1714-1774); Marc-Antoine Charpentier (1653-1704), a pupil of Carissimi and a gifted composer, wrote, besides a large number of works for the church, eighteen oratorios in the style of his master which had great vogue in France. His "Renemont de St. Pierre" has recently been revived with great success in France. In the hands of Johann Mattheson (1681-1764), the oratorio becomes identified with Protestant worship in Germany. Contemporary with George Frederick Händel (1685-1759), he wrote twenty-four oratorios, intended to be divided into two parts by a sermon, the whole constituting a religious service. His texts were mostly taken from Scripture. Biblical events are brought into conjunction and contrasted with contemporary happenings, and a moral is drawn. Others who cultivated the oratorio form, particularly in Protestant Germany, were George Philipp Telemann (1681-1767), Constantin Beller- mann (1696-1758), and Dietrich Buxtehude (1637-1707).

Through Händel the oratorio attained a position in musical art more important than at any previous period in its history and never surpassed since. In his hands it became the expression of the sturdy Saxon faith unaffected by the spirit of doubt latent in the religious revolt of the sixteenth century. Formed in Germany and Italy, he united in a pre-eminent degree the highest creative gifts. The most productive period of his life was spent in England, and, after having cultivated the opera for a number of years, he finally turned to the oratorio, producing a series of works ("The Messiah", "Israel in Egypt", "Saul", "Jephtha", "Belshazzar", "Samson" etc.) unrivalled for heroic grandeur and brilliancy. It may be said that they express the national religious ideal of a Protestant Christian people more adequately than does their form of worship. This undoubtedly accounts for the interest taken in oratorio performances by the people in England and in Protestant Germany. Joseph Haydn (1732-1809) produced two of the greatest oratorios which we possess: "The Creation" and "The Seasons". While composed to secular texts, they breathe the most tender piety and joy through an inexhaustible wealth of lyric and lofty music. A third oratorio, "Ritorno di Tobia", on a Biblical text, has not the same importance, nor does Mozart (1756-91), in his only oratorio, "Davidde penitentis", attain the artistic level of most of his productions. Ludwig van Beethoven (1770-1827) wrote one oratorio, "The Mount of Olives", which shows him at his best.

Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy (1809-47), in "Elijah" and "St. Paul", returns to the early Protestant feature of letting the supposed congregation or audience participate in the performance by singing the choruses or church hymns, the texts of which consist of reflections and meditations on what has preceded. From this period the oratorio begins to be cultivated almost exclusively by Catholics. Franz Liszt (1811-86), in his "Christus est resurgam" and "Legendae de sanctorum Elisabeth", opens up a new and distinctly Catholic era. France, which, since the days of Charpentier, had practically neglected the oratorio, probably on account of the operas appealing more strongly to the French taste and temperament, and because of the lack of amateur singers, has, within the last thirty years, furnished a number of remarkable works. Charles-François Gounod (1818-96), with his "Redemption", and "Mors et Vita", gave a renewed impetus to the cultivation of the oratorio. The "Samson and Delilah" of Camille Saint-Saëns (1835-1921) may be performed either as an oratorio or as an opera; as opera it has attained the greater favour. Jules Massenet (1842-1912) has essayed the form with his "Eve" and "Mary Magdalen", but his style is entirely too sensational and melodramatic to carry the text. Gabriel Pierné (1863-1931) "Children's Crusade" and the smaller work, "The Children at Bethlehem", have both obtained great popularity in Europe and America.

But as a solo representative of any note in more than two hundred years is Don Lorenzo Perosi (1872--), with his trilogy "The Passion of Our Lord according to St. Mark", "The Transfiguration of Christ", and "The Resurrection of Lazarus", and "Christmas Oratorio", "Leo the Great", and "The Last Judgment.

Belgium and England have produced the three most remarkable exponents of the oratorio within the last fifty years. César Auguste Franck's (1822-90) oratorios, "Ruth", "Rebecca", "Redemption", and, above all, his "Beatitudes", rank among the greatest of modern works of the kind. Edward William Elgar (1857-) has become famous by his "Dream of Gerontius" and his "Apostles". But Edgar Tinel (1854--) is probably the most gifted among the modern Catholics who have reclaimed the oratorio from non-Catholic supremacy. His world-famous "St. Francis of Assisi" is perhaps the most remarkable for its spiritual heights it reveals than for its dramatic power. Other works of his which have attracted attention are "Godoléva" and "St. Catherine". It is a happy omen that all these authors, in the fore-front of present-day composers, command the highest creative and constructive skill which enables them to turn into Catholic channels all the modern conquests in means of expression. The Catholic Oratorio Society of New York was founded in 1896. It has been a prolific producer of oratorios and reproduction of oratorios that best exemplify the religious ideal.

Oratory of Saint Philip Neri, Tur.—Under this head are included the Italian, Spanish, English, and other communities, which follow the rule of St. Philip Neri. The revolt of the sixteenth century, though apparently threatening in its spread and strength the very life of the Church, ensured a marvelous display of its Divine fecundity. That century saw the origin of the Society of Jesus, founded by St. Ignatius Loyola; the Theatines, by St. Cajetan; the Barnabites, by St. B. M. Zaccaria; the Brothers Hospitalers, by St. John of God; the Oratory of St. Philip. The foundation of the last was laid at S. Girolamo, Rome, where his disciples gathered for spiritual instruction. Gradually these conferences took definite shape, and St. Philip, now a priest, constructed an oratory over the house of S. Girolamo, where they might be held; from this probably the congregation was named. In 1564 he took charge of the church of the Florentines, where his disciples who were priests said Mass and preached four sermons daily, interspersed by hymns and popular devotions. Eleven years' work at St. John's proved to the growing community the necessity of having a church of their own and under a definite rule. They obtained from the pope the church of S. Maria in Vallicella, rebuilt and now known as the Chiesa Nuova, where the congregation was erected by Gregory XIII, July 15, 1576. The church was to be a conclave of secular priests living under obedience, but bound by no vows. So particular was St. Philip on this point that he ruled, that even if the majority wished to bind themselves by vows, the minority who did not wish to do so should have the property and the rule of the congregation. "Habent possebat", were St. Philip's words. Another characteristic of the institute was the fact that each house was independent, and when it was empowered to represent him, that while one house might have a handful of members and another a surplus, both would benefit by a transference of subjects from the more numerous community, he replied, "Let each house live by its own vitality, and let not one pasture the other." His motive probably was to exclude the possibility of any community lingering in a state of decay.

The rule, an embodiment of St. Philip's mode of governing, was not drawn up till seventeen years after his death, and was finally approved by Paul V in 1612. The provost is elected for three years by a majority of all the decennial Fathers, i.e., those who have been ten years in the congregation. In the government of the congregation four deputes are elected. All matters of grave importance are decided by the general congregation, only the decennial Fathers voting. Admission to the congregation is also by election and the candidate must be "natus ad institutum", between the ages of eighteen and forty, and possessed of sufficient income to maintain himself. The novitiate lasts three years, and was probably thus extended to test thoroughly the vocation to an institute not bound by vows. At the conclusion of the three years, the novice if approved becomes a triennial Father and a member of the congregation, but he has no elective vote till his tenth years are completed, when by election he becomes a decennial. The novitiate is by a majority of two-thirds of the voters. No member is allowed to take any ecclesiastical dignity. Regulations for the clothing, mode of life in the community, and for the refectory are also laid down. The object of the institute is threefold: prayer, preaching, and the sacraments. "Prayer" includes special care in carrying out the liturgical Offices, the Fathers being present in choir at the principal feasts, as well as assisting at the daily popular devotions. The "Sacraments" imply their frequent reception, which had fallen into disuse at the foundation of the Oratory. For this purpose one of the Fathers is to sit daily in the confessional, and all are to be present in their confessions on the eve of feasts. The "mode of direction as taught..." by St. Philip is to be gentle rather than severe, and abuses are to be attacked indirectly. "Once let a little love find entrance to their hearts," said St. Philip, "and the rest will follow."

"Preaching" included, as has been said, four sermons in succession daily, an almost impossible strain upon the hearers as it would now appear, but the discourses at the Oratory had an attraction of their own. Statements had already prepared the inability of the preachers of his day to awaken dead souls with their subtle arguments and rhetorical periods, to the impotent efforts of the flute-players to revivify their mournful music, the corpse of Jairus's daughter, and Bertha in St. Philip's oratory demonstrated this.

"What can I hear in sermons?" he says, "but Doctor Subtilis striding with Doctor Angelicus, and Aristotle coming in as a third to decide the quarrel."

The sermons at the Oratory were free from these defects. They were simple and familiar discourses; the first an exposition on some point of the spiritual reading which preceded them and therefore impromptu; the next would be on some text of Holy Scripture, the third on ecclesiastical history, and the fourth on the lives of the saints. Each sermon lasted half an hour, when a bell was rung and the preacher at once ceased speaking. A service of the church, with the entertainment of the sermon by a boy and the musical services at the Roman Oratory. Animuccia, choir master at St. Peter's, attended constantly to lead the singing. In close connexion with the Oratory is the "Psalter of St. Philip," a compilation of the office by a monk, with a variety of hymns composed by Father Faber and the Roman devotionals and processes, then strange to England, seemed to many a hazardous innovation. Time proved the popularity of the exercises, and Father Faber's preaching attracted large crowds. His spiritual works published year by year increased the interest in his Oratory, while the lives of the saints edited by him, forty-two in number, in spite of their literary defects, did great work in setting forth the highest examples of Christian holiness. The community removed to their present site in South Kensington in 1854, and in 1884 their new church was opened in the presence of the Bishop of London. An edition of the sermons of the London Oratory may be named, after Father Faber, Father Daiguirons (o. v.); Father Stanton, "Menology of England and Wales" (Lon- don, 1887); Father Hutchison, "Loreto and Nazareth" (London, 1883); Father Knox, "The Douai Diary" (London, 1878), and "Life of Cardinal Allen" (London, 1882); Father Philip de Rivière, "The Holy Places"; and other works; Father John Bowden, "Life of Fr. Faber" (London, 1869); Father Morris, "Life of St. Patrick"; and Father Anstrups, translator of Puoter's "Popes" (vols. 1-6, St. Louis, 1902) and the "Tregi dell' Oratorio."

Converted in 1845, he went to Rome in 1846 and with the advice of Pius IX selected the Oratory of St. Philip Neri as best adapted for his future work. After a short visit at Santa Croce he returned in 1847 with a Brief from Pius IX for founding the Oratory. He established himself at Maryvale, Old Oscott, where in 1848 he was joined by Father Faber and his Willfridian community. After a temporary removal to St. Wilfrid's, Staffordshire, and Aylesford, Birmingham, the community founded a permanent home at Edgbaston, a suburb of that town, in 1854. The institute of the English congregation is substantially that of the Roman. The Fathers live under St. Philip's Rule and carry out his work. In compliance with a widely expressed wish of English Catholics, Cardinal Newman founded at Edgbaston a still flourishing higher class school for boys. A Brotherhood of the Little Oratory is also attached to the community and the exercises are a focus of spiritual life. Among the best known writers of the English Oratory are, besides its illustrious head, Father Caswell, a poet, Father Ignatius Ryder, a controversialist and essayist, and Father Pope. A Newman memorial church in the classical style was opened in 1910. The library contains among many valuable works Cardinal Newman's series of "Letters on Systematical Theology."

The London Oratory. — In 1849 Cardinal Newman sent a detachment of his community to found a house in London. Premises were secured at 24 and 25 King's Road, Chelsea, and on 11 November, 1844, a chapel in a house at 22, where William St. Strand, a priest of the society, conducted the first service. The chapel was opened for public worship on 31 May, Cardinal Wiseman assisted pontifically and preached at the high Mass; Father Newman delivered a sermon on the "Prospects of the Catholic Mission" now published in his "Discourses to Mixed Congregations." The Catholic Directory of 1849 shows that the Oratory at King William St. was the first public church served by a religious community to be opened in the diocese. The exercises of the Oratory, accompanied by the recitation of the Psalms and hymns composed by Father Faber and the Roman devotionals and processes, then strange to England, seemed to many a hazardous innovation. Time proved the popularity of the exercises, and Father Faber's preaching attracted large crowds. His spiritual works published year by year increased the interest in his Oratory, while the lives of the saints edited by him, forty-two in number, in spite of their literary defects, did great work in setting forth the highest examples of Christian holiness. ORATORY, FRENCH CONGREGATION OF, was founded at Paris at the beginning of the seventeenth century by Cardinal Pierre de Bérulle, who, in Bossuet's words, "made glisten in the Church of France the purest and most sublime lights of the Christian priesthood and the ecclesiastical life". It was precisely to work more effectively towards the rehabilitation of the ecclesiastical life that Cardinal de Bérulle founded (in 1611) the new congregation, which he named after that of St. Philip Neri, adopting also in part the rules and constitutions of the latter. To meet the special needs of the Church in France at the period, however, and because of the tendency toward centralization which "especially from this period forms one of the dominant characteristics of the French national spirit" (Perraud), he made one very important modification; whereas in the Italian congregation the houses were independent of one another, de Bérulle placed the government of all the houses in the hands of the superior-general. On 10 May, 1613, Paul III issued a Bull approving the new institute, which now made great progress. During the lifetime of its founder, more than fifty houses were either established or united to the Oratory; subsequently there were more than twice this number, divided into four provinces. As St. Philip had wished, so also the French Oratory was solely for priests; the members were bound by no vows except those of the priesthood, and had for sole aim the perfect promotion of their missions. The Congregation of the Oratory is not a teaching order; Oratorians have directed many colleges, notably de Juilly; but neither this nor instruction in seminaries was ever the object of the Congregation, though it was the first to organize seminaries in France according to the ordinances of the Council of Trent. The congregations of M. Bourdoise, St. Nicolas du Chardonnet, Saint-Cyran, and Saint-Eugène were all inspired by the ideas of Cardinal de Bérulle. The definite aim and characteristic of the French Oratory is in the words of Cardinal Perraud "the pursuit of sacerdotal perfection".

The supreme authority of the congregation is vested in the superior-general (elected for life) and in the general assemblies convoked regularly every three years—or extraordinarily immediately on the resignation or death of a general. These assemblies are composed of members who have been seven years in the congregation and three in the priesthood; the number of members is one out of every twelve Oratorians thus qualified, and they are elected by all Oratorian priests three years in the congregation. The general assemblies appoint all the officers—a superior general (if necessary), his three assistants, the visitors, the procurator general, and the secretary general. They also examine and decide upon all questions of any importance concerning the congregation in general; the general and his assistants, in the interval between the assemblies, exercise only ordinary administration. The founder, who died at the altar in 1629, was succeeded by Father Charles de Condren, who, like Father de Bérulle, was imbued with the spirit of the Oratorians from his youth. Even during his life, Saint Jeanne de Chantal wrote of him that "it would seem that Father de Condren was capable of teaching the angles"; St. Vincent de Paul was wont to say that "there had never been a man like him". Father de Condren governed the Oratory most wisely, completing its organization according to the intentions of its founder. Among his works must be specially remembered the part he played in the institution of Saint-Sulpice, whose founder, the celebrated Olier (q. v.), was under his direction. He died in 1641; his remains, recovered by the present writer in 1884, are now preserved in the choir of the chapel of the college of Juilly. The succeeding generals were: François Bourgoing (q. v., 1641–82); François Senault (1682–72), a celebrated preacher; Abel-Louis de Sainte-Marthe, who resigned in 1698, only to die the following year. During his generalship the congregation was greatly disturbed by the troubles of Jansenism (see A. M. P. Ingold, "Le pretendu jansénisme du P. de Ste-Marthe", Paris, 1882). There was the same disturbance under his successor, Father Pierre d'Arée de la Tour (1686–1733), who began by appealing against the Bull "Unigenitus", with the Archbishop of Paris and a large part of the French clergy. Later, however, having a better knowledge of the facts, he revoked his appeal, and also obtained the submission of Cardinal de Nointes—which shows that Jansenism was not a doctrinal one, but arose rather from considerations of discipline and opportuneness. Many Oratorians have been vilified on this point by prejudiced or ignorant historians, as the present writer has endeavoured to prove in several publications. Father d'Arée de la Tour was one of the most esteemed spiritual directors of his time. The seventh general was Father Thomas de Vallette (1723–72); the eighth, Father Louis de Muly (1772–9); the ninth, Father Sauvé Moisest (1779–90). On the death of this last, at the height of the French Revolution, the congregations was unable to elect a general assembly to elect a successor, and was soon engulfed in the revolutionary storm, which overwhelmed the Church in France; but, in dying, the Oratory again attested to its faithful attachment to the Chair of Peter. If some of the Oratorians at this time supported Constitutionalism, the great majority remained faithful to the Catholic Faith, and a certain number among them paid for their fidelity by their lives (cf. Ingold, "L'Oratoire et l'election", Paris, 1895). It was only in 1852 that the French Congregation of the Oratory was restored by Father Gratry (q. v.) and Father Pététot, the latter, who was earlier pastor of Saint-Roch de Paris, became the first superior-general of the revived institute. In 1884 he resigned and was replaced by Father (later Cardinal) Perraud. Father Pététot died in 1887. Father Perraud's successor, Father Marius Nouvelle, still governs the congregation, which, greatly weakened by the persecution which reigns in France, numbers only a few members, residing for the most part in Paris. The French Oratory at various stages in its history has given a large number of distinguished subjects to the Church; preachers like Lejeune (q. v.), Massillon (q. v.), and Mazarin; philanthropists like Malebranche, (q. v.); theologians like Thomassin (q. v.), Morin (q. v.); eremites like Houbigant (q. v.), Richard Simon, Duguet. One must note, however, that the last two were forced to leave the congregation where they had been trained—the former on account of the rashness of his excesses, the latter in consequence of his Jansenistic tendencies.

Naturally, the Oratory of France exercised little direct influence in foreign countries, except through its houses, St. Louis-des-François in Rome, Madrid, and Lisbon. In connection with England, Father de Bérulle's mission with twelve of his confresseurs at the court of Henrietta of France (1625), wife of the unfortunate Charles I, must be remembered. Among the Oratorians were Father Harlay de Sancy, Father de Balfour, the latter of an old English family, and Father Robert Philips, a Scotchman and theologian of great merit, who entered the Oratory in 1617 after having been tortured for the Faith in his own country. When Protestant intolerance forced the other Oratorians to leave England, Father Philips remained as confessor to the queen, and in 1644 returned with her to France, where he died in 1647. Other English ecclesiastics joined the Oratory. Among the best known are: Father William Chalmers of Aberdeen (d. about 1660), who entered the Oratory in 1627, author Orbellis (the conventional name in art history of Andrea di Cione, also called Orcagna or Arcangelo di Arcan-geo); b. at Florence, early in the fourteenth century; d. there, 1368. The son of a goldsmith, he became architect, sculptor, mosaicist, painter, and poet. His brothers, Nardo, Jacopo, and Matteo, were also architects, sculptors, and painters: Nardo, the eldest, painted the famous fresco of "The Last Judgment", still to be seen in the Stronchi chapel in S. Maria Novella, a composition inspired by the "Divina Commedia", and comprising the Judgment, Paradise, and Hell as its three parts. This fresco has been erroneously attributed to Andrea, who became the most famous of the Cioni, but Lorenzo Ghiberti testifies to its being the work of Nardo. In the same way, the "Triumph of Death" and "The Last Judgment" in the Campo Santo of Pisa, owing to their similarity to the S. Maria Novella fresco, used to be attributed to Nardo and Andrea di Cione. Both these brothers were registered in the Florentine Guild of Painters in 1357. In that year Andrea (Orcagna) collaborated with Francesco di Talento on plans for the enlargement of S. Maria del Fiore. In 1358 he executed mosaics for the façade of the cathedral of Orvieto. Vasari makes Andrea Pisano his master in the art of sculpture, but this honour is more probably due to Neri di Fioravante, his sponsor when he matriculated in the Guild of "masters of stone and wood" in 1352.

According to Vasari, the Brotherhood of Orammichele took the offerings made to the Blessed Virgin during the plague of 1348 and used them to build around her image an elaborately ornamented marble tabernacle. Orcagna was entrusted with this work, which was completed in 1356. For brilliance and richness of architecture as well as of decoration, Burchardt regards this tabernacle as the most perfect work of its kind in Italian Gothic. The mysteries of the life of the Blessed Virgin are represented in bas-relief with a series of allegorical images. The Annunciation of Mary's Death and the Assumption are especially worthy of note. This tabernacle of Orcamichele is Orcagna's only authentic sculptural work, but his name is inscribed in the "Annunciation" of Santa Croce and in the bas-reliefs of the Campanile of S. Maria del Fiore which represent the Virtues and Liberal Arts.

The chief paintings of Orcagna which have survived are: a St. Matthew, painted, in collaboration with his brother Jacopo, for S. Maria Novella, now in the Uffizi; a "Virgin with Angels", in the Somèze collection at Brussels; a "Virgin of St. Bernard" in the Academy of Florence; a "Coronation of the Virgin", executed for San Pier Maggiore, Florence, now in the National Gallery, London. In 1357 Tommaso di Rosello Strozzi commissioned Orcagna to paint an altarpiece for the same chapel in Nardo and in 1358 he painted the frescoes. This re-table is divided into five parts: in the centre Christ is enshrined, a pyramidal crown on his brow, two little angels at his feet, playing music; at Christ's right hand is the Blessed Virgin, presenting St. Thomas Aquinus to Him; at His left hand is the Precursor who indicates Christ to a kneeling St. Peter. In the last two compartments are seen, on one side St. Lawrence and St. Paul, on the other St. Michael and St. Catherine. Orcagna was commissioned in the following year to paint the life of the Blessed Virgin on the walls of the choir of S. Maria Novella. These paintings were ruined by damp, owing to a leaking roof, but were restored by Ghirlandajo who drew his inspiration from the happy "inventions of Orcagna" (Vasari).

Orcestius, titutar see in Galatia Secunda. It is only mentioned in Peutinger's "Table". An inscription of 331 fixm the site at Alikel Yaila, also called Alekian, in the vilayet of Angora. It was then a station at the intersection of four roads and formed part of the "Diocese of Asia"; consequently it must have belonged to Phrygia. In 451 it was in Galatia Secunda or Salutaris, probably from the formation of that province about 388-85. The name comes from a tribe called Orci, which dwelt in the plains on the eastern frontier of Phrygia. Only three bishops are known: Domnus, at Ephesus (451); Longinus, at Chalcedon (451); and Segermas, at Constantinople (682). But the see is mentioned by the "Notitiae episcopatarum" until the thirteenth century among the suffragans of Pessinus.

Ordeals (Judicia Dei; Anglo-Saxon, ordled; Ger. Urtied) were a means of obtaining evidence by trials, through which, by the direct interposition of God, the guilt or innocence of an accused person was firmly established, in the event that the truth could not be proved by ordinary means. These trials owed their existence to the firm belief that an omniscient and just God would not permit an innocent person to be regarded as guilty and punished in consequence, but that He would intervene, by a miracle if necessary, to cause the ordeals to be either confirmed by the preceding judge, or chosen by the contesting parties themselves. It was expected that God, approving the act imposed or permitted by an authorised judge, would give a distinct manifestation of the truth to reveal the guilt or innocence of the accused. The announcement of Mary's Death and the Assumption are especially worthy of note. This tabernacle of Orammichele is Orcagna's only authentic sculptural work, but his name is inscribed in the "Annunciation" of Santa Croce and in the bas-reliefs of the Campanile of S. Maria del Fiore which represent the Virtues and Liberal Arts.

Gaston Sertes.
upon the practice of ordeals. By prayer and religious ceremonies, by the hearing of holy Mass and the reception of holy communion before the ordeal, the missionaries sought to give to it a distinctly religious character. The liturgical prayers and ceremonies are to be found in Franz, "Die kirchlichen Benediktio nen im Mittelalter" (Freiburg im Br., 1909), II, 364 sq.;
the celebration of Mass on the occasion of the ordeal,
in Franz, "Die Messe in deutschen Mittelalter" (Freiburg im Br., 1902), 213 sq. This attitude of the clergy in regard to ordeals may be explained if one takes into consideration the religious ideas of the times, as well as the close connection which existed between ordeals and the Germanic judicial system.

The principal means of testing the accuser as well as the accused in the Germanic judicial practice was the Oath of the Co-jurors. It being often difficult to find jurors who were properly qualified, perjury frequently resulted, and the oath could be rejected by the opposing party. In such cases, the ordeal was brought forward as a substitute in determining the truth, the guilt, or the innocence. This mode of pro-ceedure was tolerated by the Church in Germanic countries in the early Middle Ages. A thoroughgoing opposition to ordeals would have had little prospect of success. The only bishop to take measures against the practice of ordeals during the conversion to Christianity of the Germanic races was St. Avitus of Vienne
(d. about 518). Later, Agobard of Lyons (d. 840) attacked the judicial duel and other ordeals in two works, "De adversis et contra iudicium Dei", and
"De adversis et contra iudicium quod in Migne, P. L., CXLV, 125 sq., 254 sqq."). On the other hand, shortly afterwards, Archbishop Hincmar of Reims, at the time of the maternal disagreement of the kings of France and Theutberga, declared himself to be of the opinion that ordeals were permissible, in support of which he must assuredly have brought forward noteworthy arguments. "De adversis et contra iudicium quod in Migne, P. L., CXLV, 650-68; cf. also Hincmar's
"Episola ad Hildegarium episcopum", ibid., 161 sqq.).
The universal opinion among the peoples of the Frank-ian kingdom was that the authority of ordeals, and the same may be said of Britain. In 809 in the Capitulary of Aachen, Charlemagne declared: "that all should believe in the ordeal without the shadow of a doubt" (Mon. Germ. Hist., Capitularia, I, 150). In the Byzantine Empire also, the ordeal under the later Middle Ages the practice of ordeals, introduced from the countries of the West.

The ordeals, strictly speaking, of the Germanic countries, are the following:

1. The duel, called judicium Dei in the Book of Laws of the Burgundian King Gundobad (c. 500).
(Mon. Germ. Hist., Leges, III, 537.) The outcome of the judicial duel was looked upon as the judgment of God. Only freemen were qualified to take part,
and women and ecclesiastics were permitted to appoint substitutes. The duel originated in the pagan times of the Germanic peoples. In certain individual nations were to be found various usages and regulations regarding the manner in which the duel was to be conducted. The Church combated the judicial duel; Nicholas I declared it to be an infringement of the law of God, and of the laws of Gaul ("Carolum Calvum", in Migne, P. L., CXIX, 1144), and several later popes spoke against it.
Ecclesiastics were forbidden to take part in a duel either personally, or through a substitute. Only English books of ritual of the later Middle Ages contain a formula for the blessing of the shield and the sword for use in the judicial duel; otherwise, no medieval Ritual contains prayers for these ordeals, a proof that they were not looked upon favourably by the Church.

2. The cross, in which both parties, the accuser and the accused, stood before a cross with arms outstretched in the form of a cross. Whoever first let fall his arms was defeated. The earliest information we possess regarding this form of ordeal dates from the eighth century. It was destined to replace the duel, and was proscribed by various capitularies of the ninth and tenth centuries, especially towards the end of the disputes with ecclesiastics.

3. The hot iron, employed in various ways, not only in courts of law, where the accused in ancient times to prove his innocence must pass through fire or place his hand in the flames, but also to prove the authenticity of relics, and to reveal the truth in other ways.
The judicial test by fire, as an ordeal, was ordinarily conducted in the following manner: the accused must walk a certain distance (nine feet, among the Anglo-Saxons) bearing a bar of red-hot iron in his hands, or he must pass barefooted over red-hot ploughshares (usually nine). If he remained uninjured, his innocence was considered established. Medieval ecclesisastical Rituals of various dioceses contain prayers and ceremonies for use before the undergoing of the test.
The accused was also obliged to prepare himself beforehand by confession and fasting.

4. Hot water, or the curbstone. The accused must draw a stone with his naked arm from the bottom of a vessel filled with hot water, after which the arm was bound up and the bandage sealed; three days later it was removed, and, according to the condition of his arm, the accused was considered innocent or guilty.
The religious ceremonies for this ordeal were similar to those used for the ordeal of the hot iron.

5. Cold water, in use at an early date among the Germanic races, and which was practically notwithstanding the prohibition of the Emperor Louis the Pious in 829. The accused, with hands and feet bound, was cast into the water; if he sank, he was considered guilty; if he swam, or if he floated upon the water, his innocence was believed to be established.
For this test also, the accused prepared himself by fasting, confession, and communion, and by assisting at Mass.

6. The blessed morsel (judicium offera, Anglo-Saxon cornmnæd, redbread), which consisted in the consuming
by the accused of a piece of bread and a piece of cheese in the church before the altar; the piece of bread was blessed with special prayers. If he was able to swallow them, his innocence was established, but if not, he was considered guilty. This test was in use princi-ally among the Anglo-Saxons. It is not mentioned in the ancient Germanic laws of the Continent.

7. The suspended loaf.—A loaf of bread was baked by a deacon from meal and blessed water, through which a stick of wood was passed. The suspected person then appeared with two witnesses, before whom the bread was suspended, which, if it turned in circle, was supposed to be a proof of guilt.

8. The Psalter, which consisted in clamping into the Book of Psalms a stick of wood with a knob attached, and then placing the whole in an opening made in another piece of wood, so that the book could turn.
The guilt of the accused was established if the Psalter turned from west to east, and his innocence, if it turned in a contrary direction.

9. The Examen in mensuris.—Though forms of prayer in connexion with its use have been handed down to us, they do not give us a clear idea of how this test was conducted. It would seem to have been practised but seldom. It appears to have been an ordeal decided by lot, or by the measuring of the accused by a stick of a determined length.

10. Bleeding, to discover a murderer. The person suspected of the murder was forced to look upon the body or the wounds of the victim. If the wounds then began to bleed afresh, the guilt was supposed to have been proved.

In addition to these forms of genuine ordeals, two other kinds are frequently considered, which, however, do not exactly correspond to the idea of a judgment of God, as in their case there is no question of a direct establishment of a fact by the interposition of God. The first of these is the oath, which is but a means of establishing the truth, accompanied by a solemn oath, but which is not in any sense a judgment of God. Another example is furnished by the belief that the perjured would, sooner or later, be overtaken by death, which was God's punishment for perjury, but this was not a judicial ordeal. The same is true of the Exorcism of the VIth The firm belief existed that if anyone to prove his innocence should receive Holy Communion, he would, if guilty, be punished by God with instant death. Here also it is question of Divine chastisement; the judgment however not taking place by means of a judicial process. When at the Synod of Worms in 868 it was ordered that the bishops and priests should clear themselves of suspicion by the celebration of Mass, and the monks by the reception of Holy Communion, this was in reality of the same significance as the oath of purgation, by which those under shadow of suspicion swore to their innocence.

The ecclesiastical authorities of the Frankish and Anglo-Saxon kingdoms, as we have remarked above, were very broad-minded in their acceptance of the greater number of species of ordeals; several councils publishing regulations touching them (e.g. Hefele, "Konzilengeschichte," 2 ed., III, 611, 614, 623, 690, 732; IV, 555; Synod of Tribur (805), IV, 672; Synod of Seligenstadt (1022)). Ordeals were practised in Britain, France, and Germany in connexion with legal processes before civil as well as ecclesiastical tribunals up to and during the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. From then on they were gradually discontinued.

The tribunals of Rome never made use of ordeals. The popes were always opposed to them, and began, at an early date, to take measures for their suppression. It is true that in the beginning no general decree was published regarding them; however, in individual cases concerning ordeals brought to Rome, the popes always pronounced against the practice, and designated it as unlawful. This course was followed by Nicholas I when, in 867, he prohibited the duel by which King Lothair sought to decide his matrimonial dispute with Theuterberga. The latter had previously, through one of her servants, submitted to the test of hot water to prove her innocence, and indeed with favourable results. Upon the inquiry of the Archbishop of Mainz as to whether or not the tests of the hot water and the glowing iron could lawfully be made use of in the case of persons who were accused of having smothered their sleeping child, Stephen V (885—891) forbade these ordeals (Decr. C. 20, C. II, qu. 5). Alexander II (1061-73) likewise condemned these tests, and Alexander III (1158-81) prohibited the bishop and the clergy of the Diocese of Upsala from countenancing a duel or other ordeal imposed by law, such as this practice was disapproved of by the Catholic Church. Before long definite condemnations were published by the popes, as for example, that of Celestine III (1191-98) regarding the duel. At the Council of the Lateran in 1215, Innocent III promulged a general decree against ordeals, which prohibited anyone from receiving the blessing of the Church before submitting to the test of the hot water or to that of the glowing iron, and confirming the validity of the previous prohibition against the duel (Can. xviii; in Hefele, I, c. V, 687).

Various accounts in regard to the co-operation of the popes in the practice of ordeals in Frankish times which are contained in apocryphal writings have no historic value. From the twelfth century, a thorough and approved opposition to ordeals, as a result of the stand taken by the popes, began to manifest itself generally, and whereas, at an earlier date, no one was found to support Agobard of Lyons in his opposition to these tests, which was without result, the writings of Peter Cantor (d. 1197) against the proceedings of the civil courts with regard to ordeals (in his "Verbum abbreviatum"), Migne, P. L., CCV, 226 sqq.) had a far greater success. In 1220 the Emperor of Strasburg sets forth his disapproval of ordeals. As a result of the General Council of 1215, several synods of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries published prohibitions in this connexion. A synod held at Villalobos in 1215 (see no. 222) enjoins on the bishops in Castile and Aragon:

"The tests of fire and water are forbidden; whoever participates in them is ipso facto excommunicated" (Hefele, "Konzilengeschichte," VI, 616). The Emperor Frederick II also prohibited the duel and other ordeals in the Constitution of Meli, 1231 (Michael, "Geschichte des deutschen Volkes," I, 318). Nevertheless, there are to be found in Germanic code books as late as the thirteenth century, regulations for their use. However, a clearer recognition of the false ground for belief in ordeals, a more highly-developed judicial system, the fact that the innocent must be victims of the ordeal, the prohibitions of the popes and the synods, the refusal of the ecclesiastical authorities to cooperate in the carrying out of the sentence—all these causes worked together to bring about, during the course of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, the gradual discontinuance of the practice. The hot test of the cold water was resuscitated in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries in the hunting of so-called witches, consequent upon the trials for witchcraft.

Ordinarius Vitalis, historian, b. 1075; d. about 1143. He was the son of an English mother and a French priest who came over to England with the Normans and received a church at Shrewsbury. At the age of ten he was sent over by his father to St. Evroult in southern Normandy and remained for the rest of his life a monk of that abbey. He must have travelled occasionally: we have evidence of his presence at Cambrai, for instance, and in 1101 at Châlons, and he may have gone three or four times to England: still he passed most of his days at home. He considered himself, however, an Englishman, "Vitalis Anglica", and was always full of interest in English affairs. His history was intended at first to be a chronicle of his abbey but it developed into a general "Historia Ecclesiastica" in 13 books. Books I and II are an abridged chronicle from the Christian era to 1143; books III-V describe the Norman Conquests of South Italy and England; book VI gives the history of his abbey. Books VII—XIII consist of his universal history from 751 to 1141, book IX being devoted to the first Crusade. The work begins to have real historical importance from about the date of the Norman Conquest, but Ordinaricus is discriminating throughout in his choice of authorities. Chronologically it is ill-arranged and very inaccurate; it is often pedantic in form. The author has, however, a wide interest and a keen sense of detail and picturesque incident. He was a very well-read man, but he united to his learning a taste seldom so frankly admitted for popular stories and songs. He was a man of observation and he attempted to create the outward appearance of the characters he described. He was fair-minded, anxious to give two sides of a question and to moderate in his judgments. In spite, therefore, of the clumsy arrangements and chronological...

errors the "Historia Ecclesiastica" gives a very vivid picture of the times and is of great historical value. A competent authority has declared it the best French history of the twelfth century. Ordeggia was also something of a poet and there are manuscripts of his collected Latin poems. The best text of the "Historia Ecclesiastica" is that edited by Le Prévost for the "Société de l'histoire de France" (5 vols., 1838-39). The fifth volume contains a valuable infralinear text by L. Delisle. There is also a text in Migne, vol. CLXXXVIII. A French translation was published in Guisot's "Collection des mémoires" and an English translation in Bohn's "Antiquarian Library" (4 vols., 1853-5).

ORDERS, ANGLICAN. See ANGLICAN ORDERS.

ORDERS, HOLY.—Order is the appropriate disposition of things equal and unequal, by giving each its proper place (St. Aug., "De civ. Dei," XIX, xiii). Order primarily means a relation. It is used to designate that on which the relation is founded and thus generally most rank (St. Thom., "Super.," 1, a. 2, q. 4, a. 1, q. 4, a. 2, q. 4). In this sense it was applied to clergy and laity (St. Jer., "De Isaacii," XIX, 18; St. Greg. the Great, "Moral.," XXXII, xx). The meaning was restricted later to the hierarchy as a whole or to the various ranks of the clergy. Tertullian and some early writers had already used the word in that sense, but generally with a qualifying adjective (Tert., "De exhort. cast.," vii, ordo sacerdotalis; ordo ecclesiasticus; St. Greg. of Tours, "Vit. patr.," X, i, ordo clericorum). Order is used to signify not only the particular rank or general status of the clergy, but also the outward action by which it is distinguished; and thus stands for ordination. It also indicates what differentiates laity from clergy or the various ranks of the clergy, and thus means spiritual power. The Sacrament of Order is the sacrament by which grace and spiritual power for the discharge of ecclesiastical offices are conferred.

Christ founded His Church as a supernatural society, the Kingdom of God. In this society there must be the power of ruling; and also the principles by which the members are to attain the supernatural end, viz., supernatural truth, which is held by faith, and supernatural grace by which man is morally elevated to the supernatural order. Thus, besides the power of juridically binding the Church has the power of teaching (magisterium) and the power of conferring grace (power of order). This power of order was committed by our Lord to His Apostles, who were to continue His work and to be His earthly representatives. The Apostles received their power from Christ: "as the Father hath sent me, I also send you" (John, xx, 21). Christ possessed fullness of power in virtue of His priesthood—of His office as Redeemer and Mediator. He merited the grace which freed man from the bondage of sin, which grace is applied to man mediately by the Sacrifice of the Eucharist and immediately by the sacraments. He gave His Apostles the power to offer the Sacrifice (Luke, xxii, 19), and dispense the sacraments (Matt., xxviii, 18; John, xx, 22, 23); thus making them priests. It is true that every Christian receives sanctifying grace which confers on him a priesthood. Even as Jesus under the Old dispensation was to God "a priestly kingdom" (Exod. xix, 4-6), thus under the New, all Christians are "a kingly priesthood" (I Pet., ii, 9); but now as then the special and sacramental priesthood is perfected and perfected the universal priesthood (cf. II Cor., iii, 6; Rom., xv, 16).

SACRAMENT OF ORDER.—From Scripture we learn that the Apostles appointed others by an external rite (imposition of hands), conferring inward grace. The fact that grace is ascribed immediately to the external rite, shows that Christ must have thus ordained. The fact that χειροτονεῖν, χειροτονία, which meant electing by show of hands, had acquired the technical meaning of ordination by 60 a.d. The context of the middle of the third century, shows that appointment to the various orders was made by that external rite. We read of the deacons, how the Apostles praying, imposed hands upon them (Acts, vi, 6). In I Tim., 1, 6 St. Paul in the name of Timothy made a bishop by the imposition of St. Paul's hands (cf. I Tim., iv, 4), and Timothy is exhorted to appoint presbyters by the same rite (I Tim., v, 22; cf. Acts, xiii, 3; xiv, 22). In Clem. "Homily of Origen," we read of the appointment of Zachaeus as bishop by the imposition of Peter's hands. The words are used in its technical meaning by Clement of Alexandria ("Strom.", VI, xiiii, evii; cf. "Const. Apost. II, viii, 36"). A priest lays on hands, but does not ordain (χορηγεῖν of χειροτονία) "Didasc. Syn." IV; III, 10, 11, 20; Cornelius, "Ad Fabianum" in Euseb., "Hist. Eccl.," VI, xiiii.

Grace was attached to this external sign and conferred by it. "I admonish thee, that thou stir up the grace of God which is in thee, through (υπατί) the imposition of my hands" (II Tim., i, 6). The context clearly shows that there is a connection between the act which enables Timothy to rightly discharge the office imposed upon him, for St. Paul continues "God hath not given us the spirit of fear, but of power, and of love, and of a sound mind." This grace is something permanent, as appears from the words "that thou stir up the grace which is in thee"; we reach the same conclusion from I Tim., iv, 14, where St. Paul says, "Neglect not the grace that is in thee, which was given thee by prophecy, with (υπατί) imposition of hands of the priesthood." This text shows that when St. Paul ordained Timothy, the presbyters also laid their hands upon him, even as now by ordination lay their hands on the candidate. St. Paul here exhorts Timothy to teach and command, to be an example to all. To neglect this would be to neglect the grace which is in him. This grace therefore enables him to teach and command, to discharge his office rightly. The grace then is not a charismatic gift, but a gift of the Holy Spirit for the rightful discharge of official duties. The Sacrament of Order has ever been recognized in the Church as such. This is attested by the belief in a special priesthood (cf. St. John Chrys., "De sacerdotio;" St. Greg. of Nyssa, "Oratio in baptism. Christi"), which requires a special ordination. St. Augustine (serm. xxiv, i, serm. xxi) and order, says, "Each is a sacrament, and each is given by a certain consecration,... If both are sacraments, which no one doubts, how is the one not lost (by delegation from the Church) and the other lost?" (Contra. Epist. Parmen., ii, 28-30). The Council of Trent says, "Whereas, by the testimony of Scripture, by Apostolic tradition, and by unanimous consent of the Fathers, it is clear that grace is conferred by consecration, and that a sacred ordination, which is performed by words and outward signs, no one ought to doubt that Order is truly and properly one of the Seven Sacraments of Holy Church" (Sess. XXIII, c. iii, can. 3).

NUMBER OF ORDERS.—The Council of Trent (Sess. XXIII, can. 2) defined that, besides the priesthood, there are in the Church other orders, both major and minor (q. v.). Though nothing has been defined with regard to the number of orders, the Church has insisted on seven: priests, deacons, subdeacons, acolytes, exorcists, readers, and doorkeepers. The priesthood is thus counted as including bishops; if the latter be numbered separately we have eight; and if we add first tonsure, which was at one time regarded as an order, we have nine. We meet with different numberings in different Churches, and it would seem that mystical reasons influenced them to some extent (Martene, "De antiqu. ecle. rit." I, viii, i, 1; Dominger, "Rit. orient."").
ORDERS
II, 155). The "Statuta ecclesie antiqua" enumerate nine orders, adding psalmists and counting bishops and priests separately. Others enumerate eight orders, thus: The bishop, the author of "De divin. offic.," 33, and St. Dunstan's and the Jumièges pontificals (Martène I, viii, 11), the latter not counting bishops, and adding cantor. Innocent III, "De sacro alt. minister.," 7, 16, counts six orders, as do also the Irish canons, where all orders were unknown. In the Roman rite, the cantor, several other functionaries seem to have been recognized as holding orders, e.g., fessarius (fossore) grave-diggers, hernoeneule (interpreters), custodes mortuorum (undertakers). Some consider them to have a first rank (Morrin, "Comm. desascrie eccle. ord.," III, Ex. 11, 7); but it is more probable that they were merely offices, generally committed to clerics (Benedict XIV, "De syn. dioce," VIII, ix, 7, 8). In the East there is considerable variety of tradition regarding the number of orders. The Greek Church acknowledges five, bishops, priests, deacons, subdeacons, and readers. The same number is found in St. John Damascus (Dialog contra manichacos, iii); in the ancient Greek Church acolytes, exorcists, and doorkeepers were probably considered only as offices. (cf. Demzinger, "Rit. orient.," 1, 116.)

In the Latin Church a distinction is made between major and minor orders (q. v.). In the East the subdiaconate is regarded as a minor order, and it includes three of the other minor orders (porter, exorcist, acolyte). In the Latin Church the subdiaconate, subdeaconate, and diaconate (q. v.) are the major, or sacred, orders, so-called because they have immediate reference to what is consecrated (St. Thom., "Suppl.", Q. xxxvii, a. 3). The hierarchy of the Eastern Church is sometimes called are of divine origin (Cone. Trid., XXIII, can. 6). We have seen that our Lord instituted a ministry in the persons of His Apostles, who received from Him the power and authority. One of the first exercises of this Apostolic power was the appointment of others to help and succeed them. The Apostles did not confine their labors to any particular Church, but, following the Divine command to make disciples of all men, they were the missionaries of the first generation. Others also are mentioned in Holy Scripture as exercising an itinerant ministry, such as those who are in a wider sense called Apostles (Rom., xvi, 7), or prophets, teachers, and evangelists (Eph., iv, 11).

Side by side with this itinerant ministry provision is made for the ordinary ministrations by the appointment of local ministers, to whom the duties of the ministry passed entirely when the itinerant ministers disappeared (see DEACON). Besides deacons others were appointed to the ministry, who are called proestes, and tritones. There is no record of this institution, but the names occur casually. Though some have explained the appointment of the seventy-two disciples in Luke x, as the institution of the presbyterate, it is generally agreed that they had only a temporary appointment. We find presbyters in the Mother Church at Jerusalem, receiving the gifts of the brethren of Antioch. They appear in close connexion with the Apostles, and the Apostles and presbyters sent forth the decree which freed the Gentile converts from the burden of the Mosaic law (Acts, xv, 23). In St. James (vv. 14, 15) they appear as performing ritual actions, and from St. Peter we learn that they are shepherds of the flock (I Pet. v, 2). The bishops have authority from Christ (Phil., i; I Tim., iii, 2; Tit., i, 7) and have been appointed shepherds by the Holy Ghost (Acts, xx, 28). That the ministry of both was local appears from Acts, xiv, 26, where we read that Paul and Barnabas appointed presbyters in the various Churches which they founded during their first missionary journey. It is shown also by the fact that they had to shepherd the flock, where in they have been appointed, the presbyters have to shepherd the flock, that is amongst them (I Pet., v, 2). Titus is left in Crete that he might appoint presbyters in every city (see Tit., i, 5; cf. Chrys., "Ad Tit., homili."").

We cannot argue from the difference of names to the difference of official position, because the names are to some extent interchangeable (Acts, xx, 17, 28; Tit., i, 6, 7). The New Testament does not clearly show the distinction between presbyters and bishops, and we must examine the evidence. In the primitive times. Towards the end of the second century there is a universal and unquestioned tradition, that bishops and their superior authority date from Apostolic times (Hilarus, etc. of the Early Church). It throws much light on the New-Testament evidence and we find that what appears distinctly at the time of Ignatius can be traced through the pastoral epistles of St. Paul, to the very beginning of the history of the Mother Church at Jerusalem, where St. James, the brother of the Lord, appears to occupy the position of bishop (Acts, xi, 17; xv, 13; xii, 18; Gal., ii, 9); Timothy and Titus possess full episcopal authority, and were ever thus recognized in tradition (cf. Tit., i, 6; 1 Tim., v, 19 and 22). No doubt there is much obscurity in the New Testament, but this is accounted for by many reasons. The monuments of tradition never give us the life of the Church in all its fullness, and we must expect this fullness, with regard to the internal organization of the Church existing in Apostolic times, from the cursory references in the occasional writings of the New Testament. The position of bishops necessarily be much less prominent than in later times. The supreme authority of the Apostles, the great number of charismatically gifted persons, the fact that various Churches were ruled by Apostolic delegates who exercised episcopal authority under Apostolic direction, would prevent that special prominence. The union between bishops and presbyters was close. and the exchange long after the distinction between presbyters and bishops was commonly recognized, e. g. in Iren., "Adv. haeres."", IV, xxvi, 2. Hence it would seem that already, in the New Testament, we find, obscurely no doubt, the same ministry which appeared so distinctly afterwards.

Which of the Orders are Sacramental?—All agree that there is but one Sacrament of Order, i. e., the totality of the powers acquired by the sacrament is contained in the supreme order, whilst the others contain only part thereof (St. Thomas, "Suppl.", Q. xxxvii, a. 1, ad 2o). The sacramental character of the priesthood has never been denied by any one, and we have not omitted the Sacrament of Order, and, though not explicitly defined, it follows immediately from the statements of the Council of Trent. Thus (Sess. XXIII, can. 2), "If any one saith that besides the priesthood there are not in the Catholic Church other orders, both major and minor, by which as by certain steps, advance is made to the priesthood, let him be anathema." In the fourth chapter of the same session, after declaring that the Sacrament of Order impresses a character "which can neither be effaced nor taken away; the holy synod with reason condemns the opinion of those who assert that priests and the New Testament have only a temporary power". The priesthood is therefore a sacrament.

With regard to the episcopate the Council of Trent defines that bishops belong to the divinely instituted hierarchy, that they are superior to priests, and that they have the power of confirming and ordaining which is proper to them (Sess. XXIII, c. iv, can. 6, 7). The superiority of bishops is abundantly attested in Tradition, and we have seen above that the distinction between priests and bishops is of Apostolic origin. Most of the older scholastics were of opinion that the episcopate is not a sacrament; this opinion finds able defenders even now (e. g., Billet, "De sacramentis"), II, though the majority of theologians hold it is certain that a bishop's ordination is a sacrament. With regard to the sacramental character of the other orders see DEACONS; MINOR ORDERS; SUBDEACONS.

Matter and Form.—In the question of the matter and form of this sacrament we must distinguish between the three higher Orders of the deacon, priest, and bishop. The Church having instituted the latter, also determines their matter and form. With regard to the former, the received opinion maintains that the imposition of hands is the sole matter. This has been undoubtedy used from the beginning; to it, exclusively and directly, the conferring of grace is ascribed by St. Paul and many Fathers and councils. The Latin Church used it exclusively for nine or ten centuries, and the Greek Church to this day knows no other matter. Many scholastic theologians have held that the tradition of the instruments was the sole matter even for the strictly hierarchical orders, but this position has long been universally abandoned. Other scholastics held that both imposition of hands and the tradition of the instruments constitute the matter of the sacrament; this opinion still finds defenders. Appeal is made to the Decree of Eugene IV to the Armenians, but the pope spoke "of the integrating and accessory matter and form, which he wished Armenians to add to the imposition of hands, long since in use, in order to make them conform to the usage of the Latin Church, and more firmly adhere to it, by uniformity of rites" (Bened., XIV, "De syn. dioec. ", VIII, x, 8). The real foundation of the latter opinion is the power of the Church with regard to the sacrament. Christ, it is argued, instituted the Sacrament of Order by instituting that in the Church there should be an external rite, which would of its own nature signify and confer the priestly power and corresponding grace. As Christ did not ordain His Apostles by imposition of hands, it would seem that He left to the Church the power of determining by which particular rite the ordination should take place. The Church's determination of the particular rite would be the fulfilling of a condition required in order that the Divine institution should take effect. The Church determined the simple imposition of hands for the East and added, in the course of time, the tradition of the instruments for the West—changing its symbolic language according as circumstances of place or time required.

The distinction of the form of the sacrament naturally depends on that of the matter. If the tradition of the instruments be taken as the total or partial matter, the words which accompany it will be taken as the form. In the simple imposition of hands it be considered the sole matter, the words which belong to it are the form. The form which accompanies the imposition of hands contains the words "Sanctificare spiritum sacerdotii," which in the ordination of priests, however, are found with the second imposition of hands, towards the end of the Mass, but these words are not found in the old rituals nor in the Greek Euchology. Thus the form is not contained in these words, but in the older prayers accompanying the former imposition of hands, substantially the same from the beginning.

All that we have said about the matter and form is speculative; in practice, whatever has been proposed by the Church must be followed, and the Church in this, as in other sacraments, insists that anything omitted should be supplied.

Effect of the Sacrament.—The first effect of the sacrament is an increase of sanctifying grace. With this there is the sacramental grace which makes the recipient a fit and holy minister in the discharge of his office. As the duties of God's ministers are manifold and onerous, it is in the Providence of God's Providence to confer a special grace on His ministers. The dispensation of sacraments requires grace, and the rightful discharge of sacred offices presupposes a special degree of spiritual excellence. The external sacramental sign or the power of the order can be received and may exist without this grace. Grace is required for the worthy, not the valid, exercise of the power, which is immediately and inseparably connected with the priestly character. The principal effect of the sacrament is the character (or, subdeaconate) a spiritual and indelible mark impressed upon the soul, by which the recipient is distinguished from others, designated as a minister of Christ, and deputed and empowered to perform certain functions of divinemonastic office. (Summa, III, Q. ixii, a. 2). The sacramental character of order distinguishes the ordained from the laity. It gives the recipient in the diaconate, e.g., the power to minister officially, in the priest's order the power to offer the Sacrifice and dispense the sacraments, in the episcopate the power to ordain new priests and to confirm the faithful. The Council of Trent defined the existence of a character (Sess. VII, can. 9). Its existence is shown especially by the fact that ordination like baptism, if ever valid, can never be repeated. Though there have been controversies with regard to the conditions of the validity of ordination, and different views were held at different times in reference to them, "it has always been admitted that a valid ordination cannot be repeated. Reordinations do not suppose the negation of the inamissible character of Order—they presume an anterior ordination which was null. There can be no doubt that mistakes were made regarding the nullity of the first ordination, but this error of fact leaves the doctrine of the interdiction of ordination untouched" (Sallet, "Les Réformations", 392).

Minister.—The ordinary minister of the sacrament is the bishop, who alone has this power in virtue of his ordination. Holy Scripture attributed the power to the Apostles and their successors (Acts, vi, 6; xvi, 22; I Tim., v, 22; II Tim., i, 6; Tit., i, 5), and the Fathers and councils ascribe the power to the bishop exclusively. Comm. Nic. I, c. 4, Apost. Const. VIII, 126. "A bishop lays on hands, ordains . . . a presbyter lays on hands, but does not ordain." A council held at Alexandria (340) declared the orders conferred by Calathus, a presbyter, null and void (Athanas., "Apol. contra Ariane", ii). For the custom said to have existed in the Church of Alexandria see Euseb. Nor can objection be raised from the fact that choroepiskopoi are known to have ordained priests, as there can be no doubt that some choroepiskopi were "presbyters' orders" (Gillman, "Das Institut der Chorhierarchie im Orient," Munich, 1903; Hefele-Leclercq, "Conciles", II, 1197-1237). No one but a bishop can give any orders now without a delegation from the pope, but a simple priest may be thus authorized to confer minor orders and the subdiaconate. It is generally denied that priests can confer priests' orders, and history, certainly, records no instance of the exercise of such extraordinary ministry. The diaconate cannot be conferred by a simple priest, according to the majority of theologians. This is sometimes questioned, as Innocent VIII is said to have granted the privilege to Cistercian abbots (1480), but the genuineness of the concession is very doubtful. For lawful ordination the bishop must be a Catholic, in communion with the Holy See, free from censures, and must observe the laws prescribed for ordination; he must be followed, and the Church in this, as in other sacraments, insists that anything omitted should be supplied.

Subject.—Every baptized male can validly receive ordination. Though in former times there were several semi-clerical ranks of women in the Church (see Deaconesses), they were not admitted to orders properly so called and had no spiritual power. The first requisite for lawful ordination is holy, Divine, vocation; by which is understood the action of God, whereby He selects some to be His special ministers, endowing them with the spiritual, mental, moral, and physical qualities required for the fitting discharge of their or-
ORDERS

ORDER and inspiring them with a sincere desire to enter the ecclesiastical state for God's honour and their own sanctification. The reality of this Divine call is manifested in general by sanctity of life, right faith, knowledge corresponding to the proper exercise of the order to which one is raised, and by the absence of physical defects, this being required by the canons (see IRREGULARITY). Sometimes this call was manifested in an extraordinary manner (Acts, i, 15; xiii, 2); in general, however, the "calling" was made according to the laws of the Church founded on the example of the Apostles. Though clergy and laity had a voice in the election of the candidates, the ultimate and definite determination rested with the bishops. The election of the candidates by clergy and laity was in the nature of a testimony of fitness, the bishop had to personally ascertain the candidates' qualifications. A public inquiry was held regarding their faith and moral character and the electors were consulted. Only such as were personally known to the electing congregation, i.e., members of the same Church, were chosen.

A specified age was required, and, though there was some diversity in different places, in general, for deacons the age was twenty-five or thirty, for priests thirty-five or forty, or even fifty (Apost. Const., ii, 1). Nor was physical age deemed sufficient, but there were prescribed specified periods of time, during which the ordained should remain in a particular degree. The different degrees were considered not merely as steps preparatory to the priesthood, but as real church offices. In the beginning no such periods, called interdicts, were appointed, though the tendency to orderly promotion is attested already in the pastoral Epistles (I Tim., iii, 3, 16). The first rules were apparently made in the fourth century. They seem to have been enforced; they did (385) and somewhat modified by Zoesium (418), who decreed that the office of reader or exorcist should last till the candidate was twenty, or for five years in case of those baptized; six years for those who were ordained as acolyte or subdeacon, five years as deacon. This was modified by Pope Gelasius (492), according to whom a layman who had been a monk might be ordained priest after one year, thus allowing three months to elapse between each ordination, and a layman who had not been a monk might be ordained priest after eighteen months. At present the minor ordinaries generally consecrate the candidate on one occasion.

The bishops, who are the ministers of the sacrament ex officio, must inquire about the birth, person, age, title, faith, and moral character of the candidate. They must examine whether he is born of Catholic parents, and is spiritually, intellectually, morally, and physically fit for the exercise of the ministry. The age required by the canons is for deacons twenty-one, for subdeacons twenty-two, and for priests twenty-four years completed. The pope may dispense from any irregularity and the bishops generally receive some power of dispensation also with regard to age, not usually for subdeacons and deacons, but for priests. Bishops can generally dispense for one year, whilst the pope gives dispensation for over a year; a dispensation for more than eighteen months is but very rarely granted. For admission to minor orders, the testimonial from the parish priest of the school where the candidate was educated—generally, therefore, the superior of the seminary—is required. For major orders further inquiries must be made. The names of the candidate must be published in the place of his birth and of his domicile and the result of such inquiries are to be forwarded to the bishop. No bishop may ordain those not belonging to his diocese by reason of birth, domicile, benefice, or familiares, without dispensation from the pope; and the dispensation is not granted without the written consent of the candidate and his bishop. Testimonial letters are also required from all the bishops in whose dioceses the candidate has resided for over six months, after the age of seven. Transgression of this rule is punished by suspension interna against the ordaining bishop. In recent years several decisions insist on the strict interpretation of these rules. Subdeacons and deacons should pass one full year in these orders and they may then proceed to receive the priestly ordination. This is laid down by the Council of Trent (Sess. XXIII, c. xi.), which did not prescribe the time for minor orders. The bishop generally has the power to dispense from these interdicts, but it is absolutely forbidden, unless a special indult be obtained, to receive two major orders or the minor orders and the subdiaconate in one day.

For the subdiaconate and the higher orders there is, moreover, required a title, i.e., the right to receive maintenance from a determined source. Before the candidate must observe the interdicts, or times required to elapse between the reception of various orders; he must also have received confirmation and the lower orders preceding the one to which he is raised. This last requirement does not affect the validity of the order conferred, as every order gives a distinct and independent power. One exception is made by the majority of theologians and canonists, who are of opinion that episcopal consecration requires the previous reception of priest's orders for its validity. Others, however, maintain that episcopal power includes full priestly power, which is thus conferred by episcopal consecration. They appeal to history and bring forward cases of bishops who were consecrated without having previously received priest's orders, and though most of these are somewhat doubtful and can be explained on other grounds, it seems impossible to reject them all. It is further to be remembered that scholastic theologians mostly required the previous reception of priest's orders for valid episcopal consecration, because they considered an order, a view which is now generally abandoned.

Obligations.—For obligations attached to holy Orders see BREVIARY; CELIBACY OF THE CLERGY.

Ceremonies of Ordination are the ceremonies of the diacconate, priesthood, and episcopate, and were conferred with special rites and ceremonies. Though in the course of time there was considerable development and diversity in different parts of the Church, the imposition of hands and prayer were always and universally employed and date from Apostolic times (Acts, vi, 6; xiii, 3; I Tim., iv, 14; II Tim., i, 8). In the early Church of the Roman Church there was doubtless a great concourse of clergy and people at a solemn station. The candidates, who had been previously presented to the people, were summoned by name at the beginning of the solemn Mass. They were placed in a conspicuous position, and anyone objecting to a candidate was called upon to state his objections without fear. Silence was regarded as approval. Shortly before the Gospel, after the candidates were presented to the pope, the entire congregation was invited to pray. All prostrating, the litanies were recited, the pope then imposed his hands upon the head of each candidate and recited the Collect with a prayer of consecration corresponding to the order conferred. The Gallican Rite was somewhat more elaborate. Besides the ceremonies used in the Roman Church, the people approving the candidates by acclamation, the hands of the deacon and hands of priests and bishops were anointed with the sign of the Cross. After the seventh century the tradition of the instruments of office was added, alb and stole to the deacon, stole and planeta to the priest, ring and staff to the bishop. In the Eastern Church, after the presentation of the candidate to the congregation and their shout of approval, "He is worthy", the bishop imposed his hands upon the candidate and said the consecrating prayer from the candidating priest's bishop. We now give a short description of the ordination rite for priests as found in the present Roman Pontifical. All the candidates should present themselves...
In the church with tunicure and in clerical dress, carrying the vestments of the order to which they are to be raised, and lighted candles. They are all summoned by name, each candidate answering "Adsum." When a general ordination takes place the tunicure is given over the chasuble by the bishop, as the minor orders after the Glory, subdiaconate after the Collect, the diaconate after the Epistle, priesthood after Alleluia and Tract. After the Tract of the Mass the archdeacon summons all to take the pretension. The candidates, vested in amice, alb, girdle, stole, and maniple, with folded chasuble on left arm and a candle in their right hand, go forward and kneel around the bishop. The latter inquires of the archdeacon, who is here the representative of the Church as it were, whether the candidates are worthy to be admitted to the priesthood. The archdeacon answers in the affirmative and his testimony represents the testimony of fitness given in ancient times by the clergy and people. The bishop, then charging the congregation and insisting upon the reasons why "the Fathers decreed that the people also should be consulted," asks that, if anyone has anything to say to the contrary of the candidates, he should come forward and state it.

The bishop then instructs and admonishes the candidates as to the duties of their new office. He kneels down in front of the altar and himself says the Collect and the first part of the Litany of the Saints is chanted or recited. On the conclusion of the Litany, all rise, the candidates come forward, and kneel in pairs before the bishop while he lays both hands on the head of each candidate in silence. The same is done by all priests who are present. Whils bishop and priests keep their right hands extended, the former alone recites a prayer, inviting all to pray to God for a blessing on the candidates. After this follows the Collect and then the bishop says the Preface, towards the end of which occurs the prayer, "Grant, we beseech Thee, etc." The bishop then with appropriate formularies crosses the stole over the breast of each one and vests him with the chasuble. This is arranged to hang down in front but is folded behind. Though there is no mention of the stole in many of the most ancient Pontificals, there can be no doubt of its antiquity. The vesting with the chasuble is also very ancient and found already in Mabillon "Ord. VIII and IX." Afterwards the bishop recites a prayer calling down God's blessing on the newly-ordained. He then intones the "Veni Creator," and whilst it is being sung by the choir he anoints the hands of each with the oil of catechumens.

The anointing of the hands, which in ancient times was done with chrism, or oil and chrism, was not used by the Roman Church, said Nicholas I (A. D. 864), though it is generally found in all ancient ordinations. It probably became a general practice in the ninth century and seems to have been derived from the British Church (Haddan and Stubbs, "Councils and Eccl. Documents," I, 141). The bishop then hands each the chalice, containing wine and water, with a paten and a host upon it. This rite, with its corresponding formula, which as Hugo of St. Victor says ("Sacram. III, xii), signifies the power which has already been received, is not found in the oldest ritual and probably dates back not earlier than the ninth or tenth century. When the bishop has finished the Offertory of the Mass, he seats himself before the middle of the altar and anoints those ordained making an offering to him of a lighted candle. The newly-ordained priests then repeat the Mass with him, all saying the words of consecration simultaneously. Before the Communion the bishop gives the kiss of peace to each of the newly-ordained. After the Communion the priests again approach the bishop and say the Apostles' Creed. The bishop laying his hands upon each says: "Receive ye the Holy Ghost, whose sins you shall forgive they are forgiven them; and whose sins you shall retain, they are retained." This imposition of hands was introduced in the thirteenth century. The chasuble is then folded, the newly-ordained make a promise of obedience and having received the kiss of peace, return to their minor orders.

Time and Place.—During the first centuries ordination took place whenever demanded by the needs of the Church. The Roman pontiffs generally ordained on Wednesday, but it was ordained in December (A.D. 248), January (A.D. 315) and February (A.D. 318). Pope Gelasius (A.D. 496) decreed that the ordination of priests and deacons should be held at fixed times and days, viz., on the fasts of the fourth, seventh, and tenth months, also on the fasts of Christmas and midweek (Passion Sunday) of Lent and on (Holy) Saturday about sunset (Epist. ad ep. Luc., xi). This but confirmed what Leo the Great laid down, for he seems to speak of ordination on Ember Saturdays as an Apostolic tradition (Serm. 2, de jejun. Pentec.). The ordination may take place either after sunset on the Saturday or early on Sunday morning. The ordination to major orders took place before the Gospel. Minor orders might be given at any day of the week. They were generally given after holy communion. At present minor orders may be given on Sundays and days of obligation (suppressed included) in the morning. For the sacred ordination to be celebrated only on other days than those appointed by the canons, provided the ordination takes place on Sunday or day of obligation (suppressed days included), is very commonly given. Though it was always the rule in the Church that ordinations should take place in public, in time of persecution they were sometimes held in private buildings. The place of ordination is the church. Minor orders may be conferred in any place, but it is understood that they are given in the church. The Pontifical directs that ordinations to sacred orders must be held publicly in the cathedral church in presence of the cathedral chapter, or if the cathedral church be not present the principal church as far as possible, must be made of (cf. Conc. Trid., Sess. XXIII, c. vii). (See Subdeacon, Deacon, Hierarchy, Minor Orders, Alimentation.)

The subject of Ordination is treated in its various aspects in the general works on Dogmatic Theology (Church and Sacraments). Ordinariate (from Ordinary, q. v.)—This term is used in speaking collectively of all the various organs through which an ordinary, and especially a bishop, exercises the different forms of his authority. This word, which is employed particularly in Germany, does not occur in strict canonical language; but it is exactly equivalent to what canonists call the curia. Just as the pope is officially responsible for all that is done in his name and by his authority in the different branches of the Roman Curia (congregations of cardinals, tribunals, offices), so, too, an ordinary and especially a bishop bears the official responsibility of whatever is done, in his name and with his authority, by the persons or committees composing his curia, who are the organs of his administration (vicar-general, official, judges, secretaries, councils of various kinds). Whatever may be the exact form of this administration in each diocese, it is still the diocesan administration and the ordinariate. (See Bishop; Diocesan Chancery; Official; Vicar-General; Vicar Capitular.)

A. BOUDINHON.

Ordinary (Lat. ordinarius, i. e., judez), in ecclesiastical language, denotes any person possessing or exercising ordinary jurisdiction, i. e., jurisdiction connected permanently or at least in a stable way with an office, whether this connexion arises from Divine law, as in the case of popes and bishops, or from positive church law, as in the case mentioned below. Ordinary jurisdiction is contrasted with delegated jurisdiction, a temporary communication of power made by a superior to an inferior; thus we speak of a delegated judge and an ordinary judge. A person may be an ordinary within his own sphere, and at the same time a delegated power to exercise exterior jurisdiction, all with certain acts or the exercise of special authority. The jurisdiction which constitutes an ordinary is real and full jurisdiction in the external forum, comprising the power of legislating, adjudicating, and governing. Jurisdiction in the internal forum, being partial and exercised only in private matters, does not constitute an ordinary. Parish priests, therefore, are not ordinaries, though they have jurisdiction in the internal forum, for they have not jurisdiction in the external forum, being incapable of legislating and acting as judges; their administration is the exercise of paternal authority rather than of jurisdiction properly so called.

There are various classes of ordinaries. First, they are divided into those having territorial jurisdiction and those who have not. As a rule ordinary jurisdiction is territorial as well as personal, as in the case of the pope and the bishops; but ordinary jurisdiction may be restricted to certain persons, exempt from the local authority. Such for instance is the jurisdiction of regular prelates, abbots, generals, and provincials of religious orders making solemn vows; they can legislate, adjudicate, and govern; consequently they are ordinaries; but their jurisdiction concerns individuals, not localities; they are not, like the others, called local ordinaries, ordinario locorum. Superiors of congregations and institutes bound by simple vows are not ordinaries, though they may enjoy a greater or less degree of administrative exemption. The jurisdiction of ordinaries arises from Divine law or ecclesiastical law. The pope is the ordinary of the entire church and all the faithful; he has ordinary and immediate jurisdiction over all (Conc. Vatic., Const. "Papa universalis," c. iii). Bishops are the pastors and ordinary judges in their dioceses, appointed to govern their churches by the Holy Ghost (Acts, xx, 28). Certain bishops have, by ecclesiastical law, a mediate ordinary power over other bishops and dioceses; these are the metropolitans, primates, and patriarchs. In a lower rank, there is another class of ordinaries, viz., prelates who exercise jurisdiction in the external forum over a given territory, which is not a diocese, either in their own name, as in the case of prelates or abbots nullius or in the name of the pope, like vicars and prefects Apostolic until the erection of their territories into complete dioceses.

Local ordinaries being unable personally to perform all acts of their jurisdiction may even be provided to communicate it permanently to certain persons, without, however, divesting themselves of their authority; if the duties of these persons are specified and determined by law, they also are ordinaries, but in a restricted and inferior sense. This is vicarial jurisdiction, delegated as to its source, but ordinary as to its exercise, and which would be more accurately termed quasi-ordinary. In this sense vicars-general and diocesan officials are ordinaries; so also, in regard to the pope, the heads of the various organs of the Curia are ordinaries for the whole Church; the cardinal vicar for the Diocese of Rome and his district; the legate a latere, for the country to which he is sent. Finally, there are ordinaries with an interinary and transitory title during the vacancy of sees. Thus when the Holy See is vacant, the ordinaries are the College of Cardinals and the cardinal camerlengo; when a diocese, the chapter and also the vicar capitular, and in general the interinary administrator; so, too, the vicar, for religious orders. These persons possess and exercise power with certain acts or rights and functions, and this in virtue of their office; they are therefore ordinaries.

In practice, the determination of the persons included under the term ordinary is of importance in the case of indults and the execution of rescripts issued from Rome. Since the decrees of the Holy Office dated 20 February, 1888, and 20 April, 1898, indults and most of the rescripts, instead of being addressed to the See of Rome, are addressed to the ordinary, and it has been declared that the term ordinary comprises bishops, Apostolic administrators, vicars, prelates or prefects with separate territorial jurisdiction, and their officials or vicars-general; and also, during the vacancy of a see, the vicar capitular or lawful administrator. Thus the powers are handed on, without intermission or renewal, from one ordinary to his successor. (See Jurisdiction.)

Ordination. See Ordners, Holy.

Ordines Romani.—The word Ordo commonly meant, in the Middle Ages, a ritual book containing directions for liturgical functions, but not including the text of the prayers etc., recited by the celebrant, or his assistants. These prayers were contained in separate books, e. g., the Sacramentary, Antiphonary, Psalter, but the Ordo concerned itself with the ceremonial pure and simple. Sometimes the title "Ordo" was given to the directions for a single function, sometimes to a collection which dealt in one document with a number of quite different functions e. g., the rite of baptism, the consecration of a church, extreme unction, etc. Amalarius (early ninth century) speaks of the writings "quae continent per diversos libellos Ordinem Romanum" (P. L., CV, 2905). Speaking generally, the word Ordo soundly gave place after the twelfth century to "Ceremoniale," "Ordinarium" and similar terms, but was retained in other senses, especially to denote the brief conspectus of the daily Office and Mass as adapted to the local calendar (see Directory). A considerable number of Ordines are preserved among our manuscripts from the eighth to the twelfth century. The first printed in modern times was the so-called Ordo Romanus Vulgatus, which after an edition published by George Cassander at Cologne (in 1561) was reprinted by Hittorp in his "De divinis catholicae ecclesiæ officiis" (Cologne, 1688) and in
hence often known as the Ordo Romanus of Hittorp. This is not a pure Roman document of early date. Already in the seventeenth century G. M. Tomasi rightly characterised it as a "farrago diversorum rituum secundum variis consuetudinibus" and declared that its heterogeneous elements could only be disentangled by careful study of the earlier Ordines. At present it is regarded as the work of a compiler in Gaul in the second half of the tenth century and the eleventh, this date being still disputed (cf. Mönchemer, "Amalar von Mota", 140 and 214; Bäumer in "Katholik", 1889, I, 626). Moreover, this conflated Ordo Romanus of Hittorp which is largely derived from the first, second, third, and sixth of the Ordines of Mabillon, mentioned below, is only one among a number of analogous compilations. Similar documents of about the same period have been published by other scholars, e.g., by Martène ("Thes. nov. anec.", V, 101 — this is a valuable monastic Ordo of comparatively early date), by Muratori ("Lit. Rom. Vet.", II, 391), by Gattico ("Acta cerem.", I, 220), and by Gerbert ("Mon. Vet. St. alem.", I, 77). In view of its composite character, the Ordo Vigilus is of no great liturgical importance, though it sometimes fills a gap in our knowledge upon points not elsewhere minutely treated. It deals primarily with Mass, but it also describes the rite of the consecration of the pope and of a bishop, the dedication of churches, the blessing of bells, the coronation of the emperor and of a king, the blessing of the knight, or of a soldier (militia) dedicated to the service of the Church, the benediction of a bride, and the ceremonies to be observed in the opening of a general or provincial council. It should be noticed, moreover, that in these miscellaneous offices we do not find the characteristic features of an ordo in its technical sense. In the later portions of the Ordo Romanus of Hittorp not only are the details of the ceremonial indicated in their due sequence, but, as in a modern Pontifical, the text of the prayers, blessings, etc., to be recited by the celebrant, is given in full.

Much more valuable to the liturgical student is the series of fifteen consuetudines, first printed by Mabillon in his "Museum Italicum" (1689), to which the term Ordines Romanus is commonly applied. They are not indeed all of them pure and homogeneous documents, neither do they represent an undifferentiated Roman tradition, nor are they all, strictly speaking, Ordines in the sense defined above. But in default of better material, and while we are waiting for a profound critical investigation of the sort which the earlier documents and assigns to them their proper date and provenance, Mabillon's Ordines constitute the most reliable source of information regarding the early liturgical usages of the Roman Church. Covering the whole period from the sixth to the fifteenth century, they may be said, taken collectively, to have some pretensions to completeness.

Ono 1. — The first of these Ordines Romani, describing the ceremonies of a solemn Mass celebrated by the pope himself or his deputy, is the most valuable, as it is also one of the most ancient. Modern opinion inclines to the belief that the early part of it (numbers 1—21) really represents in substance the usage of a stational Mass in the time of Pope Gregory the Great (Köstner, "Studien zu Mabilions röm. Ord.", 6; cf. Grrias, "Analecta Romana", I, 193), but there are also, undoubtedly, in the present text adjustments and additions which must be attributed to the end of the seventh century (Atchley, "Ord. Rom. Primus", 7, favoure a later date, but in this he only follows Probst). The fact that Amalarius, who seems to have had a copy of this Ordo before him, does not find its description of paschal ceremonies in agreement with the actual Roman practice of his day, as expounded to him by Archdeacon Theodore in 832, need not lead us, with Mönchemer ("Amalar", 141), to the conclusion that the ceremonial never represented the official Roman use, and that it was merely an outline serving as a model for similar ceremonies in the Frankish dominions. On the contrary, so far as regards numbers 1—21, every detail attaches itself to the ordinary practice of the pontifical ceremonies of Rome. An introduction portions out the liturgical service among the clergy of the seven regions. Then the procession to the stational church and the arrival there are minutely described. This is followed with an account of the vesting, the Introit, the Kyrie, the Collects, and all the parts of the Mass. Very full details are also given of the manner of the reception of the offerings of bread and wine from the clergy and people, and to this succeeds a description of the Canon, the Kiss of Peace, the Communion, and the rest of the Mass. The account ends with number 21.

This is the section which Grías has proved, with all reasonable probability, to belong to the time of Gregory the Great ("Analecta Romana", 195—213). In one or two points the evidence of early date must impress even the casual reader. Thus, the bringing of the holy Eucharist to the pontiff when the procession moves towards the altar-steps before the beginning of Mass. It is thus described in n. 8: "But before they arrive at the altar . . . the open pixes containing the Holy Things [lententis capace cum sanctis patiencis]; and the subdeacon attendant taking them and keeping his hand in the aperture of the pix shows the Holy Things, who gives them to the deacon who goes before him. Then the pontiff or the deacon salutes the Holy Things with bowed head." Nothing of this appears in the account of Amalarius, who could hardly have failed to record it if it had been in existence in his time. Quite in accordance with such an inference, this bringing of the Eucharist to the pontiff has, in the second Ordo Romanus, admitted of later date, been replaced by a sort of visit of the pontiff to the Blessed Sacrament in the church, a practice observed in pontifical Masses to this day. Again we may note that the first Ordo contains no mention of the Credo, which was certainly in use in Rome, according to Walfred Strabo, about the year 800. Again the word cardinates, in accordance with the usage of St. Gregory's own letters, is not applied to the bishops, priests, and deacons attached to the papal service, but in the later chapters of the same Ordo we do find reference to presbyteri cardinates (n. 48). All these, with other indications of early date, are pointed out by Grías. It is not easy to prove that the Ordo, nn. 22—51, is the second portion of the Ordo, or that it is a copy of an originally one document. On the contrary, nn. 22 and 48—51 seem to be closely connected, while all the intervening numbers (23—47), giving an account of the services in Lent and the last three days of Holy Week and showing, in several details, signs of a later origin, are clearly continuous and independent of the rest. The fact that Pope Hadrian and Charlemagne are mentioned in this section, as also that the Mass of the Presanctified (contrary to the Einseideln Ordo of the seventh century published by De Rossi in "Inscr. Christ.", II, i, 34) was celebrated by the pontiff on Good Friday after the veneration of the Cross, proves that this section can hardly be older than the ninth century. Finally the chapters published by Mabillon from another manuscript as an appendix to Ordo I under a separate enumeration have clearly no immediate connexion with what goes before, they simply provide another series of directions for Lent and the last days of Holy Week, sometimes coinciding even verbally with the rubrics given in nn. 23—47 and sometimes differing in various particulars. This appendix is generally assumed to be later in date than the second section of the Ordo.

Ono 2. — The second Ordo Romanus printed by Mabillon describes again a solemn pontifical Mass and is clearly based upon the first portion of Ordo I, sometimes quoting, or epitomising, but elsewhere developing and adapting the directions of the earlier document. It contains some ritual features which are certainly not of Roman but of Gallican origin (for example the recitation of the Creed in the Mass, which is some, in spite of Walafrid Strabo, consider not to have been known in Rome before the eleventh century, as also the giving of a pontifical blessing after the "Pax Domini"). It is generally accepted that this Ordo II belongs to the time of the general introduction of the Roman Liturgy into Gaul in the days of Charlemagne, i.e. about the beginning of the ninth century. This Ordo, as well as Ordo I and probably another now lost, was known to Amalarius, who in his "Ecloga" has annotated it with a view to the spiritual edification of his readers.

Ordo III and Ordo IV contain yet another series of directions for a solemn Mass celebrated by the pope. That of Ordo IV is only a fragment, but both III and IV are generally considered older than the eleventh century. Mabillon considered Ordo III to be distinctly a later date than II and the fact that the stational church in III is called "Monasterium", a designation which does not seem to have come into use before the ninth century, lends support to this view. It is also confirmed by the fact that this Ordo III was apparently unknown to Amalarius. On the other hand III has clearly been extensively used in the composition of the Ordo Romanus Vulgatus, which, as already stated, probably took shape in the second half of the tenth century. That the fragmentary Ordo IV is of later date than any of those previously mentioned has been inferred by Mabillon from the fact that the pope is here described as communicating at the altar and not at his throne, as is the practice in the older rituals. Still, the manuscript in which it is found cannot be later than the first half of the eleventh century (Edmer, "Quellen", 133).

Ordo V and Ordo VI are again entirely consecrated to the celebration of a pontifical high Mass. Ordo V goes into details as to the vestments worn by the pope, and separately as to the vestments worn by a Roman bishop and the lesser clergy. It is specifically a Roman document and throughout assumes that the pope is pontificating. The pope here communicates at his throne and the Creed is sung after the gospel. But the text of Bern of Reichenau affirms that this last of ordo III only began at Rome in 1014, the fact that Walafrid Strabo describes it as sung at Rome about the year 800 (P.L., CXIV, 947) renders this a very unsatisfactory test of date. On the other hand, the sixth Ordo V did not directly consist with Rome, but in Ordo II it describes the ceremonies of a pontifical Mass adapted from the papal function for use elsewhere. In the opinion of Kösters, (Studien, 17) it probably belongs to the first half of the tenth century, since it was used by the compiler of the Ordo Vulgatus. It has been copied by a later twelfth century hand upon a blank page of the English "Benedictional of Archbishop Robert", and is there described as a "ritual drawn up by the ancient Fathers of the West".

Ordo VII is probably the most ancient of all Mabillon's Ordines and is assigned by Probst, Kösters, and others to the sixth century. The whole document deals with the ceremonies of Christian initiation, i.e. the catechumenate with its Lenten scrutinies (see Baptism), the rite of the consecration of the baptismal water, the baptism itself, and finally confirmation. The Ordo is closely related to the Gelasian Sacramentary, and the prayers, given in full in the Gelasianus, are here for the most part only indicated by their beginnings. Like the Gelasianus, the Ordo speaks through out of infants as the subjects for baptism, and the whole ceremony is modified to suit the case of infants in arms. When the catechumenates are called upon to recite the Nicene Creed, it is directed that one of the acolytes shall take up one of the children upon his left arm, lay his right hand upon the child's head and recite the Creed in Greek, while another acolyte, holding another child, subsequently recites the Creed in Latin. None the less, the ceremonial of the catechumenates was originally designed for adult catechumenates, who were capable of understanding the Gospels and of learning and reciting the Creed for themselves. On the other hand, if the Ordo VII consistently regards the catechumenates as infantes, this cannot be interpreted as a proof of a relatively late date, for we find that already at the beginning of the sixth century the εἰρήνη διακονία, Senarius, asks of John, descan of Rome, "quære tertio ante Pascha scrutinentur infantes" (why the infantes to undergo the scrutinies three times before Easter, Migne, P. L., LXI, 401). Seeing that the Gelasian Sacramentary also seems to know only of three scrutinies, it is possible that Ordo VII which requires seven scrutinies may be of even older date than the sixth century, for it is hardly likely that when there was question of none but infant catechumenates, the number of scrutinies should have been increased from three to seven. The whole tendency must have been in the direction of simplification. It may be noticed that Mabillon's Ordo VII is incorporated entire in an instruction on baptism by Jesse, Bishop of Amiens, c. 812.

Ordo VIII is concerned with the subject of ordinations and falls naturally into two divisions. The first part deals with the ordination of acolytes, subdeacons, deacons, and priests, the second with the ceremonies of the consecration of a bishop. Although the first part is extremely concise, and the second, more particularly in regard to the quattuor capitula (four forms of ordaining a cleric), is almost incomprehensible in its present state, there seems no sufficient reason for questioning the essential unity of the whole document. In spite of certain expressions, notably the "anicia dei sacraa quae Francis nonnatae dicuntur" which may easily be an interpolation or a gloss, and of references to the Ember seasons, to the nomenclator and the schola (i.e. the choir—which last seems to suggest a place posterior to Gregory the Great), certain critics, notably Kösters (Studien, 21-23), make no difficulty in assigning the document to the early part of the sixth century. It is certainly noteworthy that though there is no mention in Ordo VIII of ordination for any clergy lower than the grade of acolyte, the usages described closely agree with the language of the letter of Johannes Diaconus to Senarius at the beginning of the sixth century (Migne, P. L., LXI, 406). The function of the acolytes "portantes candelabrum" is specified with precision. Ordo I, is recognized by assigning to them little bags (saculi) as their distinctive attribute, instead of the candlestick of a later date, while the delivery of the chalice is emphasized as the significant act in the consecration of a subdeacon. When Bishop John Wordsworth (Ministry of Grace, 180) assumes that the delivery of the chalice is a Gallican ceremony and that it was introduced into the Roman Church in the seventh century at the earliest, he has clearly forgotten the explicit language of the letter of Senarius: "hic apud nos ordo est ut accepto sacratissimo calicis in quo consecutus pontifex dominici sanguinis immolare mysterium subdiaconus iam dicatur". Again both Kösters and Grissar (Geschichte Romes, 765) regard the testing of the candidate for ordination by the quattuor capitula, requiring him to swear his innocence of certain unnatural crimes, as an indication which points to an age when many adult pagans still entered the Church as converts and were likely to be promoted to orders.

Ordo IX is entitled "De gradibus Romanorum ecclesiae" and deals briefly with the ordination of deacons and priests, with the consecration of a bishop somewhat more fully, and finally with the consecration and coronation of a pope, while an appendix with a separate heading treats of the ember days. The date and ORDINES composition of this document has recently been investigated by Dr. Kösters in a very able chapter of his "Studien". His conclusions are, that the substance of the text of the Ordos was drawn up in the time of Pope Constantine I (708-15), and underwent some revision under Pope Stephen III (752-7). However, the most startling part of Dr. Kösters' discussion is his demonstration that the section describing the coronation of the pope, which introduces the "Liber Pontificalis", belongs not to the period of Pope Leo III (c. 800), as has hitherto been supposed, but to that of Saint Leo IX (1044), and that in fact the papal regnum, or crown, which this Ordos describes as "made of white cloth in the form of a helmet", was for the first time worn by that pontiff. The statement made in this Ordos that the new pope should be a priest or deacon ordained by his predecessor and that he ought not to be a bishop (nam episcopus esse non potest) is particularly interesting in view of the fact that Cardinal Deudicel in the eleventh century, who comments on the text of this document, had apparently before him no clause to this effect. It is probably an interpolation of about that period. Other points of interest are the mention of diaconisatis and preekterisatis, and the ceremony of holding the book of the Gospels over the pope in his ordination (滕案複與apostolicae consuetudinum). We hear of this last ceremony earlier in the East (cf. Apostolic Constitutions, VIII, iv) and in Gaul, and it is now part of the rite of consecration of every bishop, but it appears late at a time. The appendix on the ember days, attached to this Ordos in the Saint-Gall Manuscript, had probably no original connexion with it and may be assumed to be not Roman.

Ordos X is a relatively long and very miscellaneous document and has no real claim to be included in the series of Ordines. It is, strictly speaking, a primitive form of the ecclesiastical office, and it is difficult to persuade oneself that it has not resulted from the fusion of at least two separate elements. The description of the Holy Week ceremonies which occurs in n. 1-24 may be described as a Ceremoniale pure and simple, and so is the burial service for the Roman clergy in nn. 36-40, the Roman character of both being unmistakeable, but the intervening sections 25-35, which consist of an Ordos for administering the Sacrament of Penance, and for visitation, and giving Vaticum to the sick, form a service-book complete in itself, including not merely the incipit but the entire text of the prayers to be said by the priest, like any other Ritual. There is a very close parallel (Lupurigk, p. 43) has sought to draw a presumptive account of late date from the form of absolution in n. 29, which is indicative and not preceptive, absolutionem ut vice beati Petri etc.; but substantially the same form occurs with an interpolated Anglo-Saxon translation in the Egbert Pontificial of the tenth century. Neither are the reasons convincing, upon which Kösters bases his conclusion that the document as a whole is posterior to the year 1200. We must probably be content to leave the question of date unsettled.

Ordos XI has a tolerably full account of the papal ceremonial as it extended through the whole ecclesiastical year. This description is particularly valuable inasmuch as it includes not only the functions of great solemnities but also the everyday usages and a considerable amount of detail regarding the Divine Office. It has lately been shown in the time of Pope Pius XI that what now possess in Ordos XI is only a fragment of a much larger work compiled by Benedict, Canon of St. Peter's, which was primarily a treatise upon the dignity of the Roman pontiff and upon the cardinalate and various officials of the Roman Court, and which from the nature of its contents was called "Liber Politicus". This title has left a trace of itself in the heading of the manuscript used by Mabillon, where by strange perversion it appears as "liber politicus". The treatise seems to have been completed just before the year 1143.

Ordos XII likewise contains a somewhat minute description of the papal ceremonies, and quasi-ecclesiastical functions throughout the year, much space being occupied by a detailed record of the regulations followed in the distribution of the bounties called prebendaries. This Ordos is avowedly extracted from the "Liber Pontificalis", and is appended towards the end of the twelfth century by Cardinal Cencius de Sabelis, afterwards Pope Honorius III (1216-1227). But here again Kösters has shown that the last two sections, dealing with the insignia and consecration of the pope and with the crowning of the emperor, can be traced back to the "Politicus" of Benedict. Various miscellaneous matters, concerning, e.g., the duties and dues of certain minor officials, the oath taken by senators to the pope, etc., also find a place in this collection.

Ordos XIII is one of the few Ordines which we possess, at least substantially, in the form in which it was first written. This is admittedly an official treatise drawn up by command of Pope Gregory X, shortly after the publication of the Constitution "Ubi periculum", issued in 1274 to regulate the procedure of the cardinals assembled in conclave for a papal election. The earliest portion of the document (nn. 1-12) is in fact concerned with the choice, consecration, and coronation of a new pope, provision being made for the case of his being a bishop, or deacon. The treatise seems to presuppose an acquaintance with Ordos XI and Ordos XII and it is probably in consequence of this that the directions for the ordinary ceremonial are very concise. This Ordos marks the transition stage to a different type of liturgical document, much more developed and distinctively framed with a view to the part played by the Roman pontiff and his great retinue. Up to Ordos XI, it may be said that the Ordines Romani are presented at the present day by the "Pontificale" and the "Ceremoniale Episcoporum" (q. v.), which are liturgical textbooks common to the whole of Latin Christianity. But the two remaining Ordines, XIV and XV, are represented to-day by the "Ceremoniale Romani", which constitutes the rubrical code for papal functions in Rome and has no application in the ceremonial of the Catholic Church outside of the Eternal City.

Ordos XIV, which in the manuscripts bears the significant title "Ordinarium" instead of Ordos, is a much longer document than any of those hitherto considered. It is in fact the first Ordos which has been drawn or, as it were (Lupurigk, p. 43), has sought to draw a presumptive account of late date from the form of absolution in n. 29, which is indicative and not preceptive, absolutionem us vice beati Petri etc., but substantially the same form occurs with an interpolated Anglo-Saxon translation in the Egbert Pontificial of the tenth century. Neither are the reasons convincing, upon which Kösters bases his conclusion that the document as a whole is posterior to the year 1200. We must probably be content to leave the question of date unsettled.

Ordos XV has a tolerably full account of the papal ceremonial as it extended through the whole ecclesiastical year. This description is particularly valuable inasmuch as it includes not only the functions of great solemnities but also the everyday usages and a considerable amount of detail regarding the Divine Office. It has lately been shown in the time of Pope Pius XI that what now possess in Ordos XI is only a fragment of a much larger work compiled by Benedict, Canon of St. Peter's, which was primarily a treatise upon the dignity of the Roman pontiff and upon the cardinalate and various officials of the Roman Court, and which from the nature of its contents was called "Liber Politicus". This title has left a trace of itself in the heading of the manuscript used by Mabillon, where by strange perversion it appears as "liber politicus". The treatise seems to have been completed just before the year 1143.
life, it may be doubted whether we possess the treatise in its entirety. In the original plan of Steffanelli we know that the papal obsequies were included, but upon this head nothing contained in Ordo XV, and it is difficult to conceive that this omission can have taken place through an oversight when so many other needs are minutely provided for.

Ordo XV is a fresh attempt to work up the same materials which, supplying at the same time the lacunae which had hitherto existed. According to Kösters, chapters 1-100 and 143-153 were first drafted in the middle of the fourteenth century and were revised and supplemented by Pietro Amelio down to the year 1400. But the work of revision and modification was further carried on as far as 1435 by Peter, Bishop of Olyrza, while a final editor, who may very possibly have been Peter Kirten, Bishop of Olyrza, put a last hand to the work in the second half of the same century. A selection of some of the more noteworthy headings of the 153 chapters of the work will perhaps serve better than anything else to give an idea of the comprehensiveness of this prototype of the Ceremonial Romanum, which Mabillon prints under the name of Pietro Amelio.

Advent; Vigil of the Nativity; Entoning of the Antiphons; Matins; Reading of the Lessons; First Mass on Christmas Day; Second Mass; Third Mass; St. Stephen and the following feasts; Epiphany; Blessing of the Candles on 2 Feb. with the Procession; Serving the Pope; Ash Wednesday; What happens when the King receives Ashes; Different occurrences in Lent; The Progresses of the Pope in penitential Seasons; Taking off the Pope’s Mitre; Fourth Sunday of Lent, called Rose Sunday; Blessing of this Palms, followed by detailed instructions for the Holy Week ceremonies, especially regarding the Maundy and the banquet on Maundy Thursday; Cardinal-Priests who serve the Pope on Holy Saturday; Easter and the Communion of the Cardinal Deacons etc.; Short details regarding the other Feasts of the Year; Office for the Dead on All Souls’ Day; What is to be Observed when the Pope Sickness; Death of the Pope; Exequies of the Pope; Novendial; Distributions of Cloth after the Pope’s Death; Directions for the Conclave; Meeting a Cardinal who comes to the Roman Court; Canonizations, notably that of St. Bridget (1391).

Ordines Romani Published since Mabillon.—Mabillon’s selection by no means exhausts the materials of this nature still available. Documents unknown in his time have since been published by scholars who recognized their value. Foremost amongst these is the Einsiedeln Ordo, already alluded to, which was first printed by De Rossi in his “Inscriptions Christianae” (II, I, 34) and has since been re-edited by Duchesne in his “Origines du Culte Chrétien” (tr. Christian Worship, 481). This supplies an earlier and more purely Roman account of the ceremorial of the last three days of Holy Week than that contained in Mabillon’s Ordo I. Again an extremely important text covering much the same ground as Ordo I but including, besides the pontifical Mass and the Holy Week ceremonial, some account of the ember-day ordinances, the rite of the dedication of a church with relics, and the candle procession on the feast of the Purification, has been published by Mgr Duchesne in the work just named from a ninth-century manuscript of St. Mandel. Other documents of less moment have been printed by Gerbert in his “Monumenta vet. lit. aleman.” (St. Blasien, 1770), by Martene in his “De antiquis eccles. ritibus”, by Kösters as an appendix to his “Studien” and by others.

HERBERT THORNTON.

Oregon, one of the Pacific Coast States, seventh in size among the states of the Union. It received its name from the Oregon (now the Columbia) River, which is the state’s greatest inland waterway. The ultimate origin of the name is obscure. Oregon is bounded on the north by the State of Washington, on the east by Idaho, on the south by Nevada and California, and on the west by the Pacific Ocean. Its length is 300 miles from north to south; its breadth 206 miles. Its total area is 96,630 sq. miles, including 1470 of water surface. It lies between 42° and 46° 18’ N. lat., and between 116° 35’ and 124° 35’ W. long.

Physical Characteristics.—In the western portion of the state two mountain ranges one hundred miles apart run parallel with the coast line; in the eastern part there stretches out a vast inland plateau. The coast range traverses the state at a distance of about twenty miles from the ocean; it has an average height of 3500 feet, and is densely covered with fir, spruce, and cedar, most of which is valuable for lumber. The Cascade Mountains, a prolongation of the Sierra Nevada, extend through the state from north to south at a distance of about 120 miles from the coast. While the average height of this range is about 6000 feet, it is crowned with a line of extinct volcanoes whose snow-capped peaks reach a height of 9000 feet, Mt. Hood, just east of the city of Portland, attaining an altitude of 11,228 feet.

Division.—The state is divided physically into three sections known as Western, Southern, and Eastern Oregon, differing in temperature, rainfall, and products. The Willamette Valley lies in Western Oregon. It is bounded on the north by the Columbia River, on the east by the Cascades, on the west by the Coast Range, and on the south by the Calapooya Mts. It is the most thickly settled part of the state, and noted for its beautiful farm homes and equable climate. The valley is about 160 miles long, and has an average width of sixty miles, not including its mountain slopes. It presents one beautiful sweep of valley containing about 5,000,000 acres, all of which is highly fertile. It is drained by the Willamette River, which runs north, receives the waters of many important streams rising in the Cascades and coast range, and discharges into the Columbia River, just north of Portland. Western Oregon also includes the important counties west of the Willamette Valley on the coast. Southern Oregon lies west of the Cascades, between the Willamette Valley and California. It comprises the counties of Douglas, Coos, Curry, Josephine, and Jackson. The principal streams of this section are the Umpqua and Rogue Rivers, which rise in the Cascade Range and empty into the Pacific Ocean. The valleys of these rivers are notable for their abundant and varied fruit production. The mountains in this section are rich in gold, which is extensively mined. The portion of this section west of the coast range is generally heavily timbered with fir, spruce, and cedar. Extensive coal deposits are found, some of which are developed and yield largely. Coos Bay is one of the best harbours on the Oregon Coast. Eastern Oregon embraces the state east of the Cascade Mountains, forming a parallelogram 275 miles long and 230 miles wide. It is a great inland plateau of an altitude varying between 2000 and 5000 feet. The southern half of this plateau belongs to the Great American Basin, while the northern portion slopes towards the Columbia river valley. In the north-eastern part of the state, between the Snake and Columbia rivers, are the Blue Mountains whose summits are more than 6000 feet high, and whose streams are used for the purpose of irrigation. The Government is reclaiming large tracts by irrigation in this section. Here also is the most valuable and important mineral belt of the state. In the southern portion of Eastern Oregon are several short mountain ranges from 2000 to 3000 feet high which are a continuation of the longitudinal basin-ranges of Nevada. Irrigation is contributing largely towards bringing this section into prominence. The Klamath irrigation project, under the supervision of the United States Government, contains about 200,000 acres and is making practical the speaking up the Klamath.

Resources.—All the four great natural resources—viz., forest, fisheries, soil, and minerals—are present in almost inexhaustible supply awaiting development.

Lumber.—Oregon has approximately three hundred billion feet of standing merchantable timber (or nearly one-fifth of the standing merchantable timber in the United States), valued at $3,000,000,000. Timber covers about 57 per cent of the area of the state. Apart from the value of this timber as a source of lumber supply, it serves an important purpose in maintaining a perpetual flow of water in the mountain streams by retarding the melting of snow and holding a continuous supply of moisture in the ground during the summer. The most densely timbered area of the state is west of the Cascade Range, due to the greater rainfall in that section. The average stand of timber on the forested area west of the cascades is 17,700 feet B. M. to the acre. Localities where the stand is 50,000 feet per acre for entire townships are common in the coast counties of Clatsop and Tillamook. Some sections are found where a yield of 150,000 feet to the acre is estimated, many of the trees scaling 40,000 feet or more of commercial lumber. The Douglas fir sometimes attains a height of 300 feet, and five to six inches in thickness. British timbers more than 100 feet in length are obtained from these trees. About 66 per cent of the timber of this variety, which yields more commercial product to the acre than any other tree in North America. Three per cent of the merchantable timber of Oregon is hardwood, such as ash, oak, maple, and myrtle. There are about ninety-five species that attain to the dignity of trees: of these thirty-eight are coniferous, seventeen deciduous softwoods, and forty hardwoods. At present the lumber industry is one of Oregon's chief sources of revenue. The output of sawed lumber for 1906 was 2,500,000,000 feet valued at $30,000,000. The output of other forest products (piling, poles, shingles, ties, etc.) brought the total forest product from the state for that year to the sum of $60,000,000, which is about the average annual production. Portland is the largest lumber port in the world. The work of preventing forest fires is carried on by the United States Government on its forest reserves, and the state maintains a patrol of 300 men to protect the forests of the state.

Minerals.—There is a great wealth and variety of minerals to be found in Oregon, including gold, silver, copper, iron, asbestos, nickel, platinum, coal, antimony, lead, and clay, salt and alkali deposits, and an inexhaustible supply of ore. One of the rich mining districts is the Blue Mountains. A large number of quartz mines are operated in Eastern and Southern Oregon, and in these districts placer mines yield largely. There are two pronounced copper districts in the state—one in Baker County, the other in the south-western section. Oregon coal is lignitic, the largest bed uncovered being in the vicinity of Coos Bay. The largest iron beds in the state are in the Willamette Valley. The ore is of limonite variety, showing about fifty per cent of metallic iron.

Fisheries.—Oregon is unequalled by any other state in salmon fisheries and cannery. The most notable species of salmon is the Columbia River Royal Chinook. The fish industry in the state produces upwards of $5,000,000 annually. Reckless overfishing threatened to exhaust the supply and to imperil the industry, until the state regulated it by law and provided for it by hatcheries. The state through its department of fisheries operates at the annual expense of $50,000 ten salmon hatcheries, from which nearly 70,000,000 young salmon are liberated annually. Thus the Columbia River is made to produce year after year practically the same supply of salmon. In addition to the canneries, cold storage plants are operated, practically the whole output of which is shipped to European markets.

Agriculture.—Last year there have seen a great expansion in all lines of farming. In 1908 the total production of the farms of the State represented a gross value of about one hundred million dollars. Owing to the lack of a large rural population, however, only a fraction of the agricultural lands of the state yield even a respectable revenue. The most thickly settled agricultural sections are the Willamette Valley in Western Oregon (where nearly everything grows), and the Willamette Valley in the Willamette Valley. The Columbia River and the shore line of the coast counties. The great wheat and meat producing section of the state is in Eastern and Central Oregon. The Columbia River Basin in Eastern Oregon is one of the best grain districts in the world. Wasco, Sherman, Gilliam, Morrow, and Umatilla counties produce from ten to fifteen million bushels of wheat annually. The soil is mainly a volcanic ash and silt, very fertile and generally deep. Hood River, among the best-known apple regions in the world, is included in this district. The Umatilla County may be taken as an illustration: its wheat crop averages about 5,000,000 bushels annually, while the alfalfa lands, comprising about 50,000 acres, yield three crops each year, totalling seven tons to the acre. Live stock is also extensive: there are in this county about 350,000 sheep (with flocks averaging 9½ pounds) and 30,000 cattle. Most of the sheep and a large proportion of the cattle of the state are raised in central Oregon which comprises about twenty million acres. This immense territory has been hitherto without any railroad communication whatever, and is at present devoted to range systems of husbandry. South-eastern Oregon, comprising Klamath and Lake Counties, is a stock and dairy section. On 1 Jan., 1909, the live stock of the state was valued at $54,024,000. The revenue to the state from dairy products was $17,- 000,000. In Southern Oregon forest and mining industry: there are in this county about 350,000 sheep (with flocks averaging 9½ pounds) and 30,000 cattle. Most of the sheep and a large proportion of the cattle of the state are raised in central Oregon which comprises about twenty million acres. This immense territory has been hitherto without any rail- road communication whatever, and is at present devoted to range systems of husbandry. South-eastern Oregon, comprising Klamath and Lake Counties, is a stock and dairy section. On 1 Jan., 1909, the live stock of the state was valued at $54,024,000. The revenue to the state from dairy products was $17,- 000,000. In Southern Oregon.
water navigation now extends 150 miles along the northern boundary of Oregon, and, with the completion of the ship railway above the Cascades, will extend to 250 miles. The Snake River runs along the eastern boundary of the state for 150 miles, and is navigable for a considerable distance from where it enters the Columbia. The Willamette River which empties into the Columbia just north of Portland is navigable as far as Eugene, 150 miles from Portland. The region between the coast and the Cascade ranges, and the northern fringe of the state along the Columbia and Snake rivers are well supplied with railroad facilities. The vast area of Eastern Oregon, however, has been hitherto practically without railroad service. This immense territory finally being opened up (1910) by the construction of railroads by two rival systems through the Deschutes Valley.

Educational System.—The State Board of Education is composed of the governor, the secretary of state, and a superintendent of public instruction. In each county there is a superintendent who holds office for two years, and each school district has a board comprising from three to five directors whose term is three years. The state course of study provides for eight grades in the grammar schools and four years in the high schools. The University of Oregon at Eugene and the agricultural college at Corvallis complete the state school system. An irreducible fund of $3,500,000 has been secured by the sale of part of the school lands in the state. In 1864 Congress set aside section 16 and 36 of all the public lands in Oregon for public schools. For many years previous to 1909 there were four state normal schools, which were practically local high schools subsidized by the state. The university was established at St. Paul the legislature of that year, and there is now one state normal located at Monmouth. The university was established in 1872. The agricultural college at Corvallis, which also gives a college course in the liberal arts and sciences, has about one thousand students. There are a large number of denominational colleges and secondary schools in the state. At Salem, the state capital, are located the charitable and penal institutions of the state, viz., the schools for the blind and deaf mute, the insane asylum, boys’ reform school, and the penitentiary.

Explorations.—In 1543 the Spanish navigators Fierro and Valdivia explored the Pacific coast—possibly to the parallel of 42°, the southern boundary of Oregon. Sir Francis Drake in “The Golden Hind” (1543), carried the English colours a few miles farther north than Ferrelo had ventured. The same point was reached by the Spaniard Vesceco in 1603. In 1774 Juan Perez sailed in the “Sanchez” from the harbour of Monterey and explored the north-west coast as far as parallel 58°. The following year the Spanish explored the north-west coast under Heceta, who, on his return, observed the strong currents at the mouth of the Columbia. Nootka Sound was visited and named by the English navigator Cook in 1778. The visit of Cook had important consequences. The natives loaded his ship with sea otter skins in exchange for the merest trifles. The value of these skins was not suspected, until the ship touched at Asiatic and European ports where they were sold for fabulous prices. The commercial value of the north-west had been discovered. The ships of all nations sought for a profitable fur-trade with the Indians, and the strife for the possession of the territory entered a new phase. Captain Robert Gray of Boston discovered the Columbia River in 1792 and named it after his ship. The country was first explored by the American expedition of Lewis and Clark in 1805. Astoria, at the mouth of the Columbia, the first white settlement in Oregon, was founded in 1811 by the American Fur Company under the direction of John Jacob Astor. Two years later the North West Company (a Canadian fur company) bought out Astoria, and maintained commercial supremacy until it merged with the great Hudson’s Bay Company in 1821.

This latter company dominated Oregon for a quarter of a century. The Oregon country on the north embraced an area of 400,000 sq. miles and extended from the Rocky Mountains on the east to the Pacific Ocean and from the Mexican possessions on the south to the Russian possessions on the north. In 1824 a commanding personality arrived on the Columbia as chief factor of the Hudson’s Bay Co., in the Oregon country. This was Dr. John McLoughlin (q.v.), the most heroic figure in Oregon history. Realizing that the great trading post should be at the confluence of the Columbia and Willamette Rivers, McLoughlin transferred the headquarters of the company from Fort George (Astoria) to Fort Vancouver. He refused to sell liquor to the Indians, and bought up the supplies of rival traders to prevent them from selling it. He commanded the absolute obedience and respect of the Indian population, and Fort Vancouver was the haven of rest for all travellers in the Oregon country. Speaking of McLoughlin’s place in Oregon history, his biographer, Mr. Frederick V. Holman, a non-Catholic, pays him the following just tribute: “He taught the Indians the laws and deeds of the great nations of the earth, and was one of the first to be heard in their councils. He began the education and training of the boys of his time, and was the founder of the Willamette Valley. These settlers applied in 1835 to Bishop Provencher of Red River (St. Boniface, Manitoba) for priests to come among them to bless their homes and to teach their sons to read and write, to support their children, and to revive the Faith among themselves. It was in answer to this petition that Fathers F. N. Blanchet and Modeste Demers were sent to the Oregon country in 1838. On their arrival the missionaries found a log church already erected on the prairie above St. Paul. Meanwhile another request for missionaries had gone forth. The Indians in the Rocky Mountains had repeated to their brethren in the East. In 1831 the Flatheads with their neighbours, the Nez Percés, sent a deputation to St. Louis to ask for priests. They had heard of the black robes through Iroquois Indians, who had settled among them and thus transplanted the seed of the white man. It was not until 1840 that Bishop Rosati of St. Louis was able to send a missionary. In that year Father De Smet, S.J., set out on his first trip to the Oregon country where he became the apostle of the Rocky Mountain Indians. A peculiar perversion of the facts concerning the visit of the Indians to St. Louis got abroad in the Protestant religious press and started a remarkable movement towards Oregon. The Methodists sent out Jason and Daniel Lee in 1834, and the Methodist mission was soon reinforced until it was valued in a few years at a quarter of a million dollars and became the dominating factor in Oregon politics. The American Board Mission was founded by Dr. Marcus Whitman, a physician, and Mr. Spalding, a minister. With them was associated W. H. Gray as agent, the author of a History of Oregon which was responsible for the spread of a great deal of misinformation concerning the early missionary history of Oregon.

The savage murder of Dr. Whitman in 1847 was a great catastrophe. Dr. Whitman, who was a man of highly respected character, opened his mission among the Cayuse Indians near Fort Walla Walla. His position as physician made him suspected by the Indians when an epidemic carried off a large number of the tribe. They were accustomed to kill the 'medicine man' who failed to cure them. Besides the Indians were rendered hostile by the encroachments of the whites. The immediate cause of the massacre seems to have been the story of Jo Lewis, an Indian who had the friendship of the mission and who reported that he overheard a conversation of Whitman and Spalding, in which Whitman said he would kill off the Indians so that the whites could get their land. The massacre took place on 29 November. Dr. and Mrs. Whitman and several others were brutally slain. Spalding was saved only by the prudence of Father Brouillet whose mission was near by. Spalding seems to have been spared by the outrage. He began to charge the Catholic priest with instigating the massacre. There had been hard feelings before between the missionary forces, but now the embroils were fanned into a flame and, in spite of the fact that all serious historians have exonerated the Catholic missions of the slightest complicity in the outrage, Spalding's ravings instilled a prejudice which half a century has been required to obliterate.

Nearly twenty years after Whitman's death Spalding originated a new story of Whitman's services in saving Oregon to the United States, in which the Catholics were again brought into prominence. "History will be searched in vain," says Bourne, "for a more extraordinary growth of fame on the death of a man, than that of Whitman." The story as published in 1865 by Spalding represents that in autumn, 1842, Whitman was aroused by discovering that the Hudson's Bay Co. and the Catholic mission..."}

Freedom of Worship is provided for in the Bill of Rights in the Oregon Constitution. By its provisions all persons are secured in their "natural right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their own consciences. No law shall in any case control the free exercise and enjoyment of religious opinion. No religious test shall be required as a qualification for any office of trust or profit. No money shall be drawn from the treasury for the benefit of any religious or theological institution, nor shall money be appropriated for the payment of salaries to members of the houses of the legislative assembly. But by recent enactments the salaries of two chaplains, one a Catholic, the other a non-Catholic, for the State Penitentiary is provided for at the expense of the State. The Constitution further provides that no person shall be rendered incompetent as a witness or juror in consequence of his religious opinions, nor be questioned in any court of justice touching his religious belief to affect the weight of his testimony. Oaths and affirmations shall be such as are most consistent with and most binding upon the consciences of the persons to whom they are administered. No law shall be passed restraining freedom of speech or press. Persons shall not be compelled to do so in time of peace, but shall pay an equivalent for personal service.

There are many enactments regarding the observance of Sunday. The Sundays of the year as well as Christmas are legal and judicial holidays. No person may open a house or room in which liquor is retailed on Sunday—the penalty being a fine which goes to the school fund in the county in which the offence is committed. In general it is illegal to keep open on Sunday any establishment "for the purpose of labor or traffic", except drug stores, livery stables, butcher and bakery shops, etc.

The seal of the confessional is guarded by the following provision: "A priest or clergyman shall not, without the consent of the person making the confession, be examined as to any confession made to him in his professional character and enjoined upon him by the church to which he belongs."

Persons over eighteen years of age may dispose of goods and chattels by will. "A person of twenty-one years of age and upwards and of sound mind may by last will devise all his estate, real and personal, saving to the widow her dower." The will must be in writing. It must be signed by the testator or by some other person under his direction and in his presence, and also by two or more competent witnesses subscribing their names in presence of the testator.

Divorce.—The following grounds are recognised in Oregon for the dissolution of marriage: (1) Impotency existing at the time of the marriage and continuing to the time of suit. (2) Adultery. (3) Conviction of felony. (4) Habitual gross drunkenness contracted since marriage. (5) Willful desertion for one year. (6) Cruel and inhumane treatment or personal indignities rendering life burdensome. (Bellinger and Cotton, "Annotated Codes and Statutes of Oregon.")

Catholic Education.—One of the earliest cares of the Vicar-General Blanchet on arriving in Oregon was the Christian education of the youth committed to his charge. In autumn, 1843, it was decided to open a school for boys at St. Paul. On 17 October in that year, the vicar-general opened St. Joseph's College with solemn blessing and prayer, the pioneer Catholic Institute in the charge. On the opening day thirty boys entered as boarders—all sons of farmers except one, the son of an Indian chief. The first Catholic school for girls in Oregon was opened early in October, 1844, by six Sisters of Notre Dame de Namur who had just arrived from Belgium with Father De Smet. So immediate was the success of the sisters that Father De Smet writing under date of 9 Oct., 1844, says that another foundation was projected at Oregon City. This plan was not carried out until 1848. In September of that year four sisters took up their residence and opened a school at the Falls. Meanwhile two events occurred which paralyzed all missionary work for a decade. The first was the Whitman massacre already referred to, which aroused the interest and hostility of the Catholic missionaries. The second was the discovery of gold in California which for the time caused a large emigration of the male population from Oregon. This movement of the population deprived the Archdiocese of all religious, both men and women. In May, 1849, a large brigade composed of Catholic families from St. Paul, St. Louis, and Vancouver started for the California mines. As a consequence St. Joseph's College was permanently closed in June of the same year.

The Jesuit Fathers closed the mission of St. Francis Xavier on the Willamette; the Sisters of Notre Dame closed their school at St. Paul in 1852, and the following spring closed the school at Oregon City and left for California. The outlook was very dark. The tide of immigration soon turned again towards Oregon, but found the Church crippled in its educational and missionary work. The debt had been quadrupled in building the cathedral and convent at Oregon City. To raise funds Archbishop Blanchet went to South America in September, 1855, and remained there until the following spring until some of his debt was liquidated.

A new era opened for Catholic education in Oregon in Oct., 1859, when twelve Sisters of the Holy Names arrived from Montreal and opened at Portland St. Mary's Academy, which was the mother-house of the community in the province of Oregon has for half a century played a honourable part in the educational work of the north-west. In August, 1871, a school for boys, called St. Michael's College, was opened with 64 pupils. Its first principal was Father Glorieux, now Bishop of Boise. In 1875 we find the pupils publishing a college paper, "The Advocate." At the invitation of Archbishop Cross, the Christian Brothers took charge of St. Michael's College in 1886. The name was subsequently changed to that of Blanchet Institute in honour of the first archbishop. This school has since been superseded by the modern and ample structure of the Christian Brothers' Business College. In 1882 the Benedictine Fathers, at the invitation of Archbishop Seghers, established their community first at Gervais, and two years later at Mt. Angel. A college for young men at Mt. Angel was opened in 1888. The destruction of the monastery by fire in 1892 was the occasion of building the magnificent monastery and college in its present commanding position. While Mt. Angel, has been located primarily for the education of young men for the order, it has been the Alma Mater of a number of the priests of the archdiocese. In 1904 the priory was raised to the dignity of an abbey. At Mt. The Dominican Sisters (San Jose, California), the Sisters of the Immaculate Heart of Mary (Scranton, Penn.), the Sisters of Mercy, and the Sisters of St. Francis (Milwaukee) conduct a number of excellent schools in the archdiocese. About nine-tenths of the parishes of the archdiocese are provided with Catholic schools. An annual Catholic Teachers' Institute has been held under the auspices of the Catholic Educational Association of Oregon since 1905. These summer meetings have been very popular, and attended by all the teachers in the Catholic schools of the archdiocese. Prominent educators from various sections of the country are invited to address the institute. The meetings serve to promote interdiocesan ideas and a newer and fuller relationship between the teaching communities and contribute notably to the uniform educational progress of the schools.

Charitable Institutions.—The archdiocese is well equipped with institutions of charity. St. Vincent's Hospital, conducted by the Sisters of Charity of Providence, was established in Portland in 1874. It will accommodate about 350 patients. The Sisters of Charity conduct a hospital at Astoria. The Sisters of Mercy have charge of hospitals at Albany, North Bend, and Roseburg. The Sisters of the Good Shepherd have conducted a home for wayward girls in Portland since 1902. The judges of the juvenile court have repeatedly commended the work of these sisters in the highest terms. The archdiocese has three homes for dependent children. St. Agnes' Baby Home, conducted by the Sisters of Mercy, was established in 1901; it receives orphans and foundlings under the age of four years, and cares for them up to the age of ten years. St. Agnes' Industrial School, conducted by the Sisters of the Holy Names, was established in 1904; it receives the younger orphans up to the age of ten years, and instructs them in trades. The Catholic Home for Boys, situated near Beaverton and in the charge of the Sisters of St. Mary. Here too is the location of the Levi Anderson Industrial school for boys. Occupying a commanding site on the Willamette near Oregon City, an orphanage for the care of the children of the Sisters of the Holy Names. Since 1901 the Sisters of Mercy have conducted a home for dependent children. The Catholic Women's League of Portland was organized in the interests of young women wage-earners, especially those that very large proportion of young women who are forced to work have come west to find positions and are without homes. The proportion of Catholics to the entire population of Oregon is not very great, perhaps not more than one-tenth, though recent immigration has tended to increase the percentage. Catholics have, however, been well represented in public life and in professional and business pursuits. In early Oregon history Dr. McLaughlin and Chief Justice Peter Burnett were distinguished converts. The latter, who subsequently became first governor of California, is the author of "Reminiscences of an Old Pioneer" and "The Path which led a Protestant Lander to the Catholic Church." General Lane, the first Governor of Oregon, was also received into the church. Among the most distinguished citizens of the state to-day are ex-United States Senator John M. Gearin and General D. W. Burke.

EDWIN V. O'HARA.

O'Reilly, Bernard, historian, b. 29 Sept., 1820, in County Mayo, Ireland; d. in New York, U. S. A., 26 April, 1907. In early life he emigrated to Canada, where in 1836 he entered Laval University. He was ordained priest in Quebec, 12 Sept., 1843, and minis tered in several parishes of that diocese. He was one of the heroic priests who attended the plague-stricken Irish emigrants in the typhus-sheds along the St. Lawrence after the "black '47". Later he entered the Society of Jesus and was attached to St. John's College, Fordham, New York. When the Civil War broke out he went out as a chaplain in the Irish Brigade and served with the Army of the Potomac during a large part of its campaigns. He then withdrew from the Jesuits and devoted himself to literature, becoming one of the editorial staff of the "New American Cyclopedia" to which he contributed articles on Catholic topics. At the conclusion of this work he travelled extensively in Europe, sending for several years an interesting series of letters to the New York "Sun". He lived for a long period in Rome where Pope Leo XIII, besides appointing him a prothonotary Apostolic in 1887, gave him the special matutina for his "Life of Leo XIII" (New York, 1887). Among the many books he published these were notable: "Life of Pius IX" (1877); "Mirror of True Womanhood" (1876); "True Men" (1878); "Key of Heaven" (1878); "The Two Brides" (1879); "Life of Bishop of Tuam" (1890). On his return to New York from Europe he was made chaplain at the convent of Mount St. Vincent, where he spent the rest of his days. On the occasion of his sacerdotal jubilee he was given a signed testimonial of appreciation of his fellow priests and friends.

O'Reilly, Charles Joseph. See Baker City, Diocese of.

O'Reilly, Edmund, Archbishop of Armagh, b. at Dublin, 1616; d. at Saumur, France, 1669, was educated in Dublin and ordained there in 1629. After ordination he studied at Louvain, where he held the position of prefect of the college of Irish Secular Ecclesiastics. In 1640 he returned to Dublin and was appointed vicar-general. In 1642 the Archbishop of Dublin, Dr. Fleming, having been appointed by the Supreme Council of the Confederate Catholics, transferred his residence to Kilkenny and until 1648 O'Reilly administered the Archdiocese of Dublin. With the triumph of the Puritans he was imprisoned, and in 1653, ordered to quit the kingdom, he took refuge at the Irish College of Lisle where he was notified of his appointment to the See of Armagh, and shortly after consecrated at Brussels. Ireland was then a dangerous place for ecclesiastics, and not until 1658 did he attempt to visit his diocese; even then he could proceed no farther than London. Ordered to quit the kingdom, he returned to France, but in the following year went to Ireland to visit the College in France, and for the next two years exercised his ministry. Accused of favouring the Puritans and of being an enemy of the Stuarts, he was ordered by the pope to quit Ireland. At Rome he wrote to the pope himself, but he was not allowed to return to Ireland by the English authorities until 1665, and then only in the hope that he would favour the Remonstrance of Peter Walsh. O'Reilly, like the great majority of the Irish bishops and priests, rejected the Canons of 1609: died in his diocese, 80; priests of regular orders, 40; colleges, 3; secondary schools, 12; elementary schools, 35; pupils, 5500.

Orense, invitation to pray, said before collect and other short prayers and occurring continually in the Roman Rite. It is used as a single ejaculation in the Roman Rite, Cahainte, "Eastern Liturgies", Oxford, 1865, 235, etc; Jacobite, ib., 75, 90, etc., or the imperitive: "Pray" (Colptic, ib. 162). "Stand for prayer" (ib., 159) is most commonly, however, with a further determination, "Let us pray to the Lord" (2 Cor. xvin bhenos), throughout the Byzantine Rite, and so on. Mgr Duchesne thinks that the Gallican collects were also introduced by the word Orense "Origines du Culte", Paris, 1896, 103). It is not so in the Monarabic Rite, where the celebrant uses the word only twice, before the Agios (P. L., LXXXV, 113) and Peter Noster (ib., 118). Orence is said (or sung) in the Roman Rite before all separate collects in the Mass, Office, or on other occasions (but several collects may be joined with one Orense), before Post-Communions; in the same way, alone, with no prayer following, before the offertory; also before the fourfold prayer, after the Pater Noster and before other ad orientem prayers (e.g., A After a nobia in the form of collects. It appears that the Orense did not originally apply to the prayer (collect) that now follows it. It is thought that it was once an invitation to private prayer, very likely with further direction as to the object, now on Good Friday (Orense pro ecclesia sancta Dei, etc.). The deacon then said: Plantamus genua, and all knelt in silent prayer. After a time the people were told to stand up (Lexite), and finally the celebrant collected all the petitions in one short sentence said aloud (see Collect). Of all this our Orense followed at once by the collect would be a fragment.

Orense, Diocese of (Aurelianum), suffragan of Compostela, includes nearly all of the civil Province of Orense, and part of those of Lugo and Zamora, being dependent on the Archdiocese of Santiago de Compostela. Lugo, and Pontevedra, Lugo, and Pontevedra, on the north by Leon and Zamora; on the south by Portugal; on the west by Portugal and Pontevedra. Its capital, Orense (pop., 1,481), is a very ancient city. The banks of its river Minho, famous in classical antiquity for its hot springs. The See of Orense dates from a remote period, certainly before the 4th century. The first Council of Braga, 361, created four dioceses, the bishops of which afterwards passed to the see of the Archdiocese of Braga and the Bishop of Orense— indication that they were of distinct founding. Moreover, the bishops of the Diocese of Tui and Aneza, two very ancient Churches, had already begun, about the time of St. Martin, to build churches. In the 5th century, bishops. Pastor and Sigarja are consecrated in the consecration of St. Martin in Lugo in 332, and one of them it is not known who was a Bishop of Orense. In 455, the Scirata, Bishop of Orense, embraced Arianism and only in the time of King Cil邊an in 560 were they reconciled to Catholicism. St. Gregory of Tours tells us that the Galicians embraced the Faith with remarkable fervor. The conversion and instruction of both kings and people appear to have been completed by St. Martin of Dumussa. The names of the bishops of Orense are unknown until 571, when the see was governed by Maximus, a man of noble Scirata family, who assisted at the Second Council of Braga. He was an intimate friend of St. Martin of Braga, who dedicated to him as his "most dear father in Christ" his treatise "De ira". In 716 Orense was destroyed by Abaliari, son of Mumia. In 832 Alfonso II combined the two dioceses of Ourense and Lugo: Orense, nevertheless, appears to have retained its titular bishops, for a charter of Alfonso the Chaste is witnessed by Mayor de Orense, and the Bishop of Orense, when Alfonso III (960-99) had reconquered Orense, gave it to Bishop Sebastian, who had been Bishop of Arcobica in Cetiberia and was succeeded by Censorius, Summa T. 666, and Epila (939), who took an active part in the consecration of the church of St. George in Oviedo. In the episcopacy of Ansuration (915-22), the holy abbot Franquina (906) erected the Benedictine monastery of S. Esteban de Ribas del Sil (St. Stephen on the Sil), where Ansuration himself and eight of his successors died in the odour of sanctity.

At the end of the tenth century the diocese was laid waste, first by the Normans (970) and then by Almanzor, after which it was committed to the care of the Bishop of Lugo until 1071, when, after a vacancy of seventy years, Sancho II appointed Eronorio to the see. Eronorio rebuilt the old cathedral called S. Maria la Madre (1084-89). The most famous bishop of this period was Diego Velasco, under whose episcopate he called "jumlah of the Church and glory of his country". He assisted at a council of Palencia and three councils of Toledo, and, with the consent of Doria Huesca, appointed to the see of Piers, Son Alfonso, granted privileges (fueros) to Orense. He ruled for thirty years and was succeeded by Martin (1152-76) and Pedro Segula. The latter was consecrated to Ferdinand II, who granted him the lordship of Orense. Bishop Lorenzo was the jurist whom Turcomen called the "pattern of the law" (regula del derecho); he rebuilt the cathedral and the bishop's palace, and constructed the famous bridge of Orense, with its principal arch spanning more than 130 feet. He assisted at the Council of Lyons in 1245. Vasco de Novar quarrelled with the Franciscans, while he was precentor, and burned their convent, which had sheltered one of his enemies, but, having become bishop, he rebuilt it magnificently. Vasco Perez Maridado (1333-43) was distinguished for his devotion to the "Holy Christ of Orense", which he caused to be transferred from Finisterre to Orense and built for it a beautiful chapel, modified in subsequent periods. Other distinguished occupants of this see were Cardinal Juan de Torquemada, a Dominican, who assisted at the Council of Constance and Basel; Diego de Ermesena (1471-84), who repaired the cathedral; Cardinals Antoniotto Pallavicino and Pedro de Ivalles, and the inquisitor general Fernando Valdés. Francisco Blanco founded the Jesuit colleges at Malaga and Compostela, and endowed that at Monterey. The the remaining years of his life in France, chiefly concerned with the care of the Irish colleges there.

O’REILLY, EDMUND, theologian, b. in London, 30 April, 1811; d. at Dublin, 10 November, 1878. Educated at Clongowes and Maynooth, he made his theological studies at Rome, where after seven years in the Pontifical College he gained the degree of Doctor of Divinity by a “public act” de universa theologia. After his ordination in 1838 he taught theology for thirteen years at Maynooth into which he was mainly instrumental in introducing the Roman spirit and tradition, after which he entered the Jesuit novitiate at Naples. He taught theology for some years at St. Beuno’s College in North Wales till he was appointed Professor of Theology under Newman in the Catholic University of Ireland. During the remainder of his life he resided at Milltown Park near Dublin as rector of a House of Spiritual Exercises; and he was Provincial of Ireland 1863–70. Constantly consulted on theological questions by the bishops and priests of Ireland, Cardinal Newman in his famous “Letter to the Duke of Norfolk” calls him “a great authority” and “one of the first theologians of the day.” Dr. W. G. Ward, editor of “The Dublin Review,” said: “It is a great loss to the Church that so distinguished a theologian as Father O’Reilly has published so little.” Dr. Ward wrote of his chief work, “The Relations of the Church to Society,” “Whatever is written by so able and so solidly learned a theologian, one so docile to the Church and so fixed in the ancient theological paths, cannot but be of signal benefit to the Catholic reader in these anxious and perilous times.”

MATTHEW RUSSELL.

O’REILLY, HUGH, Archbishop of Armagh, head of the Confederates of Kilkenny, b. 1580; d. on Trinity Island in Lough Erne. He first conceived the idea of forming this national movement into a regular organization. He convened a provincial synod at Kells early in March, 1642, in which the bishops declared the war undertaken by the Irish people for their king, religion, and country to be just and lawful. The following May (1642) he convened a national synod, consisting of prelates and civil lords, at Kilkenny. After having ratified their former declaration, they framed an oath of association to be taken by all their adherents, binding them to maintain the fundamental laws of Ireland, the free exercise of religion, and true allegiance to Charles I. Orders were issued to levy men and raise money; to establish a mint and an official printing press; to take the duty off such foreign imports as wheat and corn, lead, iron, arms and ammunition; the bishops and clergy should pay a certain sum for national purposes out of the ecclesiastical revenues that had come back into their possession; and agents should be sent to Catholic courts to solicit aid. They gave letters of credit and chartered some light vessels that were to fly the Confederate colours and protect the coast, and they drafted a remonstrance to the king declaring their loyalty and protesting against the acts of tyranny, injustice, and intolerance of the Puritan lord justices and Parliament of Dublin in confiscating Catholic lands and putting a ban on Catholic school-teachers. The assembly lasted until 9 January, agreeing to meet 20 May following. The seal of the Confederation bore in its centre a large cross rising out of a flaming heart, above were the wings of a dove, on the left a harp, and on the right a crown; the legend read: PRO DEO, REGE, ET PATRIA, HIBERNI UNAMNES.

Wherever the primate’s partisans commanded, the Protestant bishops, ministers, and people were safe, and were even protected in the exercise of their own religious worship. Archbishop O’Reilly was, throughout the war and the terrible years that followed it, the soul and guide of the national party; he did his utmost to restrain the violence of the people, who would have wreaked vengeance on their persecutors had they been left to their own instincts at that crisis. He urged Sir Phelim O’Neile and Lord Iveagh to keep the armed multitudes in check and prevent the massacre and pillage of Protestants. Such salutary restraint produced the most happy results, for even the rudest of the northern chieftains respected him too much to violate his lessons of forbearance and charity. When the great chieftain, Owen Roe, was dying, he had himself taken to Ballinacory Castle, the residence of his brother-in-law Philip O'Reilly, where he was addressed by Archbishop O'Reilly. Local tradition gives the ruined Abbey of the Holy Trinity, on an island a few miles from Ballinacory Castle, as his last resting-place. In the same locality Archbishop O'Reilly was buried. The primate’s signature is still to be seen in most of the manifestoes of the Confederation of Kilkenny as “Hugo Armachanius, Primas et Archiepiscopus.”

O’REILLY, JOHN. See Adelaide, Archdiocese of.

O’REILLY, JOHN BOYLE, poet, novelist, and editor, b. at Douth Castle, Drogheda, Ireland, 24 June, 1844; d. at Hull, Massachusetts, 10 August, 1890; second son of William David O’Reilly and Eliza Boyle. He attended the National School, conducted by his father, and was employed successively as printer on the “Drogheda Argus,” and on the staff of “The Guardian,” Preston, England; he afterwards became a trooper in the Tenth Hussars. Entering actively into the Fenian movement, believing in his inexperience that Ireland’s grievances could be redressed only by physical force, he was betrayed to the authorities and duly court-martialled. On account of his extreme youth, his life sentence was commuted to twenty years’ penal servitude in Australia. Later study of his country’s cause made him before long an earnest advocate of constitutional agitation as the only way to Irish Home Rule. In 1869, O’Reilly escaped from Australia, with the assistance of the captain of a whaling barque from New Bedford, Massachusetts. In 1870, he became editor of “The Pilot,” Boston. From 1845 to 1890 until his death in 1890 he was also part proprietor, being associated with Archbishop Williams of Boston. His books include four volumes of poems: “Songs of the Southern Seas,” “Songs, Legends, and Ballads,” “The Statues in the Block,” and “In Bohemia”; a novel, “Moonrasy,” based on his Australian experiences; his collaboration in another novel, “The King’s Men,” and “Athletics and Manly Sport.” A sincere Catholic, his great influence, used lavishly in forwarding the interests of younger Catholic destined to special careers, and in lifting up the lowly without regard to any claim but their need, was for twenty years a valuable factor in Catholic progress. He was married in 1872 to Mary Murphy, in Boston, who died in 1897. Their four daughters survive them.

KATHERINE E. CONWAY.
Oresme, philosopher, economist, mathematician, and physicist, one of the principal founders of modern science, was born at Bayeux in 1320. After studies at Orléans and Paris, he was appointed to the Chair of Mathematics at the University of Paris in 1358. He was later made rector of the university and held various important positions, including that of royal mathematician to King Charles V of France. Oresme is known for his contributions to the development of the calculus, his work on the nature of numbers, and his discussions on the nature of time and motion.

In the late thirteenth and early fourteenth centuries, Oresme's work on the nature of time and motion was highly influential. He developed a theory of uniform motion, which he used to explain the motion of celestial bodies. Oresme's work on the nature of numbers was also groundbreaking, as he was one of the first to use the concept of infinity in mathematical calculations.

The text continues to discuss Oresme's contributions to mathematics and natural philosophy, highlighting his influence on later thinkers such as Galileo and Descartes. The text concludes by noting the importance of Oresme's work in the development of modern science and mathematics.
contemporary, Albert de Saxo (see Saxe, Albert DE).
In opposition to the Aristotelian theory of weight, according to which the natural location of heavy bodies is the centre of the world, and that of light bodies the concavity of the moon's orb, he proposes the following: The elements tend to dispose themselves in such manner that, from the centre to the periphery their specific weight diminishes by degrees. He thinks that a similar rule may exist in worlds other than this. This is the doctrine later substituted for the Aristotelian by Copernicus and his followers, such as Giordano Bruno. The latter argued in a manner so similar to Oresme's that it would seem he had read the "Traité du ciel et du monde". But Oresme had a much stronger claim to be regarded as the precursor of Copernicus when one considers what he says of the diurnal motion of the earth, to which he devotes the gloss following chapters xxiv and xxv of the "Traité du ciel et du monde". He begins by establishing that no experiment can decide whether the heavens move from east to west or the earth from west to east; for sensible experience can never establish more than relative motion. He then shows that the reasons proposed by the physics of Aristotle against the movement of the earth are not valid; he points out, in particular, the principle of the solution of the difficulty drawn from the movement of projectiles. Next he refutes the objections based on texts of Holy Scripture, such as in interpreting these passages he lays down rules universally followed by Catholic exegists of the present day. Finally, he adds the argument of simplicity for the theory that the earth moves, and not the heavens. This argument: through height the earth's motion is both more explicit and much clearer than that given by Copernicus.

ORGAN (Greek ὄργανον, "an instrument"), a musical instrument which consists of one or several sets of pipes, each pipe giving one tone, and which is blown and played by mechanical means. I. ORGAN AND DEVELOPMENT.—As far as the sounding material is concerned, the organ has its prototype in the syrinx, or Pan's pipe, a little instrument consisting of several pipes of differing length tied together in a row. The application of the mechanism is credited to Ctesibius, a mechanic who lived in Alexandria about 300 B.C. According to descriptions by Vitruvius (who is now generally believed to have written about A.D. 60) and Heron (somewhat later than Vitruvius), the organ of Ctesibius was an instrument of such perfection that it was not attained again until the eighteenth century. The blowing apparatus designed by Ctesibius consisted of two parts, just as in the modern organ; the first serving to compress the air (the "feeders"); the second, to store the compressed air, the "wind", and keep it under uniform pressure (the "reservoir"). With the first purpose Ctesibius used air-pumps fitted with handles for convenient working. The second, the most interesting part of his invention, was constructed as follows: a bell-shaped vessel was placed in a broad basin, mouth downwards, supported a couple of inches above the bottom of the basin by a few blocks. Into the basin water was then poured until it rose some distance above the mouth of the bell. Tubes connecting with the air-pumps, and as others connecting with the pipes of the organ, were fitted into the top of the bell. When, therefore, the air-pumps were worked, the air inside the bell was compressed and pushed out some of the water below. The level of the water consequently rose and kept the air inside compressed. Any wind taken from the bell to supply the pipes would naturally have a tendency to raise the level of the water in the bell itself. But if the supply from the air-pumps was kept slightly in excess of the demand by the pipes, so that some of the air would always escape through the water in bubbles, a very even pressure would be maintained. This is what was actually done, and the bubbling of the water, sometimes described as "boiling", was always prominent in the accounts given of the instrument.

Over the basin there was placed a flat box containing a number of channels corresponding to the number of rows of pipes. Vitruvius speaks of organs having four, six, or eight rows of pipes, with as many channels. Each channel was supplied with wind from the bell by a connecting tube, a cock being inserted in each tube to cut off the wind at will. Over the box containing the channels an upper-board was placed, on the lower side of which small grooves were cut at right angles to the channels. In the grooves close-fitting "sliders" were inserted, which could be moved in and out. At the intersections of channels and grooves, holes were cut vertically through the upper board, and, correspondingly, through the lower board. The pipes, then, stood over the holes of the upper-board, each row, representing a scale-like progression, standing over its own channel, and all the pipes belonging to the same key, standing over the same groove. The sliders also were perforated, their holes corresponding to those in the upper board and the roof of the channels. When, therefore, the slider was so placed that its holes were in line with the lower and upper holes, the wind could pass through the three holes into the pipe above; but if the slider was drawn out a little, its solid portions would cut off the connection between the holes in the roof of the channels and those in the upper-board, and no wind could pass. There was thus a double control of the pipes. By means of the cocks, wind could be admitted to any one of the channels, and thus supply all the pipes standing over that channel, but only one row of pipes. When the wind whose slide was in the proper position. Again, by means of the slide, wind could be admitted to all the pipes standing in a transverse row, but only those pipes would be blown to whose channels wind had been admitted by the cocks. This double control is still a leading principle in modern organ-building, and a row of pipes, differing in pitch, but having the same quality of tone, is called a stop, because its wind supply can be stopped by one action. It is not quite certain what the stops in the ancient organ meant. It is very unlikely that different stops produced different qualities of tone, as in the modern organ. Most probably they represented different "modes". For the convenient management of the stops each was provided with an angular lever, so that on pressing one arm of the lever, the slide was pushed in; the lever being released, the slide was pulled out again by a spring.

This organ, called hydraulis, or organum hydraulicum, from the water used in the blowing apparatus, enjoyed with air-pumps, as well as others connecting with the pipes called contemporaries, also testify to its general repute. At an early period we meet organs in which the air pumps were replaced by bellows. Whether, in these organs when the water apparatus was dispensed with, is not quite certain. It would be strange, however, if this important means of regulating the wind pressure had been discontinued while the hydraulicum was still in vogue. About the sixth century organ-building seems to have gone down in Western Europe, while it was carried on in the East. The peculiarity was that, instead of pipes, all the reeds were, when, in 757, the Emperor Constantine V Copronymus made a present of an organ to King Pepin. In 925 a Venetian priest named Gregory erected an organ in the Church of San Zaccaria, possibly the first to be left by Vitruvius. Shortly afterwards organ-building seems to have flourished in Germany, for we are told (Baluz., "Misc.," V, 490), that Pope John VIII (872-88) asked Azno, Bishop of Freising, to send him a good organ and an organist. By this time the hydraulic apparatus for equalizing the wind-pressure had certainly been abandoned, presumably because in northern climates the water might freeze in winter time. The wind, therefore, was supplied to the pipes directly from the bellows. To get anything like a regular flow of wind, it was necessary to have a number of bellows worked by several men. Thus, an organ in Winchester, England, built in 1491 and containing 900 pipes had twenty-six bellows, which it took seventy men to blow. These seventy men evidently worked in relays. In all probability one man would work one bellows, but this was no exhaustible source of power, for each man could continue only for a short time. The bellows were pressed down either by means of a handle or by the blower standing on them. It seems that the device of weighing the bellows—so that the blower had merely to lean on them to make the pipes go—was used. This was the same system as that employed in modern organs, where the bellows are raised through a slit covered by a valve (pellet) the valve being pulled down and opened by the key action, and closed again by a spring. Such an arrangement is found in some remnants of the fourteenth century in Sweden, which have been described by C. F. Hemmerberg in a paper read at the International Musical Congress at Vienna in 1908 ("Bericht," 91 sqq., Vienna and Leipzig, 1909). It seems that organs were not reintroduced until the sixteenth century. The form then used for a stop action was that of a "spring." As the sixteenth century went on, the slider for the key action had been discontinued, and channels (grooves) had been used, as in the ancient hydraulum, but running transversely, each under a row of pipes belonging to the same key. Into these pipes the wind was admitted through a slit covered by the valve, which was held open by the pressure of the wind, and closed by a spring. Such an arrangement is found in some remnants of the fourteenth century, and Hemmerberg (loc. cit.) states that in these grooves, then, about the fifteenth century, secondary stops were inserted, one under each hole leading to a pipe. From one of these secondary valves a string led to one of a number of rods running longitudinally under the sound-board, one for each set of pipes corresponding to a stop. By depressing this rod, all the secondary valves belonging to the corresponding stop would be opened, and the wind could enter the pipes as soon as it was admitted into the grooves by the key action. Later on it was found more convenient to push these valves down than to open them. Small rods were made to pass through the top of the sound-board and to rest on the front end of the valves. These rods could be depressed, so as to open the valves, by the stop-rod running over the sound-board. From these secondary valves the whole arrangement received the name "spring-box." The spring-box solved the problem in principle, but had the drawback of necessitating frequent repairs. Hence, from the sixteenth century onwards, organ-builders began to use sliders for the stop action. Thus the double control of the pipes by means of channel and slide was again used as in the hydraulum, but with exchanged functions, the channel now serving for the action and the slider for the stop action. In modern times some builders have returned to the ancient method of using the channel longitudinally, for the stops (Ogellade and similar contrivances; pneumatic sound-boards). Mention should also be made of attempts to do away with the channels altogether, to have all the pipes supplied directly from a universal wind-cabinet, and to bring about the double control of key and stop action by the mechanism alone. Each pipe hole is then provided with a special valve, and key and stop mechanism are so arranged that only their combined action will open the valve. Shortly after the stop-action had been reintroduced, builders began to design varieties of stops. The earlier pipes... had been all of our open diapason kind, which in principle is the same as the toy-whistle. These were now made in different "scaled" (scale being the ratio of diameter to length). Also, the form of a cone, upright or inverted, replaced the cylindrical form. Stopped pipes—that is, pipes closed at the top—were added, and reeds—pipes with a "blowing" reed and a body like the "flue" pipes—were introduced. Thus, by the sixteenth century all the main types now used had been invented.

The keys in the early medieval organs were not, it seems, levers, as in the ancient organ and modern instruments, but simply the projecting ends of the slides, being, presumably, furnished with some simple device making it convenient for the fingers to push in or pull out the sliders. The invention of key-levers is generally placed in the twelfth century. These were for a long time placed exactly opposite their sliders. When, therefore, larger pipes began to be placed on the sound-board, the distances between the centres of the keys had to be widened. Thus we are told that organs had keys from three to five inches wide. This inconvenience was overcome by the invention of the roller-board, which is placed in the fourteenth century. The rollers are rods placed longitudinally under the soundboard and pivoted. From each two short arms project horizontally, one being placed over a key, the other under the corresponding slider or valve. Thus the length of the key-board became independent of the length of the sound-board. Consequently we learn that in the fifteenth century the keys were so reduced in size that a hand could span the interval of a fourth in the beginning and the sixteenth, the key-board had about the size it has at present.

The number of keys in the early organs was small: only about one or two octaves of natural keys with a stop of the addition of b flat. Slowly the number of keys was increased, and in the fourteenth century we hear of key-boards having thirty-one keys. In the same century chromatic notes other than b flat began to be added. The invention of tuning involved a certain amount of trouble. Various systems were devised, and it was not till the eighteenth century, through the powerful influence of J. S. Bach, that equal temperament was adopted. This consists in tuning in fifths and octaves, making each fifth slightly flat so that the 12th fifth will give a perfect octave. About the beginning of the sixteenth century the lower limit of the key-boards began to be fixed on the Continent at G. This is in line with the later decision of the more advanced national schools to give a firm base voice and requires an open pipe of about 8 feet in length.

In England organ key-boards were generally carried down to the G or F below that C, and only about the middle of the nineteenth century did the continental usage prevail here also. The total compass of the manuals now varies from four and a half to five octaves, that of the pedals from two octaves and three notes to two octaves and six notes (C to G of C). In 1712 it occurred to a London organ-builder named Jordan to place one manual department of the organ in a box fitted with shutters which could be opened or closed by a foot-worked lever, a kind of crescendo or decrescendo being thus obtained. This device, which received the name of swell, soon became popular in England, while in Germany it found favour only quite recently.

We have seen, all through the Middle Ages the blowing apparatus consisted of bellows which delivered the wind directly to the sound-board. It was only in the eighteenth century that two sets of bellows were employed, one to supply the wind, the other to store it and keep it at even pressure. Thus, after an interval of about a thousand years, the blowing apparatus regained the perfection it had possessed in the hydraulics during the preceding thousand years. In 1760 Pelletier introduced the "square" or "square chamber" bellows, serving as a reservoir, and supplied by other bellows called "feeders." The feeders are generally worked by levers operated either by hand or foot. In quite recent times machinery has been applied to supersede the human blower, hydraulic, or gas, or oil engines, or electromotors being used. The difficulty of regulating the supply is easily overcome in the case of hydraulies, which can be made to go slowly or fast as required. But it is serious in the case of the other engines. Gas and oil engines must always go at the same speed, and even with electromotors a control of their speed is awkward. Hence, nowadays, bellows serving as feeders are frequently superseded by centrifugal fans, which can go at their full speed without delivering wind. It is sufficient, therefore, to fit an automatic valve to the reservoir, which will close when the reservoir is full, and not let wind in. This drawback in the fans: that to produce a pressure as required in modern organs, they must go at a high speed which is apt to produce a disturbing noise. To obviate this difficulty several fans are arranged in series, the first raising the wind only to a slight pressure and so delivering it to a second fan, which delivers it at an increased pressure to the next, and so on, until the requisite pressure is attained by a practically noiseless process.

A genuine revolution in the building of organs was brought about by the invention of the pneumatic lever. Up to the twelfth century, it appears, the "touch" (or key-resistance) was fixed, so that the length of the key-board could be played with the fingers (see an article by Schubiger in "Monatshefte für Musikgeschichte," I., No. 9). Later on, possibly with the change to the pipe groove and pallet system, it became heavier, so that the keys had to be pushed down by the fists. With improvement in the mechanism a lighter touch was secured again, so that playing with the fingers became possible after the fifteenth century. Still, however, the wind-pressure which has to be overcome in opening the valve becomes so great that it taxes the power of the organist's fingers unduly. This difficulty is increased when couplers are used, as the finger then has to open two or more valves at the same time. To overcome this difficulty, Barker, an Englishman, in 1832, thought of using the power of the wind itself as an intermediate agent, and he induced the French organ-builder Cavaille-Coll to adopt his idea in an organ erected in 1841. The device consists in this: that the key, by opening a small valve, admits the wind into a bellows which acts as motor and pulls down the pallet. Once this appliance was thoroughly appreciated, the way was opened to dispense altogether with the mechanism that connects the key with the pallet (or the draw-stop knob with the slider), and to put in its stead tubular-pneumatic or electro-pneumatic action. In the former the key opens a very small valve which admits the wind into a tube of small diameter; the wind, travelling through the tube in the form of a compression wave, opens, at the far end, another small valve controlling the motor bellows that opens the pallet. In the electro-pneumatic action the key makes an electric contact, causing the electric current to energize, at the organ end, an electro-magnet which, by its armature, causes a flow of wind and thus operates on a pneumatic lever.
had been in use before the pneumatic lever. They were now often replaced by small pistons placed conveniently for the hands. These pistons are sometimes so designed as not to interfere with the arrangement of stops worked by hand; sometimes they are made "adjustable"—that is, so contrived as to draw any combination of stops which the player may previously arrange. Attempts have been made to arrange individual stops playable from several manuals. This is a great advantage, but, on the other hand, it implies inaccessible mechanism. Casse's "Octave-duplication" avoids this objection. While, by making a whole manual playable in octave pitch, it considerably increases the variety of tone obtainable from a given number of stops.

A special difficulty in organ-playing is the manipulation of the pedal stops. On the manuals quick changes of strength and quality can be obtained by passing from one key-board to another. But, as only one pedal-keyboard is feasible, similar changes on the pedals can only be made by change of stops. Hence special facilities are here particularly desirable. Casse's invention, in 1569, of "pedal-helps"—little levers, or pistons, one for each manual, which make the pedal stops adjust themselves automatically to all changes of stops on the corresponding manual—is the most satisfactory solution of this difficulty.

II. FAMOUS ORGAN BUILDER.—Cresibius, the inventor of the hydrualic organ, was a Venetian. G. Giacomo, who built the first organ north of the Alps, have already been mentioned. It is interesting to find a pope among the organbuilders of history: Sylvester II (904-924), who seems to have built a hydraulic organ (Pretorius, "Syntagma Musicae," ii. 92). We may also record here the first instructions on organ-building since the time of Vitruvius and Heron, contained in a work, "Diversarum artium schedulae," by Theophilus, a monk, who seems to have written before 1100 (Degering, "Die Orgel," p. 65). After this names are scarce until the thirteenth century. Then we hear in Germany of a large organ in Cologne cathedral, built, probably, by one Johann, while the builders of famous organs in Erfurt Cathedral (1225) and in St. Peter's near Erfurt (1229) are not known. A Master Guencelin of Frankfort built a large organ for Strasbourg cathedral in 1292, and a Master Raspe, also of Frankfort, probably built one for Basle cathedral in 1303. The famous organ at Halberstadt, with four keyboards, was built between 1359 and 1361 by Nicholas Faber, a priest. Of the fifteenth century we mention: Stefan of Breslau, who built an organ for Erfurt cathedral in 1453. In the sixteenth century Gregorius Vogel was famous for the beauty and variety of tone of his stops. In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries the Silbermann family were renowned. The first of them to take up organ-building was Andreas Silbermann (1678-1733); his brother Gottfried (1683-1763), the most famous organ-builder in the family, was also one of the first to build pianofortes. Three sons of Andreas continued the work of their father and uncle: Johann Andreas (1712-83), Johann Daniel (1717-1796), and Johann Heinrich (1727-1799), the last two building many pianofortes. In a third generation we meet Johann Josias (d. 1794), a son of Johann Andreas, and Johann Friedrich (1762-1817), a son of Johann Heinrich. In the nineteenth century we may mention Mayer, who, about 1840, built a large organ for Freiburg in Switzerland, where they imitate thunder-storms; Schulte of Paulinzelle, Ladegast of Weisenskell, Waleker of Ludwigsburg, Mauracher of Graz, Mayer of Frankfurt-on-the-Oder, Weigle of Stuttgart, Elbing of Aachen.

In England we hear in the fourteenth century of John the Organer and of Walter the Organer, who was also a clock-maker. From the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries the names of a large number of organ-builders are transmitted to us, showing organ-building was in a flourishing condition, but the Puritans destroyed most organs, and organ-builders almost disappeared. When organ-building was taken up again, in 1660, there was a scarcity of competent builders, and Bernard Schmidt, with his two nephews Gerard and Bernard, came over from Germany. Bernard the elder was commonly known as Father Smith, to distinguish him from his nephew. A son of Thomas Harris of Salisbury, who had been working in France, returned to England. His son, Renatus, became the principal rival of Father Smith. In the following century there was a scarcity of competent builders, and Birkhead of Clitheroe (1710-1780) settled in England and became famous for the quality of his organ pipes. His business eventually became that of W. Hill and Son, London. In the nineteenth century the most prominent organ-builder was Henry Willis (1821-1901), who designed several ingenious forms of pneumatic actions and brought the intonations of reeds to great perfection. Mention should also be made of R. Hope-Jones of Birkenhead, whose electro-pneumatic action marked a great step forward.

In Italy the Antegnati family were prominent during the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. Bartolomeo Antegnati built an organ in Brescia cathedral in 1546 for Brescica a choir organ which was famous in its time. Grazioso, a son of G. Battista, built a new large organ for Brescia in 1580. His son Costanzo (b. 1657) was an organist and a composer renowned. In the preface to a collection of his works (1686) he lists 135 organs built by members of his family (cf. Damiano Muoio, "Elgi Antengati", Milan, 1883). Vincenzo Columbi built a fine organ for St. John Lateran in 1549. In France we hear of an organ in the Abbey of Fécamp in the twelfth century. In the eighteenth century a well-known organ-builder was Jean-Nicolas le Ferre, who, in 1761, built an organ of 81 stops in Paris. More famous is Don Bosco, who died (1741-97), who also wrote an important book, "L'art du facteur d'orgues" (Paris, 1766-73). In the nineteenth century a renowned firm was that of Dublaire & Co., founded 1828; in 1845 it became Ducommet & Co. and sent an organ to the London Exhibition of 1851; in 1855 it changed its name again to Merklin, Schütte & Co. and erected some of the earliest electro-pneumatic organs. The most famous builder of modern times, however, was Aristide Cavaillé-Coll (1811-99), a descendant of an old organ-building family, mentioned above in connection with Biber's invention of the pneumatic lever, who was also highly esteemed for the intonation of his reeds.

In America the first organ erected was imported from Europe in 1713 for Queen's Chapel, Boston. It was followed by several others, likewise imported. In 1745 Edward Broomfield of Boston built the first organ in America. More famous was W. M. Goodrich, who began business in the same city in 1800. The best known of American organ builders is Hilborne L. Roosevelt of New York, who, with his son Frank, has effected many bold improvements in organ building. In 1894 John Ternull Austin patented his "universal air-chest," an air-chest large enough to admit a man for repairs and containing all the mechanism, as well as the magazine for storing the wind and keeping it at equal pressure (Mathews, "A Handbook of the Organ").

III. THE ORGAN IN CHURCH SERVICE.—In the early centuries the objection of the Church to instrumental music applied also to the organ. But, as we have seen, if we remember the association of the hydrualics with theatre and circus. According to Platina ("De vitis Pontificum", Colonne, 1593), Pope Vitalian (657-73) introduced the organ into the church service. This, however, is very doubtful. At all events, a strong obejection to the organ in church service remained pretty general down to the twelfth century, which may be accounted for partly by the imperfection of tone in organs of that time. But from the twelfth century on, the organ became the privileged church instrument, the majesty and unimpassioned character of its tone making it a particularly suitable means for adding solemnity to Divine worship. Devoted to the divine meditation, organ music is allowed on all joyful occasions, both for purely instrumental pieces (voluntaries) and as accompaniment. The organ alone may even take the place of the voices in alternate verset of Mass, at least in the Office, provided the text so treated be recited by someone in an audible voice while the organ is played. Only the Credo is excepted from this treatment, and in any case the first verse of each chant and all the verses at which any liturgical action takes place—such as the "Te ergo quæsumus", the "Tantum ergo", the "Gloria Patri"—should be sung.

With some exceptions, the organ is not to be played during Advent and Lent. It may be played on the Third Sunday in Advent (Gaudete) and the Fourth in Lent (Lentare) at Mass and Vespers, on Holy Thursdays at the Gloria, and on Holy Saturday and, according to general usage, after Mass even on Holy Friday, for it may be played, even in Advent and Lent, on solemn feasts of the saints and on the occasion of any joyful celebration—as e.g. the Communion of children [S. R. C., 41 May, 1786 (1736)]. Moreover, in a kind of indulg., it would seem, the organ is admitted, even in Lent and Advent, to support the singing of the choir, but in this case it must cease with the singing.

This permission, however, does not extend to the three days of Holy Week (S. R. C., 20 March, 1903, 4009). At Offices of the Dead organ music is excluded; at a Requiem Mass, however, it may be used for the anthem.

It is appropriate to play the organ at the beginning and end of Mass, especially when a bishop solemnly enters or leaves the church. If the organ is played during the Elevation, it should be in a softer tone; but it would seem that absolute silence is most fitting for this august moment. The same may be said about the act of Benediction with the Blessed Sacrament. It should be observed that the legislation of the Church concerns itself only with liturgical services. It takes no account of such things as singing at low Mass or popular devotions. But it is fitting, of course, to observe on such occasions the directions given for liturgical services.

IV. ORGAN-PLAYING.—In ancient times and in the early Middle Ages organ-playing was, of course, confined to rendering a melody on the organ. But it is not improbable that the earliest attempts at polyphonic music, from about the ninth century on, were made with the organ, seeing that these attempts received the name of organum. From the thirteenth century some compositions have come down to us under that name without any text, and probably intended for the organ. In the fourteenth century we hear of a celebrated organ-player, the blind musician Francesco Landino of Florence, and in the fifteenth of another Florentine player, Squarcialupi. At this time Konrad Paumann flourished in Germany, some of whose organ compositions are extant, showing the feature which distinguishes organ, like all instrumental music, from vocal music, namely the diminution or figuration, ornamentation, of the melodies. With Paumann this figuration is as yet confined to the melody proper, the top part. With Claudio Merulo (1528-1604) we find the figuration extended to the accompanying parts also. More mature work was produced by Giovanni Gabrieli (1557-1612) in his "Canzone e Sonate" (1597 and 1615). Further development of a true instrumental style was brought about by Samuel Scheidt (1587-1654). Then follow a series of illustrious composers for the organ, of whom we may mention Girolamo Frescobaldi (1583-1644), Johann Jacob Froberger (died 1667), Dietrich Buxtehude (died 1707), and Johann Sebastian Bach (1685-1750), at whose hands organ composition reached its highest point.

After Bach the general development of music, being in the direction of more individual expression and constantly varying emotion, was not favourable to organ composition. Accordingly, none of the best men turned their attention to the organ, Mendelssohn's compositions for the instrument being a notable exception. In modern times a large number of composers have written respectable music for the organ, among whom we may mention the French Guilmant and Widor and the German Rheinberger and Reger. But even of these, with the possible exception of Widor and Reger, the organ can be counted as first-class composers. The scarcity of really good modern organ compositions has led organists to the extended use of arrangements. If these arrangements are made with due regard to the nature of the organ, they cannot be altogether objected to. But it is clear that they do not represent the ideal of organ music. As the characteristic beauty of organ tone lies in its even continuation, legato playing must be the normal for the organ more than for any other instrument. While, therefore, staccato playing cannot absolutely be excluded, and an occasional use of it is even desirable for the sake of variety, still the modern tendency to play everything staccato or messelegato is open to great objections. The alternation and contrast of tone-colours afforded by the variety of stops and the presence of several manuals is a legitimate and valuable device. But too much variety is inartistic, and, in particular, an excessive use of solo stops is alien to the true organ style.

A word may be added about the local position of the organ in the church. The considerations under this question are threefold: the proximity of the organ to the singers, the acoustical effect, and the architectural fitness. The combination of these three claims in existing churches frequently gives rise to difficulty. Hence it is desirable that in planning new churches architects should be required to provide ample room for an organ.

There is no good history of the organ. On the ancient organ a good book is Dressening, Die Orgel (Stuttgart, 1900); on the Principles of the Hydraulie Organ in Quarterly Mag. of the International Musical Society, pt. 2 (Leipzig, 1895), and further works are: Ritter, Zur Geschichte des Orgelspiels im 16. und 17. Jahrhused (Leipzig, 1884); Wagnermann, Geschichte des Orgelspiels in Frankreich (Leipzig, 1887); Grolleau, Histoire de l'orgue (Antwerp, 1865); Hinton, Story of the Electric Organ (London, 1909); Rehn, Die Klangemistik im Kirchenmusikalisichen Jahrhundert (Ratisbon, 1903); Boule, Die musikalischen Instrumente in den Miniatures des frühen Mittelalters 1: Die Blasinstrumente (Leipzig, 1900); Violetter-le-Duc, Dictionnaire raisonné du mobilier français de l'époque carolingienne à la Renaissance: 11. Instruments de musique (Paris, 1874).

The ecclesiastical legislation on organ-playing is contained in the Cenecrœmatis Episcoporum and in Decretal of the S. Congregation of Rites. The latter, as far as they cope the subject, are conveniently put together in Atten. Rhen.-Kongregat in Besitz auf Kirchenmusik (Ratisbon and New York, 1901).

Oriental Study and Research.—In the broadest sense of the term. Oriental study comprises the scientific investigation and discussion of all topics—linguistics, archeology, ethnology, etc.—connected with the East, in particular, that is, with the literal and interpretation of Eastern literary and archeological remains. So vast is the subject that it has been divided into many departments, each of which in turn embraces various specialized branches. Thus the study of the language, customs, philosophy, religion of China and the Far East is in itself a vast though relatively little-explored field of scientific investigation, while the study of Sanskrit, together with the classic lore of the ancient Hindus, which has cast so much light on our knowledge of the European languages and peoples, forms another great division of Oriental research.

From the religious point of view, however, the greatest and most valuable results have been achieved by the study of the group of languages generally termed Semitic, and through archeological research in the so-called Bible Lands—Assyria and Babylonia, Assyria and Palestine. Arabia and the Valley of the Nile. Not only have these studies and explorations cast a great deal of light on the Old Testament writings but they have, moreover, revealed with considerable precision and detail the building up of empires and civilizations that had flourished for many centuries and passed away even before Greece or Rome had acquired any great political or literary importance. The earliest efforts of Oriental scholars in the field of Oriental research were naturally connected with the scientific study of Hebrew, the language of the Old Testament. To say nothing of the work done by the rabbis of the Middle Ages, at the period when the influence of Arabic culture in the Jewish colonies of Spain and northern Africa, we find prior to the Reformation the names of Johann Reuchlin (1455-1522) and the Dominican Santus Pagnin (1471-1541), pioneers who prepared the way for such scholars as the famous Johann Buxtorf (1564-1629) and his son (1599-1684), both successively professors at Basle, and others of the same period. For ulterior developments in the study of Hebrew see article Hebrew Language and Literature.

In connexion with the impetus given to Biblical Oriental studies in the sixteenth century, mention should be made of the Compendiosa Polyglotta published under the direction of Cardinal Ximenes (1436-1517). It was the first printed edition of the Scriptures in the original text accompanied by the principal ancient versions, and antedated by more than a century the London Polyglot of Brian Walton. This great work, which is dedicated to Pope Leo X, comprises six folio volumes, the last being devoted to a Hebrew lexicon and other scientific instruments. It was begun in 1502 and finished in 1517, though not published until 1522. In its preparation the cardinal was aided by several Greek and Oriental scholars, among whom were the celebrated Stumma (D. López de Zúñiga), Vergara, and three Jewish converts. The zeal for Hebrew naturally led to the study of other Semitic languages (Syriac, Arabic, Ethiopic, etc.), which were eagerly taken up not only as a means of obtaining a more complete knowledge of Hebrew through the newly-introduced methods of comparative philology, but also on account of the literary treasures they contained, which had hitherto remained practically unknown to European scholars. In this broader field the greatest credit is due to the illustrious Maronite family of the Assemani (q. v.). (For the work done by scholars in the study of Syriac see Syriac Language and Literature.)

The first European scholar who turned his attention to Ethiopian was Potken of Cologne, about 1513. A grammar and dictionary were published by Jacob Wemmers, a Carmelite of Antwerp, in 1638; and in...
1661 appeared the first edition of the great Lexicon by Job Ludolf, who in the edition of 1702 prefixed a "Dissertatio de Harmonia Lingue Æth. cum cet. Orient." Ludolf was also the author of a commentary on Ethiopic history. Later scholars who have attained eminence in this branch are Dillmann, who among other works published several books of the Ethiopic version of the Old Testament: Octateuch (Leipzig, 1835), the four Books of Kings (Leipzig, 1861–71), the Book of Enoch (1851), and the "Book of the Jubilee" (1859); R. Lawrence, who published the "Ascensio Isaiæ" (Oxford, 1819), and the "Apocolypse of Ezra" (1820); Hupfeld, "Exercitatio Æthiopicæ" (1825); Ewald "Ueber des Æthiop. Buch's Henoch Entschung" (1854) etc. (See article Etru-ophia.—Language and Literature.)

In the field of Arabic the greatest honour is due to Baron Sylvestre de Sacy (1758–1838), a scholar of marvellous erudition and versatility, equally proficient in the other Semitic languages as well as in Greek, Latin, and the modern European tongues. He may be said to have laid the foundations of Arabic grammar. Among his works are a "Christomatie arabæ" (3 vols., Paris, 1806); "Grammaire arabe" (2 vols., 1810) etc. In Germany, George W. Freytag (1788–1861) became a great authority on Arabic. His greatest work is the "Lexicon Arabico-Latinum" (1830–37). Among the great number of more recent scholars may be mentioned Brockelmann, "Geschichte der Diæseptischen Literature" (2 vols., Berlin, 1899–1902); Hartwig Demberg, C. Caspari, Theo. Noeldeke etc. In this connexion it may be noted that an important school of Arabic studies has been instituted by the Jesuit Fathers in Beirut, Syria. As regards the progress of the science of Assyriology, much valuable work has been done in connection with the deciphering of the cuneiform inscriptions. The chief of these is Professor baked in the field of cuneiform inscriptions is Sir Henry Rawlinson. The deciphering of the several inscriptions, and the translation of the documents on which they are written, has occupied many years of the most strenuous labour and with serious risk of life. Rawlinson assumed as a working hypothesis that the first column was old Persian written in cuneiform characters, and that the second column was written in the same characters as the first. The second column, called the Median or Susian text, was not deciphered until 1890. Over and above this splendid achievement, Rawlinson rendered invaluable service to the science of Assyriology by editing the Cuneiform Inscriptions of Western Asia published by the British Museum. Between 1853 and 1872 little was done by way of excavation, but in the latter year George Smith, a young employee in the British Museum, discovered some tablets containing fragments of a Flood legend strikingly similar in some respects to the Biblical narrative. The interest aroused by the publication of these fragments led to a great deal of excavation. Between 1872 and 1875 Smith was three times sent to Assyria in the hope of finding more fragments bearing on Biblical accounts. In this he was unsuccessful and, unfortunately for the cause of Assyriology, he died prematurely while on his third expedition in 1876.

The exploration work for the British Museum was continued by Hormuzd Rassam, who, besides other valuable treasures found in various parts of Babylonia, unearthed in the expedition of 1887–82 the great bronze doors with the inscriptions of Shalmanesar II (859–826 B.C.). About the same time M. de Sarze, French consul at Basoreh in Southern Babylonia, excavated the very ancient Tellah statues which were acquired by the French Government for the Museum of the Louvre. The work of de Sarze was continued until his death in 1903, and resulted in the discovery of an enormous quantity of Babylonian, bronze and silver figures, vases, etc. The French expedition to Susa, under the direction of M. J. de Morgan (1897–1902), was one of the most important in the history of Assyriology, for it resulted in the finding of the Hammurabi Code of Laws. This great code, which illustrates in many respects the Pentateuchal Law, was first translated by Father Scheil, the eminent Dominican scholar who was the first to publish the Babylonian expedition ("Textes Elamitiques-Sémitiques", Paris, 1902), and later into German by Dr. Hugo Winckler of Berlin, into English by Dr. Johns and into Italian by Rev. Dr. Francesco Mari. (See articles by Dr.
Gabriel Ouassani in the "New York Review", "The Code of Hammurabi", Aug.–Sept., 1905; "The Code of Hammurabi and the Mosaic Legislation", Dec., 1905–Jan., 1906. In 1884 the first American expedition was sent out to Babylon under the auspices of the Archeological Institute of America, and under the direction of W. H. Ward. In 1888 the Babylonian Exploration Fund, organized in Philadelphia, was sent out under the direction of Dr. John Peters in the interests of the University of Pennsylvania. The site chosen was Nippur, and the work of excavation was continued at intervals mainly on this site until 1900. These expeditions resulted in the discovery of more than 40,000 inscriptions, clay tablets, stone monuments, etc. The vast amount of material brought to light by the excavations in Assyria and Babylonia has powerfully stimulated the ardor of students of Assyriology both in Europe and America. The limits of the present article will allow but the mention of a few distinguished names.

In Germany.—Eberhard Scharfer (1856) has been called the father of German Assyriology. Successively professor at Zürich, Giessen, Jena, and Berlin (1875), he has written many works on the subject, among which: "Die Assyrish-Babylonisch Kelinschriften" (1872, tr. "The Cuneiform Inscriptions and the Tablets of Assur" (1885, tr. "Assyrisch- und Babylonisch- Geschichtsforschung" (1878); "Zur Frage nach dem Ursprunge der Altababylonischen Kultur" (1884). Other German scholars of note are Hugo Winckler (Alttestamentliche Untersuchungen, Leipzig, 1889, etc.); Friederich Delitzsch (Grammar, Lexicon, etc.); J. Jeremias, B. G. Niebuhr, F. Hommel, F. Kaufen (Assyr. und Babylonien nach dem neuesten Entdeckungen, Freiburg, 1889, etc.); W. Riecke, Frey, Roesler, Bruck, L. Forman, F. Feiss, etc. In France.—F. Lenormant (Etudes cunéiformes, 5 parts, Paris, 1878–80); J. Mercant (Ninive et Babylon, Paris, 1887); Halévy (Documents religieux de l’Assyrie et de la Babylone, Paris, 1882); V. Schell, O. P. (Textes Elamites, 3 vols., Paris, 1901–04); Rev. F. Martin (Textes religieux d’Assyriens et Babyloniens, Paris, 1900); F. Thureau-Dangin (Recherches sur l’Origine de l’écriture cunéiforme, Paris, 1895, oppert, Loisy, Felster, etc. In England.—Sir H. Rawlinson (Cuneiform Inscriptions of Western Asia, 5 vols., 1861–1884, etc.); A. H. Sayce (Higher Criticism and the Monuments, London, 1884, etc.); L. W. King (The Inscribed Documents of Hammurabi . . . and other Kings of the First Dynasty of Babylon, London, 1898–1900); C. W. Johns, T. G. Pinches, J. A. Craig, etc. In America.—Besides the scholars already referred to may be mentioned R. W. Rogers (History of Babylonia and Assyria, I, New York, 1900); H. V. Hilprecht (Explorations in Biblical Lands during the Nineteenth Century, New York, 1903); Paul Haupt (numerous publications); R. F. Harper, M. Jastrow, C. Johnston, J. D. Lyon, J. D. Prince, etc.

Egyptian Research.—Modern Oriental research in the valley of the Nile began in 1798 with the Egyptian campaign of Napoleon, who with characteristic foresight invited M. Gaspard Monge (1746–1818) with a corps of savants and artists to join the expedition. The results of their observations were published at the instigation of the French Government (1803–09) in several folio volumes under the title: "Description de l’Egypte", but the numerous specimens collected by these scientists fell into the hands of the English after the naval battle of Aboukir and formed later the nucleus of the Egyptian department of the British Museum. The mysterious hieroglyphic characters which they exhibited were soon made the object of intense study both in England and France and the famous Rosetta Stone which bears a trilingual inscription (in Greek, in the Egyptian demotic script, and in the hieroglyphic writing) furnished a key to the meaning of the latter, which was discovered almost simultaneously in France by J. François Champollion (1791–1832), and in England by Thomas Young (1773–1827). Thus the Rosetta inscription (embodying a part of a decree of Ptolemy V Epiphanes, 205–181 B.C.) stands in the same relation to the discoveries bearing on the literature and civilization of ancient Egypt as does the Behistun inscription with regard to the antique treasures discovered in Assyria and Babylonia. Champollion’s discovery aroused a great interest in Egyptian inscriptions and in 1889, a French scholar was sent to Egypt together with Rosellini at the head of a Franco-Italian expedition which proved most fruitful in scientific results. A German expedition under the direction of Lepsius was sent out in 1849 to study Egyptian monuments in relation to Bible history, and in addition to explorations made in Egypt and Ethiopia a visit was made to the Sinaiic peninsula. In 1850 Auguste Mariette, a French savant, made the remarkable discovery of the tombs of the sacred Apis bulls at Memphis together with thousands of memorial inscriptions. In 1857 he was appointed director of the museum of antiquities newly established in Cairo, and at the same time he received from the khedive the exclusive right of excavating in Egyptian territory for scientific purposes—a right which he exercised until his death in 1880. The results of his studies on the tombs of the Egyptian pharaohs probably owes more to Mariette than to any other scholar. He was succeeded by another eminent French scholar, G. Maspero, and the explorations still remaining in the hands of the French were carried on systematically and with steady success; but under the new administration permission was given to representatives of other nations to conduct excavations and, with certain restrictions, to export the results of their findings. The Egyptian Exploration fund was organized in England in 1883, and after excavations in the Delta on the site of the Biblical city of Pithom and of the Greek city of Naucratis, the work of the society was transferred in 1896 to Upper Egypt. At that time also the excavations were placed under the direction of W. Flinders Petrie who has achieved astonishing results, especially in reconstructing in accordance with the testimony of the monuments the account of ancient Egyptian history, which he has carried back to a period antedating the reign of the formerly-supposed mythical king Menes, the founder of the First Dynasty. Further expeditions were also fitted out by Swiss, Germans, and Americans, and the Orient Gesellschaft organized in 1899 has conducted systematic explorations at various points in the Orient. Among the almost incredible number of objects brought to light by the Egyptian explorers, and which besides filling the new and enlarged museum of Cairo built in 1902, go to make up numerous and important collections in Europe and America, may be mentioned the many papyrus documents (e.g. the Logia of Jesus, various apocalypses, heretical gospels, etc.), which throw light on early Christian history and on the period immediately preceding it. The abundance and historic importance of the treasures found in the land of the Pharaohs caused a great number of European scholars to devote their attention to the study of Egyptology. All the names already referred to are taken at random from a list of scholars far too numerous to be even mentioned in the present article. G. Perrot and C. Chippies (History of Art in Ancient Egypt, 2 vols., London, 1882), F. Renouf (Translation of the Books of the Dead, parts I–IV, London, 1893–95, completed by E. Naville, 1907); E. A. W. Budge (The Mummy: Chapters on Egyptian Funeral Archaeology, Cambridge, 1873; The Book of the Dead, 3 vols., London, 1888); W. Maspero (Asien und Europa nach altägyptischen Denkmälern, Leipzig, 1893); J. de Morgan (Recherches sur les origines de l’Egypte, Paris, 1895–96); J. M. Broderick and A. Morton (Concise Dictionary of Egyptian Archaeology, London, 1901); J. P. Mahaffy (The Empire of the Pharaohs, London, 1886); H. Wallis, J. Caney, J. L. Myres, S. L. Viedemann, M. C. Strack, P. Pierret, K. Pieck, A. Hermann, etc. Connected with Egyptology is the study of Coptic, the language of the descendants of the ancient Egyptians. The extant Coptic literature is almost exclusively Christian, and, except for those scriptural purposes, it fell into disuse after the Moslem supremacy in Egypt in the seventh century. Among the scholars who have made a speciality of this branch of Oriental studies may be mentioned E. Renaudot (eighteenth century), E. M. Quatremère (Recherches critiques et historiques sur la langue et la littérature de l’Égypte, Paris, 1806); A. J. Butler (Ancient Coptical Churches of Egypt, Oxford, 1834), T. E. Everitt, E. Amédée, E. O. Butler, W. E. Crum, and H. Hyvernat, professor of Oriental languages and archaeology at the Catholic University in Washington, who has published in monumental form the text and translation of the Acts of the Martyrs of the Coptic Church.

Explorations in Syria and Palestine.—Explorations in the Bible lands proper were undertaken later than those in Assyria and Egypt and thus far they have been less fruitful in archaeological results. The first work, chiefly topographical, was undertaken by Dr. Edward Robinson of New York in 1838 and again in 1852. The results of his investigations appeared in “Palæstina: Researches in the Holy Land,” vol. i., Berlin and Boston, 1841 (3rd edition, 1877), but he is better known through the publication of his popular work entitled “The Land and the Book.” In 1847 the American Government commissioned Lieutenant Lynch of the U.S. Navy to explore the valley of the Jordan and the Sea of Galilee. In 1865 the Palestine Exploration Fund was organized in England, and among other important results of its activities has been an accurate survey and mapping out of the territory west of the Jordan. From 1867 to 1870 the Fund conducted excavations at Jerusalem under the direction of Sir Charles Warren. They proved valuable in connexion with the identification of the ancient Temple and other sites, but little was found in the line of archeological remains. In 1887 a German Palestine Exploration Fund was organized, and beginning in 1884 it carried out under the direction of Dr. Schumacher a careful survey of the territory east of Jordan. The most important archeological discoveries in Palestine are the inscriptions of Meha, King of Moab (ninth century B.C.), found by the German missionary Kissel; in 1868, the Hebrew inscription, probably of the time of Eschias, found in the Siloam tunnel beneath the hill of Ophel, and the Greek inscription discovered by Clermont-Ganneau. This connection mention should be made of the still more important finding by natives in Egypt (1887) of the famous Tel el-Amarna tablets (q. v.), or letters written in cuneiform characters and proving that about 1400 B.C., prior to the Hebrew conquest, Palestine was already permeated by the Assyro-Babylonian civilization and culture. Further excavations in Palestine have been conducted at various points by W. Flinders Petrie, the Egyptian explorer, (1889) and by the American savant F. J. Bliss (1899–1900). Of still greater importance for Oriental studies bearing on the Bible has been the establishment (1893) by the Dominican Fathers at Jerusalem of a school of Biblical studies under the direction of F. M. Lagrange, O. P. This institute, which has for its object a theoretical and practical training in Oriental subjects pertaining to Holy Scripture, numbers among its staff of instructors such scholars as Father Lagrange, O. P., and Father Vincent, with their co-workers publish the scholarly “Revue biblique internationale.” Similar schools were later founded at Jerusalem by the Americans (1900) and by the Germans (1903).

JAMES F. DRIBOLL.

Orientation of Churches.—According to Tertullian the Christians of his time were, by some who concerned themselves with their form of worship, believed to be votaries of the sun. This supposition, he adds, doubtless arose from the Christian practice of turning to the east when praying (Apot., c. xvi). Speaking of churches the same writer tells us that the homes of “our dove”, as he terms them, are always in “high and open places, facing the light” (Adv. Val., c. iii), and the Apostolic Constitutions (third to fifth century) prescribe that church edifices should be erected with their “heads” towards the East (Const. Apost., ii, 7).

The practice of praying while turned towards the rising sun is older than Christianity, but the Christians in adopting it were influenced by reasons peculiar to themselves. The principal of these reasons, according to St. Gregory of Nyssa, was that the Orient contained man’s original home, the earthly paradise. St. Thomas Aquinas, speaking for the Middle Ages, adds to this reason several others. Thus the earliest period the custom of locating the apse and altar in the eastern extremity of the church was the rule. Yet the great Roman Basilicas of the Lateran, St. Peter’s, St. Paul’s (originally), St. Lorenzo’s, as well as the Basilica of the Resurrection in Jerusalem and the basilicas of Tyre and Antioch, reversed this rule by placing the apse in the western extremity. The reasons for this mode of orientation can only be conjectured. Some writers explain it by the fact that in the fourth century the celebrant at Mass chanted the Missal face to the East. The most important archiological discoveries in Palestine are the inscription of Meha, King of Moab (ninth century B.C.), found at Dibon by the German missionary Kissel; in 1868, the Hebrew inscription, probably of the time of Eschias, found in the Siloam tunnel beneath the hill of Ophel, and the Greek inscription discovered by Clermont-Ganneau. In this connexion mention should be made of the still more important finding by natives in Egypt (1887) of the famous Tel el-Amarna tablets (q. v.), or letters written in cuneiform characters and proving that about 1400 B.C., prior to the Hebrew conquest, Palestine was already permeated by the Assyro-Babylonian civilization and culture. Further excavations in Palestine have been conducted at various points by W. Flinders Petrie, the Egyptian explorer, (1889) and by the American savant F. J. Bliss (1899–1900). Of still greater importance for Oriental studies bearing on the Bible has been the establishment (1893) by the Dominican Fathers at Jerusalem of a school of Biblical studies under the direction of F. M. Lagrange, O. P. This institute, which has for its object a theoretical and practical training in Oriental subjects pertaining to Holy Scripture, numbers among its staff of instructors such scholars as Father Lagrange, O. P., and Father Vincent, with their co-workers publish the scholarly “Revue biblique internationale.” Similar schools were later founded at Jerusalem by the Americans (1900) and by the Germans (1903).

Orientius, Christian Latins poet of the fifth century. He wrote an elegiac poem (Commonitorum) of 1036 verses (divided into two books) describing the way to heaven, with warnings against its hindrances. He was a Gaul (II, 184), who had been converted after his life of sin (II, 405 sq.), and with Father Vincent, with whom he corresponded in his poetry and who wrote a treatise about the life of a priest and an apostle, after the model of Tertullian, and who wrote at the time when his country was being devastated by the invasion of savages. All this points to his identification with Orientius, Bishop of Augusta Austorum (Auch), who as a very old man was sent by Theodoric I, King of the Goths, as ambassador to the Roman generals Ætius and Litorius in 439 ("Vita S. Orientii" in "Acta SS.", I May, 61). The Com mentarium quotes classical poets—Virgil, Ovid, Catullus—and is perhaps influenced by Prudentius. It exists in one only MS. (Cod. Ashburnham. sec. X), and is followed by some shorter anonymous poems not by Orientius, and by two prayers in verse attributed to him. The first complete edition was published by Martigny, "Vetustus Sacrum, sive Monumenta", I (Rouen, 1700); then by Gallandi, "Bibliotheca veterum Patrum", X (Venice, 1774), 185-96, reprinted in "P. L.", LXI, 977-1006. The best modern edition is that of Ellis in the "Corpus Scriptorum Eccles. Latinorum", XVI (Venice, 1868): "Poetae Christiani minores", I, 191-261.

ADRIAN FORTESCUE.

Oriflamme.—In verses 3003-5 of the "Chanson de Roland" (eleventh century) the oriflamme is mentioned as a royal banner, called at first "Romaine" afterwards "Montjoie". According to the legend it is given to Charlemagne by the pope, but no historical text affords us any information with regard to this oriflamme, which is perhaps fabulous. As Eudes, who became king in 885, was Abbot of St. Martin, and the banner of the church of St. Martin de Tours was the earliest military standard of the Frankish monarchy. It was a plain blue, a colour then asigned in the liturgy to saints who were, like St. Martin, confessors and pontiffs. The azure ground strewn with gold fleur-de-lis remained the symbol of royalty until the fourteenth century, when the white standard of Jeanne d'Arc wrought marvels, and by degrees the custom was introduced of depicting the fleur-de-lis on white ground. But from the time of Louis VI (1108-37) the banner of St. Martin was replaced as ensign of war by the oriflamme of the Abbey of St. Denis, which floated above the tomb of St. Denis and was said to have been given to the abbey by Dagobert. It is supposed without any certainty that this was a piece of fiery red silk or sendal the field of which was covered with flames and stars of gold. The standard-bearer carried it either at the end of a staff or suspended from his neck. Until the twelfth century the standard-bearer was the Comte de Vexin, who, as "vowed" to St. Denis, was the temporal defender of the abbey. Louis VI the Fat, having acquired Vexin, became standard-bearer; as soon as war began, Louis VI received Communion at St. Denis and took the standard from the tomb of the saint to carry it into battle; "Montjoie Saint Denis". The word "Montjoie Notre Dame" or "Montjoie Saint George". The words "Montjoie" from Mone passata or Mone Jose) designates the heaps of stones along the roadside which served as milestones or sign-posts, and which sometimes became the meeting-places for warriors; it was applied to the oriflamme the sight of which was to guide the soldiers in the mêlée. The descriptions of the oriflamme which have reached us in Guillaume le Breton (thirteenth cent.), in the "Chronicle of Flan-

GEORGES GOTAU.
that city, assisted by Alexander, Bishop of Jerusalem, raised him to the priesthood. Demetrius, although he had given letters of recommendation to Origen, was very much offended by this ordination, which had taken place without his consent, and, as he thought, in derogation of his rights. If Eusebius (VI, viii) is to be believed, he was envious of the increasing influence of his catechist. So, on his return to Alexandria, Origen again perceived that his bishop was rather unfriendly towards him. He yielded to the storm and quit Egypt (231). The details of this affair were recorded by Eusebius in the second book of the "Apology for Origen"; according to Photius, who had read the work, two councils were held at Alexandria, one of which pronounced a decree of banishment against Origen while the other depose him from the priesthood (Bibl. cod. 118). St. Jerome declares expressly that he was not condemned on a point of doctrine.

(2) Origen at Cæsarea (323).—Expelled from Alexandria, Origen fixed his abode at Cæsarea in Palestine (229), with his protector and friend Theoctistus and founded a new school there, and resumed his "Commentary on St. John" at the point where it had been interrupted. He was soon surrounded by pupils. The most distinguished of these, without doubt, was Gregory Thaumaturgus who, with his brother Apollodorus, attended Origen's lectures for five years and delivered on leaving him a celebrated "Farewell Address." During the persecution of Alexander (303-308) Origen's friend, St. Firmilian, Bishop of Cæsarea in Cappadocia, who made him rear for a long period. On this occasion he was hospitably entertained by a Christian lady of Cæsarea, named Actina, who had inherited the writings of Summachus, the translator of the Old Testament (Palladius, "Hist. Laus.", 147). The years following were devoted most uninterruptedly to the composition of the "Commentaries." Mention is made only of a few excursions to the Holy Places, a journey to Athens (Eusebius, VI, xxxii), and two voyages to Arabia, one of which was undertaken for the conversion of Beryllus, a Paphian (Eusebius, VI, xxxiii). St. Jerome, "De viris illi. i., IV, xxxvii") the other to refute certain heretics who denied the Resurrection (Eusebius, "Hist. ecc.", VI, xxxviii). Age did not diminish his activities. He was even more busy when he wrote his "Commentary on St. Matthew." The persecution of Decius (250) prevented him from continuing these works. Origen was imprisoned and barbarously tortured, but his courage was unshaken and from prison he wrote letters breathing the spirit of the martyrs (Eusebius, "Hist. ecc.", VI, xxx). He was still alive on the death of Decius (251), but only lingered a short time, probably, from the results of his sufferings endured during the persecution (253 or 254), at the age of sixty-nine (Eusebius, "Hist. ecc.", VII, i). His last days were spent at Tyr, though his reason for retiring thither is unknown. He was buried with honour as a confessor of the Faith. For a long time his sepulcher, behind the high-altar of the cathedral of Tyr, was visited by pilgrims. To-day, as nothing remains of this cathedral except a mass of ruins, the exact location of his tomb is unknown.
